ROYAL COMMISSION ON LUNACY AND MENTAL DISORDER.

FIRST DAY.

Tuesday, 7th October, 1924.

MEMBERS PRESENT :

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (in the Chair).

THE EARL RUSSELL.

LORD EUSTACE PERCY, M.P.

SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.

SIR THOMAS HUTCHISON, BART.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E., M.D.

MR. W. A. JOWITT, K.C., M.P.

MR. F. D. MacKINNON, K.C.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Sir FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B. (accompanied by Mr. S. J. Fraser Macleod, K.C., Legal Commissioner, and Dr. C. H. Bond, C.B.E., D.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., a Medical Commissioner of the Board of Control), called and examined.

Chairman: Before we begin our Inquiry this morning, I feel that it would be only fitting that we should record our regret at the death of Mr. Trevor, one of the Legal Commissioners of the Board of Control. Mr. Trevor's notable public services in this department of administration have won for him the respect and the appreciation of all. We had hoped that we should have the benefit of his assistance in our deliberations here, but unfortunately that is not to be so. Before we begin the work of this Inquiry, in which he would have been so much interested, I am sure you will all agree with me that we should take the opportunity of expressing our regret and paying a tribute to his memory.

The witness who is before us to-day is Sir Frederick Willis, K.B.E., C.B., Chairman of the Board of Control.

1. (To the Witness): Sir Frederick, you have been good enough to furnish us with a précis of your evidence, in which the whole position of the Board of Control in its relation to this branch of administration has been set out. I thought it would be most convenient if, with your précis before me and before the other members of the Commission, I were to address to you, and my fellow-Commissioners were to address to you, questions arising upon that précis. It might be well if, in the first place, we bring out the limitations of this Inquiry. I have no doubt that in addressing yourself to the task of preparing to give evidence here, you have had in view those limitations. We are instructed to concern ourselves with the person, and not with the property of persons of unsound mind. You will agree with me, I think, that that cuts out a very large chapter of lunacy administration, and simplifies our task to some extent?—Yes.

2. In the next place, within those limits, our Inquiry is directed to two points which one may summarise thus: The first relates to the certification, detention, and care of persons who are or are alleged to be of unsound mind; and the second relates to the question of the treatment without certification of persons suffering from mental disorder. On the first branch we desire your help as to the existing system of law and administration. On the second branch, I understand that we are concerned rather with the region of proposed legislation than of existing legislation. Am I right in that?—That is quite right.

3. So that the two chapters of our investigation relate, firstly to an existing system, and secondly to a possible system which might be instituted. Now with that preamble, first of all, you inform us that you are Chairman of the Board of Control?—Yes.

4. I think it might be convenient if you told us quite shortly the history of the institution of the Board of Control, its composition, and its general duties. As regards its history, will you explain to us the origin of the present Board of Control, as we know it?—Before we begin I would like to say that I and my colleagues are very grateful indeed to you for what you have said with regard to Mr. Trevor. His death is a very, very great loss to us, and we very much appreciate what you have said. The *part of the précis which I have furnished dealing with the legal safeguards was prepared by Mr. Trevor as Senior Legal Commissioner, in consultation with his colleagues, and Mr. Macleod, K.C., who is now Senior Legal Commissioner, is quite familiar with all the law on the subject, and he has come in place of Mr. Trevor.

* See Appendix I.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

Do you want me, Sir, to go over again what is more or less in my précis? For instance, in regard to the history of the Board of Control, it starts with the formation of the Lunacy Commission in 1845 really.

5. I thought it might be convenient if you dealt with the matter generally. I would not ask that you should go through the matter, vouching it by Sections of Acts of Parliament, and so on, but that you should give us a general description of the inception of your Board?—Quite. I think one might say that it really had its inception in 1845. Prior to that there were some temporary Commissioners, but then it was laid down that there should be a permanent Lunacy Commission. I think I am right in saying that it was then said it should consist of three legal members and three medical members. It was considered very important to get men of high standing, and also important that these positions should be positions of dignity, so that the Commissioners, in going round, should carry as much weight as public officials could; and they were given at that time what was then the highest salary of any member of the permanent Civil Service of this country, namely, £1,500 a year. That salary remains to-day. Of course, in relation to other salaries, it does not occupy the same position as it did in 1845. Whether our dignity, status, and usefulness has decreased in consequence, is hardly for me to say. That Lunacy Commission went on from 1845 until the Mental Deficiency Act of 1913, when the duties of the Lunacy Commissioners were very much enlarged. The Act was founded on the recommendations of a Royal Commission, and dealt largely with mental deficiency as distinguished from insanity. Under that Act a Board was formed which was to consist of not more than 15 members. I think it said that not more than 12 should be paid, and there were to be at least four paid legal members and at least four paid medical members; there were to be at least one paid woman on the Commission, and at least one unpaid woman. That very briefly is the history. It was considered in 1845 that it was very important to have men of high standing going about the country and seeing exactly what was going on; and, reviewing the history, I feel confident that the influence of the Lunacy Commission has been very very useful in producing great improvements. Notwithstanding what may be said against our public asylums to-day, I am confident that if you go round to them you will be struck by the hospital character of them and by the scientific spirit displayed throughout the service. There are, of course, differences in asylums; some of them are very old buildings; but it is wonderful to observe the manner in which these very old buildings have been adapted to modern requirements.

6. Do you attribute that state of efficiency in large measure to the existence of a central body such as the Board of Control?—I do in large measure, but I do not want to say at all that there has not been a general growth of a right spirit throughout the whole lunacy system, the medical men who are administering these asylums and the visiting committees who control them, and so on; but I am sure the Lunacy Commission has been of very great value in producing that present-day condition.

7. Now you have alluded to the Mental Deficiency Act of 1913, which, as you say, was the outcome of the previous Inquiry. It was under that Act that the Board of Control, as we now know it, was constituted?—That is so. I must say here that the Lunacy Commissioners then existing were added to the Board of Control; they were part of its membership.

8. I follow. The classes of persons with whom the Mental Deficiency Act deals are different from those with whom we are concerned in this Inquiry, are they not?—That is so. In theory the Mental Deficiency Act deals with persons who either at birth or early age exhibit some mental defect that arrests development.

9. Is there any over-lapping among the classes with which the two provinces are concerned?—That is to some extent a medical question. I should say there is a little overlapping, and, of course, you may get lunacy imposed on mental defect. There are many cases of mental defectives who have a mental illness added.

10. An individual might be relegated to one or other of the categories on medical evidence, I suppose?—Yes, quite.

11. The Mental Deficiency Act of 1913, I understand, has created a separate code from the code of lunacy law and administration?—That is so.

12. A code with which this particular Inquiry is not really concerned?—No; it was expressly ruled out of the Reference, I think.

13. We are anxious at the outset to appreciate the principles upon which this branch of law has developed, Sir Frederick, and in a general survey of it, it occurs to me that it exhibits an attempt to accommodate two important legal principles, on the one hand the liberty of the individual, which the law regards as so sacred, and, on the other hand, the protection of the public against an individual who is abnormal in his actions, and the protection of the individual himself against unfortunate consequences of his abnormality. Now do you find that the history of the law exhibits an attempt to accommodate these two large principles?—I should say it does, certainly, and to-day, of course, we also look to the cure of the individual; that is a somewhat modern development; it is very much pressed now-a-days. We are always insisting on everything being done that can be done to effect a cure.

14. Of course the matter has both a legal and a medical aspect, and I was concerned for the moment to bring out what seemed to me to be the legal side of its history. It seems to exhibit an attempt to accommodate two principles, both of which are of great importance, but which must be accommodated in the public interest. On the medical side, I think the history has been one of a progressive effort to improve the conditions under which persons of unsound mind are detained, and to increase their opportunities of recovery at the same time?—That is quite true.

15. Then when one comes to consider how those principles are illustrated in the existing law, where should one look for what we may call the code of the lunacy law and administration at present?—In the earlier sections of the Lunacy Acts it is all set out.

16. I suppose also in the Rules and Orders which have been made in pursuance of those Acts?—Yes, quite.

17. May I take it that really the main source of the existing law is to be found in the Lunacy Acts of 1890 and 1891, with certain minor amending Statutes?—Yes.

18. And that the principles laid down in those Statutes have been developed in a series of Statutory Rules and Orders?—Yes. You do not want me at this stage to say briefly what the code is, I suppose?

19. I think we will take the code in its application to each of the topics we have got to deal with in a moment. It might be useful to get on the note that this is by no means the first Inquiry which has been ordered into these matters. There have been several important Inquiries in the past, have there not?—Several.

20. Would you, for the sake of getting them on the note, allude to the two or three which have been the most important?—There was in 1877 a Select Committee of the House of Commons which was called the Dillwyn Committee, which was appointed to enquire into the operation of the lunacy law so far as regards the security offered by it against violations of personal liberty. They reported on March 28th, 1878. They arrived at the conclusion that allegations of mala fides and of serious abuses were not substantiated.

21. And I think they suggested certain changes which would tend to improve still further the existing method of dealing with persons of abnormal mind?—That is so, yes.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

22. I think that Lord Shaftesbury and Mr. Phillips, a well-known Commissioner in Lunacy, and Dr. Blandford, all gave valuable evidence before that Committee?—That is so. I should say that Lord Shaftesbury objected very much indeed to bringing in the Justice to make an order. That was one of the recommendations of that Select Committee. He felt it was going to interfere very largely with the real interest of the insane person, and he resigned the Chairmanship of the Lunacy Commission rather than be a party to carrying out that new proposal.

23. Then there was also, in 1905, a Royal Commission, presided over by Lord Radnor, which issued its report in 1908?—Yes.

24. I think that report is useful as containing a full account of the constitution and procedure of the Lunacy Commission of England and Wales?—That is so, and a great deal of the evidence which they took would really be very valuable to-day, if any members were able to peruse it.

25. Do you suggest that the Members of the Commission might to some extent abbreviate the extent of our present Inquiry by referring to that evidence?—I think they might to some extent, certainly.

26. Especially in regard to non-controversial matters?—Yes. They will see a great many points were thoroughly considered.

27. Yes; it is useful for us to know that. Then another general question: The Lunacy Commissioners who preceded the Board of Control, and now the Board of Control itself, were formed, I take it, for the purpose of having a central body which should supervise and control the general administration of the Lunacy Law throughout the country?—That is so.

28. May one take it that the methods of supervision and control entrusted to the Board take the form of various safeguards in the matter of licensing premises in which insane persons may be detained, in visiting places where such persons are detained, in obtaining reports upon the condition of persons detained, tabulating and arranging statistics, collating information regarding insane persons, and ensuring the execution of the law in conformity with the Statutes and Rules?—Yes; that is a general statement. In addition to that, copies of all the documents on the admission of any patient to an institution for lunatics have to be furnished to the Board at the time, and they are very carefully scrutinised. If, for example, an admission document does not seem to show a sufficient ground for the detention of a patient, further inquiry is made.

29. One cannot read the Acts, I think, without noticing the importance attached to the Board of Control being apprised of what we may call every stage in the history of the insane person?—Yes; all the time we know everything that is going on about them. Dr. Bond mentions that on the occasions of visits by Commissioners to these institutions they make a great point of actually seeing the patients and talking to them; any of them that want a private interview can get a private interview.

30. Of course, a little later on we will discuss what is done. One wants to get at the start of this Inquiry a conspectus of the situation, so that we may understand the details when we come to consider them. I have stated in general terms the province of the Board of Control?—Quite.

31. It keeps in touch, if I may so put it, at every stage with the history of the persons affected?—Yes; and it was considered desirable to gather all of it together in one Department, a sort of separate Government Department, rather than to merge it into some other big Department like the Home Office, the Ministry of Health, or the Local Government Board.

32. Of course, we are the inheritors, are we not, of a somewhat complicated system in the past. What other bodies or persons are concerned with the insane persons in this country, besides the Board of Control?—Of course, to some extent, the Lord Chancellor is concerned with them.

33. He has a certain ancient jurisdiction, has he not?—Yes.

34. Does that relate to the person as well as to the property?—Yes, to some extent, to the person—those lunatics who are found so by inquisition, of which there are very few. He is concerned with the actual care of the person in those instances; he has his own visitors.

35. His jurisdiction is chiefly derived, is it not, from the common law rather than from Statute?—Yes. Of course, to some extent, he has powers under the Lunacy Act of 1890, but largely it is common law jurisdiction.

36. Then in addition to the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction, is there any other body?—The Home Secretary, of course, has jurisdiction over criminal lunatics. The Minister of Health has no jurisdiction over the persons of lunatics, but plans for new asylums have to receive his approval, and loans for new asylums have to receive his approval. The method of doing that is for the Board of Control to investigate the matter thoroughly; it sometimes means months of investigation before you can settle on the plans of a big new institution which is going to cost anything from half a million to one million pounds; then they pass on, after they have been investigated, to the Minister of Health. The Lord Chancellor sanctions rules which we make for the government of asylums.

37. Do you think that any disadvantage has arisen from what I may call the distribution of functions among those different bodies?—Well, I think it is desirable that the Board of Control should be able to go to the Minister of Health for his side of it, just in the same way that the Ministry of Health, as a Department, goes to the Minister; but we do not do that nowadays. If, for instance, we have to go to the Minister at all, we go to him like any member of the public goes to him on many questions. I am not sure that there is not some duplication of work there.

38. It naturally occurs to one that if there are two bodies or authorities concerned with the matter who have specially to deal with the safeguards relating to lunatics there might be some overlapping?—Yes; on the safeguards I do not think there are two. The Minister of Health, like a number of other people, may have letters sent to him. There is a section saying that letters sent to him, and to Judges, and so on, shall be sent unopened. The usual plan is for the Judges or the Lord Chancellor or the Minister to send them on to us, and ask us what we know about the case; but as to the safeguards of the person, I should say they are in the Board of Control, they are not spread about.

39. But take the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction. Do you ever find that the Board of Control and the Lord Chancellor are both engaged in investigating the state of any particular lunatic?—Well, in some few cases he visits the same cases that we visit, and if his medical man and our medical man did not quite agree as to the course to be taken about the patient, we should communicate one with the other; we have never any difficulty in that way. His powers in that matter, as I said just now, relate to some very small number, a few hundreds, whilst we deal with over 100,000.

40. But he has certain medical visitors whose functions are not exclusively confined to lunatics found so by inquisition?—No, not exclusively. If an order is made about their property he sends one of his visitors to see the case.

41. So that in the matter of investigating particular cases there are two authorities at the moment?—For this small number.

42. But you have not experienced any inconvenience from that duplication, have you?—No. I have often felt myself that the visitation of all these people should be done by the Board of Control. As to the inquisition cases, we do not visit those at all. I could give you the actual number, but it is a very small number; the procedure is almost obsolete.

43. Arising out of that, have you any views, Sir Frederick, as to the desirability of continuing this distinction between lunatics so found by inquisition and lunatics not so found by inquisition?—I think whatever work is necessary to be done by any Government Department could quite well be done by the Board of Control; but whether the Lord Chancellor would wish to give up his jurisdiction is another matter.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

44. We are concerned for the moment in inquiring as to the efficiency of the system. What I want to ask is this. Take the case of lunatics so found by inquisition: Do you think the process of finding a person insane by formal inquisition affords more or better protection to the person concerned than the methods adopted where the person is not so found by inquisition?—I do not think I am entitled to express any very definite opinion about that; I am not familiar enough with the actual cases that have been found by inquisition.

45. Then I put this question to you: You tell me that the number of persons who are formally found to be insane by inquisition has shown a tendency to decrease?—Yes.

46. And is still diminishing?—Yes.

47. You think it would be a reasonable inference to draw from that that the form of procedure in finding a person insane by inquisition is regarded as less necessary now than it formerly was for the protection of the person concerned?—I should say it is much less necessary; it affords him no better protection; it also gives a certain amount of publicity, which a lot of the friends do not like.

48. So far as the public are concerned, there has been very much less resort to that method in recent years?—Yes; it is really dying out, I should say.

49. It is still available, but less used?—Yes.

50. May one legitimately infer from that, do you think, that the other method of dealing with the case, the method which you are concerned with, meets adequately the public interest?—I think it meets it quite adequately.

51. In the case of a person found to be insane by inquisition, what is the warrant or certificate for his detention?—It is something like an Order of a Court.

52. Yes, but in their case you do not have the judicial authority or the justice certifying?—No.

53. The verdict, I suppose, in the inquisition, is the warrant?—The inquisition is either by the Master in Lunacy, or by the Master in Lunacy with a jury, and following the inquiry so held there is an order made that the person shall be detained.

54. That is really an Order of the High Court, is it not?—Yes.

55. And that is the warrant or sanction for the detention of the person so found by inquisition?—Yes. Section 108 of the Lunacy Act 1890, says: "The Judge in Lunacy may make orders for the custody of lunatics so found by inquisition, and the management of their estates." Section 12 prescribes the procedure for placing the patient under care.

56. Therefore, in their case the certification really is in the form of an Order of the Court?—It is.

57. The first main classification, from the legal point of view, of lunatics is into those so found by inquisition and those not so found by inquisition?—Yes.

58. Then it might be useful, I think, if you told us what are the various categories of patients at present with which you have to deal?—The two main ones are what are called "Private" and "Rate-aided," or "Private" and—"Pauper" is the word in the Act. We do not like the word "pauper," and perhaps at some time I might be allowed to say something about that. We feel it is a great hardship that a man who has been working all his life quite properly and so on, and suddenly gets a mental illness and has to go to a hospital, has to go as a pauper. But that is the main division—the private case and the publicly supported case.

59. And does the Statute deal separately with the two cases?—Yes; the provisions are somewhat different.

60. Some of the provisions, I take it, are identical, while others are varied?—That is quite true. I would like to say with regard to our public asylums that approximately 80 per cent. of all the cases are in county and borough mental hospitals; the others are in registered hospitals, licensed houses, naval and military hospitals, State criminal asylums, Poor Law institutions, in single care, or getting out-door relief; but 80 per cent. are in county and borough mental hospitals.

61. We shall have, then, to consider the topic of our remit in its relation to those two main classes—the private patient and the pauper patient?—Yes.

62. And the system applicable to each differs, although there are some features in common?—Yes; the main difference is that the pauper case goes in on one medical certificate and an order of the justice, while the other one has two medical certificates and an order of the justice.

63. That is a leading distinction?—Yes, but of course, in the rate-aided case it is always considered that there is a very strong tendency to get rid of the liability. As Mr. Macleod says, in the case of the pauper the justice is bound to see the case; in the case of the private patient he need not see the case.

64. We will develop the distinctions, but I am at the moment still on the general lay-out of the case, in order that we may have the general scheme in our minds. Now you have told us of the legal classification of the patients. Would you be good enough to tell us next of the places in which such patients are dealt with. There are various classes of places where we shall find those patients?—First of all, the county and borough mental hospitals; those are the main places. Then there are registered hospitals; that is to say, places not run for profit at all; they are in a sense like our general hospitals—St. Thomas's, or any of those in London. There is a committee and a foundation, and so on. In registered hospitals they do charge fees, but they may not make a profit. If they charge one individual a larger fee than it costs to treat that individual, the excess has to go to supporting some individual who pays less than he costs. The actual definition of registered hospital is contained in Section 341 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Then there are the licensed houses; there are what are called metropolitan licensed houses and provincial licensed houses; they are private asylums run for profit. Then there are the naval and military hospitals. On the 1st January there were only 171 cases in those hospitals.

65. I shall have to ask you to give some figures at the end?—Quite. Then there is the criminal lunatic asylum at Broadmoor; Poor Law institutions; private single care; and out-door relief.

66. And shall we find all the persons who are subject to lunacy laws in one or other of the institutions or places which you have enumerated?—Yes. There are also the boarded-out cases; they are not in institutions, and they are not in what is called single care. Under the provisions of Section 57, "Where application is made to the visiting committee of an asylum by any relative or friend of a pauper lunatic confined therein that he may be delivered over to the custody of such relative or friend, the committee may, upon being satisfied that the application has been approved by the guardians of the union to which the lunatic is chargeable or the local authority liable for his maintenance"—they may authorise the patient to be delivered over to the friends.

67. Now having given us the different places, could you give us figures showing the distribution of patients among those different classes of institutions or places?—Yes. On the 1st January, 1924, in county and borough mental hospitals there were 103,892; the males were 45,897, and the females 57,995—a rather larger percentage of females. In registered hospitals there were 2,139, and there the females were half as many again as the males. In the metropolitan licensed houses there were 1,187. In the provincial licensed houses there were 1,610. In the naval and military hospitals, 171; and in the criminal lunatic asylum at Broadmoor, 785. Then in Poor Law institutions, in the ordinary Poor Law institutions, there were 11,323; in the metropolitan district mental hospitals—that is, hospitals provided by the Metropolitan Asylums Board, which acts for the whole metropolis from the Poor Law point of view—there were 5,266. Then in private single care there were 417, and the number of insane people receiving out-door relief was 3,544.

68. Making a total for England and Wales?—Of 130,334.

69. Of which 57,170 were men, and 73,164 women?—Yes.

70. Now I do not find in these statistics any mention of boarded-out cases?—No.

71. They are excluded, are they?—Their names are on the books of the asylum.

72. So they will be included under the first class in these statistics—under the county and borough mental hospitals?—Yes.

73. Can you tell us, incidentally, how many boarded-out cases you have?—I am sorry to say there are very few. I say I am sorry to say that because I think it is a system that ought to be developed more. In Scotland you have a far greater percentage than we have.

74. It is very largely taken advantage of in Scotland, in the rural areas?—Yes; it has not caught on in England so much.

75. You regard the encouragement of that form of treatment as desirable?—I think it very desirable.

76. We will examine it later?—Yes, and when we come to examine it, there are one or two minor alterations of the law that ought to be made in order to facilitate it.

77. It has been impeded by the existing code?—It has to some extent. When they are boarded-out they are still on the books of the asylum, and they have to be visited by the asylum doctor. It is very inconvenient for him to have to go round to make what are called the continuation reports. At the end of a certain period a person is discharged unless a continuation medical report is made at a certain date.

78. And do you think the inconvenience attaching to the boarded-out method has discouraged its use?—Yes. We tried it in Suffolk some years ago, and it broke down on that sort of point. Of course, that was rather before motor cars were so plentiful as they are now.

79. Now I think we may, for our present purpose, rule out entirely the naval and military hospitals, and the criminal lunatic asylum?—Yes; we only go there by invitation.

80. You have been good enough to tell us of the various classes of patients and the places where we may find them. I think it would next be useful in pursuing our outline to consider how those persons reach those places, and that brings one pretty close to the subject-matter of our inquiry?—Quite. Just before we go on to that, I would like to mention the case of the voluntary boarder. A licensed house and a registered hospital receive voluntary boarders.

81. He is a person whom we should consider particularly in relation to the second part of our remit?—Yes.

82. Perhaps you would also add this, in order to complete it, that the licensed house has to some extent been discouraged, has it not? There are to be no more?—No more.

83. When was that enacted?—In the Lunacy Act of 1890.

84. So that the number of such places is now stereotyped?—Yes. As Mr. Macleod says, there is no limitation on registered hospitals; you could found a new registered hospital to-morrow.

85. But that is an institution not run for profit?—Quite.

86. But as regards institutions run for profit, Parliament has enacted that the number of those institutions shall not exceed the number in existence in 1890?—That is so.

87. If any such institution ceases, does the number diminish, or may another one be created?—No; if they have lost a licence they cannot get it back again.

88. Then are these institutions diminishing in number?—Very slightly, I think. Now and then a licence drops out.

89. Could you give us, at the same time, the number of county and borough asylums in England and Wales?—There are 99, including the Maudsley Hospital, and the Ewell Colony.

90. How many of the registered hospitals are there?—13, excluding St. Luke's, which is a registered hospital, the committee of which has gone on existing, but has very little work lately; they were recently considering plans for building a new place.

91. Then I think we may approach the question of how the different types or classes of patients reach the particular institutions; and may one take it that an essential pre-requisite of any person being detained in any institution is certification in some form or other?—Certainly, yes, followed by a reception order. It is the order that authorises the case to be taken.

92. But upon the threshold, so to speak, of our inquiry, we find this, that no person can be detained by any one of the methods or in any one of the institutions or places you have enumerated, unless a certificate of some kind has been obtained?—Quite.

93. Now shall we consider, Sir Frederick, first of all, the case of the private patient, and how the private patient reaches an institution or place of care and detention? First of all, will you tell us—and I am putting it quite colloquially for the moment—suppose any person unhappily becomes afflicted mentally, what happens to him? May I put an example quite dramatically? Suppose any person in this room suddenly lost his reason, what happens to him—what are the methods?—I think I will ask Mr. Macleod to deal with that, if you will allow him. (Mr. Macleod): I suppose the first thing that would happen would be that a medical man would be called in, and if that medical man advised that that person was of unsound mind, then a petition would have to be presented, and the petition has to be presented under Section 5 of the Lunacy Act. We are now speaking of private patients.

94. Suppose any one of us here suddenly required treatment. What happens to us?—(Mr. Macleod): If the man is dangerous, either to himself or to the public, then an urgency order could be obtained under Section 11, quite apart from the petition. That would be the first thing.

95. You would send for a doctor?—You would send for a doctor, and the doctor would come in and ask him some questions. Perhaps the man might be violent, and if the doctor thought he was in a dangerous state, he would then advise that an urgency order should be obtained. The urgency order would be obtained, and could be signed by the husband or wife of the alleged lunatic, and if it is not signed by the husband or wife, the order has to contain a statement of the reasons why the same is not so signed. The doctor would sign a certificate saying that the person was of unsound mind, that he was dangerous to himself or to the public, and upon that the patient could be sent to an institution with which arrangements have been made before, and there he could be detained for seven days.

96. That is the emergency procedure applicable to the private person?—Yes. Supposing it is not an emergency case, but a case of an ordinary petition, then the medical man would be called in, and if he advised that the person was of unsound mind, he might say, "Well, I should think you ought to send this person to some institution."

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

97. If you take it as an unhappy incident of family life, a member of a household may be observed to be suffering mentally; a medical practitioner is called in, and he may observe that the case shows mental features?—Yes, and if he advises that the patient is a proper person to be sent for care to some institution, the relatives would look round, and find out a suitable place—what the cost of it was; and where they should send him—and if they make arrangements a petition must be presented accompanied by a statement of particulars and by two medical certificates. If the petition is not signed by a relative, then you have to state why it is not so signed. Sometimes, of course, a person becomes insane when he is not in close touch with his own relations, and then somebody else has to present the petition.

98. I am again putting it quite colloquially. In the case of an ordinary illness occurring in a household or anywhere else, the patient is generally able to take some part in considering what is the place he would like to be sent to, and so on.—May or may not.

99. It depends upon the nature of the illness, of course. But the feature of mental illness is that by its attack upon the citadel of reason it precludes the patient generally from dealing rationally with his own case?—Quite so.

100. And therefore to some extent, indeed to a large extent, he must be dealt with by others?—Yes, by his friends or relatives.

101. In the ordinary case of illness the patient is able to take a considerable part, generally, in his own disposal?—Quite.

102. But is the unhappy feature of mental illness that the patient is disabled by the very character of his illness from participating rationally in his own disposal?—Quite.

103. That is a feature one must always bear in mind?—No doubt.

104. You have told us of the two methods by which the private patient may reach an institution?—Yes.

105. The urgency order is applicable to the emergency case, but expires in seven days?—Yes, or it can go on if a petition is presented, until an order is made upon the petition.

106. Until the petition is disposed of?—Yes.

107. Does it in the meantime ensure that the person is protected from himself, and that the public are protected from that person?—It does.

108. If no petition is presented within a period of seven days, the person must be released, I suppose?—He is discharged.

109. The urgency order requires one medical certificate?—Yes, one medical certificate.

110. Then, on the other hand, the more formal procedure by petition requires, does it not, the support of two medical certificates?—Yes.

111. To whom is that petition presented?—It is presented to the person who is called the judicial authority. The judicial authority is a member of the justices selected at certain Quarter Sessions in each county every year for the purpose of performing these duties, or a judge of county courts or magistrate.

112. "Judicial Authority" is a general term. Of course, it embraces any judicial authority having power under the Statute?—Yes, but there is a difference, Sir. There is a judicial authority who deals with petitions and the ordinary justice who has ordinary jurisdiction as to lunacy, but the judicial authority is a person specially appointed.

113. And really is the certifying authority?—He is the one who makes the order on the certificates of the medical men.

114. Is that jurisdiction of making orders confined to the justices specially appointed?—Oh, no. The judicial authority only can make the order in certain cases. The judicial authority has general jurisdiction everywhere. The ordinary justice for the purpose of pauper patients under Sections 14 and 16, only has jurisdiction over the place where the alleged lunatic resides.

115. The petition or application which has to be made to a judicial authority with a view to an order being pronounced, may be made to any judicial authority?—Yes. That judicial authority is described under Section 9 of the Act. He is a person to whom a petition must be presented. "The powers of the judicial authority under this Act shall be exercised by a justice of the peace specially appointed as hereinafter provided, or a judge of county courts, or magistrate."

116. So that any justice of the peace specially appointed in the manner provided, or any county court judge, or any stipendiary magistrate, can act as the judicial authority?—Yes, in the matter of private patients on petition.

117. Are the county court judges resorted to at all for this purpose?—I think in very few cases.

118. Are the magistrates?—It is nearly always an order made by the judicial authority; sometimes in London the metropolitan magistrates, and in the country stipendiary magistrates; but as a rule it is a justice of the peace specially appointed. You see under Section 10 how they are appointed.

119. What is the distinction between a magistrate and a justice of the peace?—After all, the justice of the peace is a magistrate?—Yes, but you see the Act says that petitions must be presented to a judicial authority in regard to private patients. An ordinary magistrate can make no order in respect of private patients on petition. (Sir Frederick Willis): "Magistrate" there means a stipendiary magistrate. It is defined under Section 341. (Mr. Macleod): I am afraid I did not follow what your point was. They call the others justices really.

120. But the great majority of the orders are pronounced by the judicial authority, that is, the justice of the peace specially appointed?—That is so, (Sir Frederick Willis): And there is a special part of this Section 9, which says, "A judge of county courts and magistrate shall not be required to exercise any powers under this Act so as to interfere with or delay the exercise of his ordinary jurisdiction."

121. So it is contemplated that resort to the county court judge or magistrate is unusual?—Quite. (Mr. Macleod): It is nearly always a judicial authority.

122. Now the application or petition, having reached the judicial authority as you have described, what does he do upon that?—He proceeds then as laid down in Section 6. He considers the allegations in the petition and statement of particulars and the evidence of lunacy appearing with the medical certificates, and whether it is necessary for him to see the patient personally or not. In the case of private patients it is not necessary that the judicial authority should see the patients. In the case of pauper patients, under Sections 14 and 16 he must see the patient.

123. So that in the case of the private patient, the judicial authority examines the papers before him, and is entitled, if he likes, to say that he wishes to see the patient before making an order?—Yes, and then he can visit the patient if he likes, under Section 6, Sub-section 2.

124. He may dispose of the petition without any visit?—He can make the order without seeing the patient at all if he likes; but I should point out that that is subject to the provisions of Section 8 of the Act; a safeguard comes in there.

125. Let us take it in order. If the papers before him appear to be satisfactory and conclusive, then without actually seeing the patient he may pronounce the order?—He may pronounce the order.

126. If, on the other hand, there is any circumstance disclosed by the papers which invites enquiry, he may visit the patient before making any order?—Yes.

127. Then the proceedings on the consideration of the petition are taken in private, are they not?—Yes, they are taken in private; it is specially provided in the Section.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

128. Then again, is there a certain safeguard introduced in that a person nominated by the alleged lunatic as his friend can be admitted to the proceedings?—Yes; that is Section 6, Sub-section 3: "The petition shall be considered in private, and no one except the petitioner, the alleged lunatic (unless the judicial authority shall in his discretion otherwise order), any one person appointed by the alleged lunatic for that purpose, and the persons signing the medical certificates accompanying the petition shall, without the leave of the judicial authority, be present at the consideration thereof."

129. So that apart from the persons applying for the order, the person in respect of whom the application is made is entitled to have some independent person of his own selection present during the proceedings?—He is.

130. If the judicial authority is not quite satisfied that a case is made out, either on the papers by themselves or after a visit, he then dismisses the petition, I suppose?—He can either dismiss it or adjourn it for further consideration.

131. And then, if the petition is dismissed, the applicant or petitioner is entitled to have a statement of the reasons for its dismissal supplied to him?—Yes. Section 7 says: "If the petition be dismissed, the judicial authority shall deliver to the petitioner a statement in writing under his hand of his reasons for dismissing the same." At the same time he sends a copy of such statement to the Commissioners, and if the lunatic is detained under an urgency order he has to send notice by post or otherwise to the person in whose charge the alleged lunatic is, so that he will no longer be detained under the urgency order.

132. Then if the judicial authority either makes or refuses a reception order on such an application, is the Board of Control entitled to require any information it desires?—Under Sub-section 2 of Section 7.

133. Is the Board of Control notified of what the judicial authority has done by the machinery of the Acts?—Yes.

134. Then on being apprised of how a particular application has been disposed of, the Board of Control may proceed to its own independent investigations?—Yes, we can. Perhaps I should say here that if a second petition is presented under Sub-section 4, these facts have to be stated on the second petition, so that there is that further protection.

135. So that the history of the case must be disclosed?—The whole history must be disclosed.

136. In the event of the patient not having been seen by the judicial authority, does the Statute provide a special safeguard?—Section 8 provides the special safeguard.

137. What is it?—Perhaps I had better be exact and read it: "When a lunatic has been received as a private patient under an order of a judicial authority without a statement in the order that the patient has been personally seen by such judicial authority, the patient shall have the right to be taken before or visited by a judicial authority, other than the judicial authority who made the order, unless the medical officer of the institution, or, in the case of a single patient, his medical attendant, within twenty-four hours after reception, in a certificate signed and sent to the Commissioners, states that the exercise of such right would be prejudicial to the patient."

138. Now, does that provide for really a second judicial consideration in the event of the patient not having been seen by the judicial authority who made the order?—Certainly, because it must be by a judicial authority other than the one who made the order.

139. Now, as regards the material presented to the judicial authority in considering an application, what must he have before him in addition to the actual application? I want to get the material that the judicial authority has before him in pronouncing the order. There must be an application containing a statement of particulars?—Yes.

140. Signed by husband or wife or relative or some other person, whose intervention is explained by that other person?—Yes.

141. Then, is the other vital matter the medical certificates?—Yes, the two medical certificates.

142. Will you now tell us who makes those certificates?—A qualified medical man, and he makes them under the terms of the Section which provides how those certificates have to be made.

143. They are very important. I am to take it that those two medical certificates really represent the evidence upon which the order is pronounced, where the judicial authority does not see the patient?—That is so. The Section is Section 28: (1) "Every medical certificate under this Act shall be made and signed by a medical practitioner. (2) Every medical certificate upon which a reception order is founded shall state the facts upon which the certifying medical practitioner has formed his opinion that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic, distinguishing facts observed by himself from facts communicated by others; and a reception order shall not be made upon a certificate founded only upon facts communicated by others. (3) The medical certificate accompanying an urgency order shall contain a statement that it is expedient for the welfare of the alleged lunatic or for the public safety that he should be forthwith placed under care and treatment, with the reasons for such statement." Then Section 29 is a further protection, namely, that "A reception order shall not be made unless the medical practitioner who signs the medical certificate, or where two certificates are required, each medical practitioner who signs a certificate has personally examined the alleged lunatic in the case of an order upon petition not more than seven clear days before the date of the presentation of the petition, and in all other cases not more than seven clear days before the date of the order. (2) Where two medical certificates are required, a reception order shall not be made unless each medical practitioner signing a certificate has examined the alleged lunatic separately from the other."

144. Now, the medical practitioners who furnish those certificates first of all must be independent, I understand, of the applicants?—Yes. If you would look at Section 32, that prescribes it.

145. Section 30 also deals with it?—Yes; that deals with it too.

146. We are anxious to bring out the qualifications of the medical practitioners to act. They must not be related to the applicant?—That is what it comes to practically; they must be independent people.

147. Secondly, must they make their examination of the patient independently of each other?—Separately.

148. And must they so state?—Yes.

149. Then must their examination have been a recent examination?—Yes "not more than seven clear days before the date of the presentation of the petition and in all other cases not more than seven clear days before the date of the order."

150. So that the certificate must be given by an independent person; it must be a recent certificate, and it must be the result of an examination conducted independently by the observer?—Yes.

151. And must it further state the grounds upon which the conclusions have been reached?—Yes; both facts observed by himself as distinct from facts communicated by others, and no order can be made simply upon facts communicated by others.

152. Are these statutory provisions designed to secure that the medical certificate which is the evidence on which the judicial authority proceeds, shall be as independent and as complete as possible?—That is the policy of the Act.

153. And must the certificates, in order that an application may be granted, show that the facts upon which the medical practitioner proceeds, include facts which have come under his own personal observation, warranting the conclusion he has reached?—They must. I do not know whether this would be a favourable opportunity to introduce this to show what is actually done. A copy of those documents is sent to us at the office. All those documents are carefully inspected by experienced clerks, and then they are further inspected afterwards by the Commissioner on duty for the day and by the Secretary.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

154. Now just pause there for a moment. We are looking at it from the approach of the judicial authority to the matter. We now have before us how the case has been presented to him, the application presented by the appropriate person; the statement of particulars, and the two medical certificates, the features of which you have described. Upon that material the judicial authority can proceed?—He can proceed.

155. But if that material discloses to him any circumstances which he wishes to examine further, he can adjourn the proceedings and get additional information?—He can adjourn for 14 days.

156. Or, if he thinks it proper, he can require the attendance of the patient himself?—He can visit the patient.

157. And you have told us the safeguard which exists in the case where the patient has not been visited?—That is so.

158. If everything is in order to the satisfaction of the judicial authority, then an order for the detention of the patient will be made, I take it?—An order for the reception of the patient will be made.

159. In a particular institution?—Yes, arranged by the relatives.

160. And designated in the order?—Yes.

161. Now will you deal with the point you were making. These papers, which are what one may call the vouchers of the proceedings, reach the Board of Control within what time?—Perhaps I had better point out the Rule; it is under the Commissioners' Rules, 1895, Rule 8, Sub-section 3. There is one slight omission I made which shows a further protection. In the case of a private patient one of the certifying doctors has to be the usual medical attendant, and that has to be stated. Sometimes the medical man is away on a holiday, or perhaps the patient has never had a medical attendant.

162. We will reserve the latter point if you please, for a moment. That material which the judicial authority has proceeded upon in pronouncing the order, is required to be transmitted to the Board of Control within the specified short period?—That is so.

163. When that material reaches the Board of Control is it subjected to a careful scrutiny?—It is.

164. With what object?—With the object of seeing that all the papers are in order.

165. And, as you have just told us, responsible officials scrutinise the papers?—Very carefully.

166. Do you find as the result of the scrutiny that the papers are sometimes defective?—At times they are.

167. Does that frequently occur?—No, I should say not.

168. What are the defects which have been observed on such a scrutiny?—Sometimes the medical certificates are not as we think they ought to be; there is not a sufficient statement of facts observed by the certifying medical man himself. A certificate has been made on what appears to us to be really facts which he has had communicated to him by others; and if we are not satisfied with that the papers are sent back, and if they cannot be amended, then of course the order will go.

169. Is your criticism both as to form and as to substance?—Yes, both.

170. In such cases as call for your observations, is the defect which you have encountered generally a defect in the nature of the information upon which the doctor has proceeded?—I think so, and sometimes we think that the facts which he alleges, which have led him to come to the conclusion that the person is a person of unsound mind, and a person to be kept under care and treatment, do not justify that conclusion.

171. Now does that occur in any substantial number of cases?—I should say not; there are some, but they are few.

172. They are few and far between?—They are few.

173. When such a case occurs and your examiner is not satisfied, does he report to one of the members of the Board of Control?—Shall I tell you exactly what the practice of the office is?

174. If you please.—These documents first of all go before some experienced clerk; he goes through them all, and if he thinks there is something wrong he marks them opposite the part of the order or the certificate which he thinks is not correct. Those marked admission documents go before the Secretary. All the others that he has not marked go before the Commissioner on duty for the day. If the Secretary, in considering those marked admissions wants the advice of the Commissioner, he comes in and sees the Commissioner in the adjoining room and talks the matter over with him; they are dealt with by the Secretary and the Commissioner on duty for the day. It may be that we think some amendment is necessary, or that the facts alleged by the medical man as enabling him to come to the conclusion that the patient is a lunatic, do not justify that conclusion. They are sent back, and if those are not amended so as to satisfy us, then of course we say the order is bad. Now those that are unmarked, and to which no special attention has been drawn by the experienced clerk who has to go through them, go before the Commissioner on duty for the day, and he examines every one of them after the clerk has done it, so that they are doubly examined. If the Commissioner thinks they are not quite as they should be, then he takes steps to see that they are put in order, or, if they cannot be put in order, that the order should lapse.

175. It seems to me that the scrutiny is of very great importance. Of course we have a large number of judicial authorities throughout the country considering those applications, I suppose?—Yes, no doubt.

176. And those judicial authorities will be of varying competence, I suppose?—Quite.

177. Could you give us any idea of the extent of this routine business—I mean how many such sets of papers would have to be considered in a day or a week, at the office?—They are brought in to us in baskets; the baskets are piled that high (describing). Some days there are more than others, but there are numbers—I could get you the exact number.

178. I merely wanted to get an idea of the office routine.—There are large numbers daily. (Sir Frederick Willis): There are approximately 30,000 new admission documents every year, besides a large number of other documents. (Mr. Macleod): All the documents are examined in the same way; there is no distinction made as to the examination of the documents as between private patients and pauper patients.

179. If there are 30,000 a year there must be, allowing for Sundays, about 100 a day to consider?—I dare say there are more than that sometimes.

180. Out of those that come in, could you give us any idea of the number that are specially referred by your scrutineer to the Secretary?—I should think perhaps between a dozen and 20 a day.

181. It is a comparatively large proportion.—But some of those are mere technical things—e.g., that the judicial authority has not been described rightly; but I should say the number of cases in which the certificates are not in order is very small.

182. That seems to me a vital matter. You must keep the procedure on the rails properly and draw attention to such informalities.—I should think that if I put it at one to three a day which really want any substantial amendment, that is about the average.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

183. Possibly from one to three in a day call for substantive criticism as distinguished from criticism of form?—I should think that is about right.

184. Perhaps you would have that looked into, would you?—Certainly. (Sir Frederick Willis): I have often gone through these papers and not found one in a day. I have had a lot marked because they had spelt a name wrongly, or put a date wrongly.

185. It is the point of substance we are concerned with.—(Mr. Macleod): We will get the actual numbers as far as we can.—(Sir Frederick Willis): I very much doubt if we can give you the number of documents which are sent back because there is something substantially wrong with them. We could keep watch for a fortnight or a month and see how many we got.

186. I would rather like a typical week to be taken by you, and during that week you might see in how many cases the papers which have been before the judicial authority and are now scrutinised in your office show some defect of substance, as distinguished from a mere technicality which does not affect the order.—(Mr. Macleod): I think you will find they are very small. (Sir Frederick Willis): *We will do it for a month.

187. In making that investigation I do not think it will be necessary to distinguish between private and pauper patients for this purpose.—(Mr. Macleod): If you please.

188. Now suppose we have such a case as you have figured, first of all the scrutineer, then the Secretary and then the Commissioner being of opinion that the material before the judicial authority was in some respect defective: what is the practical step you take upon that state of matters?—The papers are sent back.

189. To whom?—To the superintendent of the institution where the patient is.

190. The patient is now in the institution, of course?—Yes.

191. What happens to them?—Section 34 gives us the powers we have: "If an order or certificate for the reception of a lunatic is, after such reception, found to be in any respect incorrect or defective, such order or certificate may, within fourteen days next after such reception, be amended by the person who signed the same."

192. What I wanted to know was how it reached the person who had signed the same. It has been found defective in your office. Then you tell us it is sent back to the superintendent of the institution where the patient is.—Yes; "No amendment shall be allowed unless the same receives the sanction of the Commissioners, or of some one of them, and (in the case of a private patient) the consent of the judicial authority by whom the order for the reception of the lunatic may have been signed."

193. The class of amendment that is contemplated there would be, I suppose, really further and better particulars in the medical certificate?—Something of that sort, yes.

194. In practice would the doctor's defective certificate be sent to him again in order that he might amplify it?—That would be the practice.

195. And would he have an opportunity if he desired, of seeing the patient again?—He could see the patient, certainly. You see Sub-section 2 says: "If the Commissioners deem any such certificate to be incorrect or defective, they may, by a direction in writing, addressed to the manager of the institution for lunatics, or to the person having the charge of a single patient, require the same to be amended by the person who signed the same, and if the same be not duly amended to their satisfaction within 14 days next after the reception of the patient, the Commissioners, or any two of them, may, if they think fit, make an order for the patient's discharge."

196. Yes, but that seems to contemplate the amendment by the person who signed the same, that is the doctor?—Yes, that is the medical man.

197. Now suppose that what is wanting in his certificate is a sufficiency of facts personally observed by him, would he be entitled to see the patient again for the purpose of amplifying that information?—Yes.

198. I mean it is not merely an amplification of the statement of what he had previously observed but further observation?—I should think probably it would be an amplification of what he had observed previously.

199. The two things are different?—Quite.

200. Is it an amplification of his account of what he formerly saw, or must he obtain new facts?—He could go and see the patient again if he liked, but he could not state any facts observed after the appropriate date.

201. Then what you really get on amendment is an amplification of the account of what the medical practitioner observed?—That is really what it comes to. (Sir Frederick Willis): Doctor Bond would like to say something upon that. (Dr. Bond): Very often some medical men find the giving of certificates for mental disorder, especially those who do not have to do it frequently, a matter of great difficulty, and when we come to peruse their certificates, often it is quite doubtful in our minds whether the symptoms were observed at all at the time the examination is required by Statute. I mean, often in the few cases that my colleague cited. I am not using the word "often" higher than he has used it. They are so worded that a person like one of us cannot make out from the certificate whether he observed the symptoms at the time. That is quite a common reason why we return the certificate. Another reason is because, although it is clear that what he has written down is the result of what he did observe at the time, yet really to us, away from the patient in that detached position, the words do not indicate necessarily unsoundness of mind. Of course, at the head of the certificate is the governing and important point that he has already stated in the plainest English that "I hereby certify that" so and so "is of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of for care and treatment." That governs the whole thing; but when we come to scrutinise his evidence, it happens that we do not see that the words he has used do indicate necessarily unsoundness of mind. We send it back, and it is marked down on the side with a rubber stamp to ask him, "Was this observed really at the time of examination? Cannot this be amplified?"

202. Dr. Bond, are there forms prescribed for the medical certificate?—Eight and nine. Eight is the real one.

203. Is the form so framed as to elicit from an ordinary and intelligent practitioner the material that you desire?—Yes, that one can say unhesitatingly. There is a governing certificate which I have given you from memory. After that, opportunity is given for expressing the grounds on which he formed the medical opinion, and those grounds are divided into two classes. One of those is the facts indicating insanity observed by himself at the time of examination, and there is a special section in the Act which states that no certificate shall be acted upon for the purposes of an order except founded at least in part upon facts observed at the time of the examination; so that if that portion of the certificate is weak in our minds, or inconclusive, that is the more important consideration in our mind. The other class of facts are facts communicated by others. Then there is a third class which, if I am not out of order in alluding to it, has a printed paragraph to itself in certificates under the Mental Deficiency Act, but which is only provided in the margin of the Lunacy Acts forms, where it says that if the same or other facts were observed previous to the time of the examination, the certifier is at liberty to subjoin them in a separate paragraph; but unless he has filled in this first paragraph: "facts indicating insanity observed by myself at the time of examination," to our satisfaction, this will not in the long run hold good.

* See Appendix II.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

204. Now is the special scrutiny in the Board's office directed to those facts stated to have been observed by the certifier at the time of the examination?—Our scrutiny is directed truly to the whole certificate, but I think you are quite right that accent in our mind is placed on that paragraph.

205. And whether the facts there set out warrant the general conclusion to which the certifier has arrived?—Yes; but so long as there are facts indicating insanity at the time of examination, although they may not be as strong as we are accustomed to find in that paragraph, there are certain types of cases (I could give some illustrations) the difficulties of which we know, where we certainly look to the next paragraph: "facts communicated by others"; and are guided as reasonable beings in our action.

206. Now in the criticism of those filled-in forms which reach you after an order has been pronounced, are they subjected always to examination by a Medical Commissioner?—Oh, no. My colleagues will correct me if I am wrong, but I think I am quite safe in saying that if any very purely medical point arises out of this, if it is one of the Legal Commissioners, he gets hold as quickly as possible of his most available medical colleague, and vice versa. We may be looking at something which does not seem to be altogether clear to us, and we medical members of the Board go to the Chairman, who is always there, or to the legal members of the Board; we work together.

207. Have you a rota of attendance? Mr. Macleod spoke of the Commissioner of the day. Is there a particular Commissioner on duty?—I do not know whether "Rota" is the word to use, but it is arranged for the year. At the beginning of the year we depute as a rule two of ourselves to avoid wastage of time of the whole Board, to put a programme before the Board for the whole year, to cover the whole of the work required by the Statutes, and divide it up among ourselves.

208. As the duties imposed upon you require, I take it, visitation of premises away from London, the result is that you have to make a programme?—We do make a programme.

209. But then may the Commissioner in attendance for the day be either one of legal qualifications or one of medical qualifications?—Yes. (Mr. Macleod): There is a card which will show you how it is worked out. (Handing in the same.) (Dr. Bond): The Commissioner on duty for the day might be more accurately described as two Commissioners. They are both on duty every day, but for practical purposes we do not find it absolutely necessary. We can keep in touch. For instance, Mr. Macleod may be on duty and I may be profitably doing an inspection in London or elsewhere, and he knows where I am. (Sir Frederick Willis): The short point is this: I am there practically every day and one of the other Commissioners. If I or a Legal Commissioner have a medical question turning up, we should ask a Medical Commissioner to come and see about it.

210. Would every case of insufficiency of the medical certificate come before you?—Not before me necessarily. As a routine matter it would go to the Commissioner on duty.

211. Would a difficult case come before you—suppose there were a border-line case?—A case involving some question of policy or of principle they would bring to me, and we should discuss it together.

212. Have you any suggestion to make, Dr. Bond, as to whether Form 8 is a successful form in eliciting the material you require?—(Dr. Bond): I think that the form can be said definitely to be successful. I have some suggestions in my mind, but with your permission I would very much rather be allowed a later opportunity of stating them; I would like them to germinate a little longer.

213. Quite. I think that is a matter we shall have to consider later. The British public has been well educated in filling up forms of all sorts?—I think I can say it is definitely successful, yes. If there is a difficulty about it, and I say this with every possible respect to my medical confreres in the profession, it is, that medical men in their medical education have not always grasped some of the essentials of the certificate, and when they are new to it evidently some of them find a difficulty in setting out the case properly; although a case undoubtedly needs care and treatment and detention, they have difficulty in framing the words; but that has nothing to do with the form.

214. One is not surprised at that, because it is often very difficult to get a clear and satisfactory proof out of a witness?—I am sure that the matter I have mentioned, and I have mentioned it with diffidence, is improving. Education in this matter is going ahead, especially since some of the medical bodies have established diplomas in psychological medicine; the subject is receiving much better attention, and you see that reflected in the certificates.

215. I think this is rather an important point, and therefore I have explored it a little fully. We have now got the reception order which has been pronounced upon consideration of the material in question. A scrutiny of the material has been made by the Board of Control, and everything is found to be in order. What is the next stage at which you intervene in the history of that case; when do you next hear of it?—(Sir Frederick Willis): We have got to get a medical statement; that is made by the head of the institution.

216. That is the next stage at which you come into contact with the case?—Yes.

217. Is that the statement which is made by the person who has received the patient?—(Mr. Macleod): Yes, by the medical superintendent of the institution or the medical attendant of the single patient.

218. Just tell us about that step. When is that sent to you?—Within a week. It is described in Rule 8, Subsection 3: "After the second and before the end of the seventh day after the patient's admission, send to the Commissioners a notice of admission, and also copies of the reception order and of the medical certificate or certificates upon which the same was made, and in the case of reception orders upon petition, copies of the petition and statement of particulars; and shall, in every case after the second and before the end of the seventh clear day after the patient's admission, send to the Commissioners a medical statement to be made and signed by the medical officer of the institution."

219. What are the contents of that medical statement which are sent in to you after the reception of the patient?—(Dr. Bond): The statement is a description of the mental and bodily condition of the patient.

220. This is the statement which you have sent to you practically at once?—Yes; it is a statement of the mental and bodily condition of the patient. The medical man who makes it does not give a certificate in the statement of insanity; he describes the mental and bodily condition of the patient.

221. Is there a form on which that is done?—Yes, there is a form. He may or may not make a diagnosis; we do not ask for it.

222. Or a prognosis?—No. Sometimes he does, but of course a prognosis at the end of a week is an extremely rash thing to make, and you may say it never is made except he happens to give a diagnosis, which itself carries with it a prognosis; but apart from that there is no prognosis.

223. It is a description of the case; he has had it under observation from its admission?—Yes. There is a small practical point that apart from being a description of the case, the bodily condition should state any marks whatever of injury to the patient, and you will readily understand that in an excited case in removal from a home to the institution, or in what has been going on at home, perhaps before full care was obtained, or in the removal from one institution to another, sometimes injuries do occur; they are something usually of a trivial nature, but if they do occur those evidences of injury should be stated in the bodily condition. However trivial a point may be, our scrutineer always draws our attention to it, in case it should escape the Commissioners' observation, and we exercise our discretion as to what further enquiry we make as to those injuries.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

224. Does that statement proceed upon an examination by the medical superintendent or the medical attendant of the case on admission?—(Sir Frederick Willis): I think I may read the form. It says, "I have this day seen and examined" So-and-so, "admitted into this asylum on the" so-and-so, "and hereby certify that with respect to mental state he"—then describing it—"and with respect to bodily condition he" is so-and-so.

225. As I say, it is a description of the case?—That is all it is.

226. Now when that document is received by your Board, what is done with it?—It is seen and examined by a Commissioner and if, perchance, the medical officer said, "I do not think this case shows real signs of insanity," we should make further enquiry into that. That very very rarely happens, but anyhow it is examined by a Commissioner.

227. Reverting for a moment to a topic we were dealing with before, in the event of the medical certificates not being amended to the satisfaction of the Board, and the Board being of opinion that the certificates are inadequate, do you then direct the discharge of the patient?—We should tell the medical superintendent that the case should be discharged. We have got power to make an order discharging the case. We ordinarily do that by telling the superintendent that the documents are invalid, there is a fatal defect in them; we cannot accept them, and that the case should be discharged, and it is discharged.

228. On the ground that there is not sufficient material before you to justify the continued detention of the patient?—Yes; but I would like to say that that very very rarely happens.

229. Again you might help us upon that point by telling us how often you have had that experience, that after affording an opportunity for amendment, you have nevertheless found the justification for detention is inadequate, and you have had either directly to order the discharge, or have had to direct the superintendent or medical attendant to see to the discharge of the patient. How often do you think that occurs?—I should think it does not occur once a year, but we will carefully watch during the next month or two months and see exactly what points are arising, how many of each I mean, and so on.

230. It is rather instructive to know when, so to speak, the cases are found out under it and how often it happens?—Yes, quite. They are very very carefully scrutinised. I think myself there is too much time spent on them rather than too little.

231. Now you have just said with regard to this information received in Form 10 of the Commissioners' Rules, after the reception, that the case is again considered?—Yes.

232. And still more rarely, I gather from you, upon such consideration the case has been considered to be an unsuitable one for detention?—I am personally not aware of any case.

233. But at any rate, at that stage there is further consideration of the case?—There is, yes.

234. And will this form then be filed away with a record of the case?—Yes, upon the patient's file.

235. Now up to this point the procedure that you have outlined is the procedure applicable to private patients. I take it?—(Mr. Macleod): That is so.

236. What divergencies from that procedure are there in the case of the rate-aided patient?—In the case of the rate-aided patient there is no petition.

237. What initiates the proceedings?—I should draw your attention to the Sections just to tell you which they are. They are Sections 14, 15 and 16, which refer to what are called summary reception orders, which are reception orders made in the case of rate-aided patients. Section 13 is not "pauper"; I was going to deal with that afterwards.

238. Just give it us in your own order, but I wanted to get a clear conception of how the rate-aided patient reaches an institution for treatment?—The rate-aided patients are dealt with in Sections 14, 15 and 16.

239. Where is the rate-aided patient to be found—where does he come from?—Supposing a working man or a mechanic in a village or in a town suddenly shows signs of mental disorder, probably a doctor is called in; it would now be a panel doctor; in the days of the Act of 1890 probably it would be the medical officer of the Union. If the medical officer of the Union has knowledge that he is a pauper resident within the district, who is alleged to be a lunatic, or if the relieving officer or overseer have that knowledge, then it is his duty to give notice to the justice within a specified time of that state of facts.

240. Then the existence of this case may reach the authorities either through the friends and relatives of the unfortunate person informing their medical attendant or panel doctor, or through a local official obtaining knowledge that such a case exists in his district?—Yes; it is the local official, either a medical officer or relieving officer or overseer, whose duty it is to give notice to a justice of the alleged lunatic within a certain time. That is the initiation, and when the justice has this notice given to him, then he has to order the lunatic to be brought before him.

241. Is that justice not necessarily the judicial authority?—No; any justice having jurisdiction in the place where the lunatic is resident.

241A. He is apprised of this state of affairs. What happens next?—Under Sub-section 3 of Section 14, just to take it generally, "A justice, upon receiving such notice, shall by order require the relieving officer or overseer giving the notice, to bring the alleged lunatic before him or some other justice having jurisdiction in the place where the pauper resides at such time and place within three days from the time of the notice to the justice as shall be appointed by the order."

242. Now one is struck at once with this: In this procedure the patient is brought face to face with a magistrate at once?—Yes; that is the distinction I drew before, that in the case of a private patient it is not necessary; in the case of a rate-aided patient the magistrate must see the patient.

243. What happens next?—Then the justice before whom a pauper alleged to be a lunatic, or an alleged lunatic wandering at large, is brought shall call in a medical practitioner whom he may select—he can call in anybody—"and shall examine the alleged lunatic and make such inquiries as he thinks advisable, and if upon such examination or other proof the justice is satisfied in the first mentioned case that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic and a proper person to be detained, and, in the secondly mentioned case, that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic and was wandering at large, and is a proper person to be detained, and if in each of the foregoing cases the medical practitioner who has been called in signs a medical certificate with regard to the lunatic, the justice may by order direct the lunatic to be received and detained in the institution for lunatics named in the order." So that when the justice sees the lunatic he calls in a medical man, the medical man, if he can, signs a certificate, and the justice after examining the lunatic and seeing the medical certificate, and making such other inquiries, can, if he is satisfied, make an order sending him to one of the public institutions.

244. Now it strikes one that the difference in procedure in the two cases resides chiefly in the imperative confrontation of the lunatic with the magistrate and the single certificate in the pauper case as contrasted with the optional visitation and the two certificates in the private case. Are those the cardinal distinctions?—They are.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

245. And there is the further feature that the justice dealing with the private patient's application is a selected justice, and in this case it may be any justice having jurisdiction in the place?—Yes.

246. The initiation is not taken in this case by a relative?—No; it is taken by an official.

247. Mr. Mackinnon: In practice it is very often taken by a relative?—The relative may inform the overseer.

248. Chairman: The person before the justice as the applicant is an official in this case?—Yes.

249. How do you think the adequacy of the safeguards at this stage compares in the two instances, practically?—I think the experience of the Board is that we are satisfied that the safeguards are sufficient. The two things are different. A private patient, I suppose, is apparently protected more than the ordinary rate-aided patient, by having the petition, the judicial authority, and the two certificates, because it might be said that there were friends who were interested in sending a patient away, shutting him up and taking his liberty from him, and that in most of those cases the patient was being sent to an institution which was run for profit. In the case of the rate-aided patient there is no person at all who is interested really in sending him away and depriving him of his liberty, because if the wife sends him, she loses her wage earner, and if he is sent to a public institution and detained there, he is sent there at the cost of the ratepayers; so that it is really to everybody's interest that a person in that position should not be detained longer than is necessary.

250. Any person who is so detained becomes a charge upon public money?—Yes.

A Member of the Public: I should like to be informed whether any person who objects to this summary procedure has any locus standi in the matter.

251. Chairman: I think at this stage the Commissioners must conduct the examination themselves. We are endeavouring to ascertain a statement of the law as it exists. Opportunities of criticism will be afforded later. (To the Witness): Then having got in each of those cases the preliminary material which issues in an order; in the case of the rate-aided patient who, in consequence of the order you have described, is now in the institution, do you receive also the material upon which the justice has proceeded in pronouncing his order?—Everything; all the documents are scrutinised in an exactly similar manner.

252. Do you obtain in his case also a report within a short period?—Within the same period, as to his mental and physical condition.

253. So that after reception in the institution the procedure seems to be on parallel lines?—Up to that point, yes.

254. Having brought ourselves abreast of the two cases, let us take up the private patients again. When do you next come into contact with them?—Perhaps before you go back to private patients, there is another aspect under Section 13, which is, as it were, rather between the two. That is the case of a person who is not a pauper and not wandering at large. Section 14 deals with an ordinary alleged lunatic. Section 15 deals with a lunatic wandering at large, and there are rate-aided patients with regard to whom a justice makes an order under Section 16. Then, apart from that, there is Section 13: "Every constable, relieving officer, and overseer of a parish, who has knowledge that any person within the district or parish of the constable, relieving officer, or overseer, who is not a pauper and not wandering at large, is deemed to be a lunatic and is not under proper care and control, or is cruelly treated or neglected by any relative or other person having the care or charge of him, shall within three days after obtaining such knowledge give information thereof upon oath to a justice being a judicial authority under this Act." So that if the person, as to whom information has been received that he is an alleged lunatic, is not a pauper and is not wandering at large, then one of these public officials has to lay information upon oath and lay it before a judicial authority with regard to that person, and then the justice takes the steps set out in Section 13, Subsection 2.

255. I am not sure that I have got quite clear in my mind the distinction between this person and the other cases. He is a person who is not a pauper and is not wandering at large?—Yes.

256. And nobody has taken any steps to protect him?—No, nobody; and you see from the Section he is "deemed to be a lunatic and is not under proper care and control, or is cruelly treated."

257. How would a relieving officer come to have knowledge of such a case?—Information is given to him by somebody; one does not quite know how he gets it. (Sir Frederick Willis): It may be given by a relative. (Mr. Macleod): Just in the same way as in the other cases.

258. And the condition of this Section operating is that the person who is not a pauper and is not wandering at large, is deemed to be a lunatic?—Yes.

259. And is not under proper care and control, or is cruelly treated and neglected. In that case the initiative is taken by one of those officials?—Yes, by information on oath.

260. Is this class of case of frequent occurrence?—Yes, there are a good many of those cases. Then the information has to be laid before the judicial authority and the judicial authority then calls in the medical practitioner; and there are two medical certificates in that case. (Sir Frederick Willis): Dr. Bond has made some rather careful inquiries as to the working of this particular Section in Cardiff and in other places.

261. I would like to understand this particular class of case as contrasted with the other two. One would like to have a clear idea about it. Perhaps, Dr. Bond, can help us?—(Dr. Bond): Cardiff happens to come into my mind at the moment, and in that particular case the great majority of patients find their way into the public institution of that city under Section 13. I do know a little of the working of the individual cases in the city, having inquired into them. There, so far as I know the facts, when a person not in affluent circumstances is mentally ill, the relative or the doctor of that patient communicates the fact to the relieving officer, and the proceedings are taken under this section. Two certificates are made out in connection with the patient: one by the doctor, if there be one, a panel doctor or family doctor of the patient, and one usually, I think, but I will not be certain, by the medical officer of the Poor Law institution in the city.

262. One must not infer that those are cases necessarily of cruel treatment, but cases not under proper care.—That is so. In the great majority of instances where mental illness occurs to a person, it is only in very exceptional circumstances, and when there is plenty of money to get in the requisite trained nurses that one can say that the home, however nice, affords proper care, and therefore it is no aspersion on the home or on anybody to notify the case as not under proper care and control. When that has been notified, if there be the family doctor, he gives one certificate, and so does the medical officer of the Poor Law institution. The reason for that second certificate is because (I am speaking personally now, desiring only to express my own personal opinion), I believe, unfortunately, by a routine process the great majority of these cases are first taken to the Poor Law institution, so that the second medical certificate is naturally, and not improperly, that of the Poor Law medical officer. The case having been got (as I venture to think often unnecessarily so) to the Poor Law institution, and these two medical certificates obtained, he is seen at the Poor Law institution by a judicial authority, and I think my colleague, Mr. Macleod, has already pointed out to you that the justice who makes this order under Section 13 must be a judicial authority. Again, to the best of my belief, the practice that obtains in the city is that the judicial authority calls at the institution about twice a week, so that he easily sees the cases within the specified time, but the Section, as you will see, does not require him to see the patient. He can make the order on the two medical certificates without having seen the patient.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

263. But the procedure is similar to that of the procedure on petition?—No; there are words in it which invite the judicial authority to proceed as far as practicable as if the case were on petition, but there is this most important difference, whether accidental or intentional, I do not know: The form of the order under Section 13 does not state whether the judicial authority saw the patient or not, so that the medical superintendent, on receipt of a patient under Section 13, has no official means of knowing whether the person who made the order saw the patient or not, and he has no duty to bring that fact to the patient's notice or to make any enquiry whatever from that point of view. There is that difference.

264. I follow; but this intermediate procedure seems to be found at Cardiff, and no doubt elsewhere, to be a convenient equivalent in certain cases for the more formal petition?—The cases would not go under petition because that would involve the machinery of admitting the patient as a private patient, with an arrangement to pay the whole cost of maintenance, which they cannot afford.

265. But this is a comparable procedure adapted to the case of those who are not able to avail themselves of the private patient procedure?—I think that it is not unfair to put it in that way, but I am not too sure of it myself.

266. It has certain features in common with the procedure on petition, has it not? It has the feature of two medical certificates being required; it has the feature of the judicial authority being the special justice who has jurisdiction, and, as far as I can see, the chief distinction is just that one you have alluded to: that the justice making the order is not required to state whether he has seen or has not seen the patient?—If I may venture to express a personal opinion, it always appears to me that this most valuable Section was framed as a prompt way of dealing with cases dangerous to themselves or to the public, and for whom nobody may be available, perhaps no relative available, to take any steps at all. For instance, there may be a case known in a house. It is not merely a constable or overseer or relieving officer: any member of the public may on oath state that he believes this person is of unsound mind and not under proper care and control, or is cruelly treated or neglected; and once that is done on oath, the judicial authority has to get the opinion of two doctors.

267. Just help me with regard to this: When Mr. Macleod was speaking a few minutes ago, he spoke of the case of the working man, the wage-earner in the home, who has unfortunately developed a mental malady, and suggested that his case would be treated under the procedure for a pauper?—In the great majority of instances in the kingdom it is.

268. Would the procedure under Section 13 not be available in his case because he is not a pauper?—I venture to say so.

269. Why should the stigma of calling him a pauper patient be attached to him when he is an excellent member of society?—Mr. Macleod will draw your attention to the definition section. (Mr. Macleod): A pauper is defined under Section 341 as a person "wholly or partly chargeable to a union, county or borough." Then if you look at Section 18, it is: "A justice shall not sign an order for the reception of a person as a pauper lunatic into an asylum for lunatics, or workhouse, unless he is satisfied that the alleged pauper is either in receipt of relief, or in such circumstances as to require relief for his proper care. If it appears by the order that the justice is so satisfied, the lunatic shall be deemed to be a pauper chargeable to the union, county, or borough properly liable for his relief. A person who is visited by a medical officer of the union, at the expense of the union, is, for the purposes of this section, to be deemed to be in receipt of relief."

270. I can well conceive that the expense of treatment may be beyond the means of the wage-earner, but at the time when he becomes afflicted he is not a pauper in any sense of the term; he is a self-respecting and self-sustaining citizen?—Quite.

271. Is it because the treatment necessary for his case is beyond his means that he is relegated to the category of the pauper?—I suppose the justice says he is not in fact a pauper, but he is in such circumstances as to require relief for his proper care. That is stated on the justice's order.

272. One quite understands that a person may not have the means of lying by for a period of treatment, and may have to get it provided from public funds, but that class of person seems to me quite a different class of person from the pauper, who is a person who has not supported himself and is not able to do so?—You must also look at Section 3 of the Act of 1891, which says: "A lunatic sent to an institution for lunatics under Section thirteen or sixteen of the principal Act shall be classified as a pauper, until it is ascertained that he is entitled to be classified as a private patient." So that if he is dealt with under Section 13 he is still first of all classified as a pauper, and is not removed from that class until it is shown that he can pay for his own maintenance and is entitled to be a private patient. (Sir Frederick Willis): It is very objectionable in these cases that they should be paupers.

273. I do not know whether it is before us here, but it does occur to me that the attaching of the label of pauper to a person who is not a pauper at all is very unfortunate?—In our new Mental Treatment Bill we propose to eliminate that altogether as regards early treatment.

274. He is not a pauper by his own act; he is a pauper by the misfortune of his illness?—(Mr. Macleod): That is so.

275. However, it rather seems that Section 13 provides a method whereby without the initial stigma of describing the person as a pauper, he can reach a proper institution for treatment. And yet he has to be classified as a pauper once he gets there?—(Dr. Bond): Section 13, I think, is of very great value, and personally I wish it were much more often used. It has this disadvantage, that if it be considered that the seeing of the patient by a judicial authority or other justice is a wise and proper thing and is a safeguard, then this section has the disadvantage that it does not compel such a person to see the patient, and the official at the institution has no means of knowing whether one did, and if he did know, there is no section under which he can call in a judicial authority to see the patient. That may or may not be a disadvantage; it depends which way that point is looked at.

276. It is at least a difference, at any rate?—It is a difference. I think I should be right in saying on this point that north of the border, in Scotland, the judicial authority is the wrong term, but the corresponding person sees the papers but rarely sees the patients, and is not expected to, as far as I know; but I should not like to speak authoritatively.

277. I am still a little confused as to the line of demarcation between the case dealt with under Section 13 and the pauper case properly so called. It seems that a case might be dealt with under one section or the other?—(Mr. Macleod): Both are open, but if the justice finds that the person is a pauper, or is in such circumstances as to require relief, he can describe him as a pauper patient. Supposing a man is brought before a justice under Section 14, and the justice says: "This is not a case for pauper treatment at all; this is a case of a person who is not a pauper and not wandering at large; I will not make an order under Section 14"; then you must take proceedings under Section 13; you must give your information on oath; two medical men must be called in, and it must go before a judicial authority; then he could make the order. But there is the distinction. You have the private patient on petition; the ordinary pauper patient; and the patient wandering at large. Under Section 15: "Every constable and relieving officer and every overseer of a parish who has knowledge that any person (whether a pauper or not) wandering at large within the district or parish of the constable, relieving officer, or overseer, is deemed to be a lunatic, shall immediately apprehend and take the alleged lunatic, or cause him to be apprehended and taken, before a justice." Then you have got Section 13, where the man is not a pauper and not wandering at large.

278. But where the procedure applicable to private patients is not appropriate?—That is the position; there are those three classes, and yet, as I said before, once the order is made he is classified as a pauper until he shows that he is entitled to be classified as a private patient.

279. What is the reason for that what I may call interim classification of a person as a pauper? Is it in order that he may get the benefit of the assistance in the institution without charge?—Yes, I suppose so.

280. Lord Eustace Percy: Might I ask, bearing on this point of the substantial difference between paupers and private patients, what is the difference as regards chargeability? Under Section 271 of the Act, a patient may become a private patient upon his relatives agreeing to make such payments as the visiting committee think fit?—Yes.

281. There is nothing about full cost. On the other hand, how far can the Poor Law authority recover the cost of treatment of a pauper patient from his relatives? As far as I can see, you may have this situation: Generally speaking, the guardians have power to recover the cost of maintenance; so that you may have a pauper patient in respect of whom the guardians are recovering the whole cost, and you may have a private patient in respect of whom the visitors have agreed he shall be a private patient if he pays half the cost.

Chairman: I can see an anomaly there.

282. Lord Eustace Percy: I wanted to ask how far that was a real point or merely one of theory?—I believe there are some London asylums where, if the relations pay the full cost of maintenance, they are classified as private patients. (Dr. Bond): That was so after a certain case; that was the practice adopted in the London mental hospitals and in certain others, that whenever a so-called pauper patient's relative or the patient could pay the whole cost of maintenance, he was immediately put on the private list, but I think that that is rarely done now; because to that is now added a sum equal to the interest on the capital expenditure of the institution. About 5s. or 6s., or something like that, is added to the actual cost of maintenance. If the relatives can pay that, then certainly in London and certain other local authorities' mental hospitals, all those patients are classified as private patients; but the visiting committee of a county or a borough mental hospital is not compelled to take in any private patient as such, and so some will not adopt this method. There are not many who will not, but I do know of one or two that will not have a private patient in their institution; they are not bound to by the Act; but the overwhelming majority do, and some few actually provide separate accommodation for private patients, paying very considerable sums above the cost of maintenance.

283. Chairman: I think we have now reached a convenient stage for adjournment?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Before you leave the summary reception orders, might I just draw attention to Section 22?

284. If you please?—That Section says this: "In the case of a lunatic as to whom a summary reception order may be made, nothing in this Act shall prevent a relation or friend from retaining or taking the lunatic under his own care if a justice having jurisdiction to make the order, or the Visitors of the asylum in which the lunatic is or is intended to be placed, shall be satisfied that proper care will be taken of the lunatic."

285. That would cover the case of a person who could be properly looked after at home?—Yes. (Mr. Macleod): We have dealt now with cases on petition presumably sent direct to an institution; we have dealt with pauper patients under Sections 14, 15 and 16 and cases under Section 13. Then there is an intermediate stage where they do not go direct to the institution, i.e., under Section 20.

Chairman: We will deal with that case after the adjournment.

286. Sir Ernest Hiley: In the case of Cardiff, mentioned by Dr. Bond, who actually does pay for the patients who are sent to an institution under Section 13?—(Dr. Bond): The Guardians of the city.

287. They are then treated as rate-aided patients?—Yes.

Mr. Macleod: You will understand, Sir, that urgency orders do not apply to any but private patients.

Chairman: Yes.

287A. Sir Frederick Willis: I have the figures about the number of inquisition cases—there were 225 up to the 1st of January out of approximately 130,000.

288. Then it is fairly a negligible number?—It is practically negligible.

289. Then I suppose there is no reason why that form of procedure should be preserved, as it has not been sought after much?—Well, I should like you to ask the Lord Chancellor about that.

290. We have discussed the various proceedings which have taken place in the case of both private and rate-aided patients up to the stage when they find themselves under care, and when the first report of the medical examination on reception has been made—can you now tell us when the Board of Control next comes in contact with the case?—(Mr. Macleod): Yes, under Section 39 we get what we call a month-end report on the patient's mental and bodily condition, the same sort of report as when the case comes in.

291. Is there a prescribed form for that month-end report—I do not think there is one scheduled to the Act?—(Sir Frederick Willis): No, I do not think there is—there is a form for the first report, but not the second one. Yes, there is one scheduled to the Rules, but not in the Act—Form 13.

292. That is absolute, of course, with regard to every private patient?—(Mr. Macleod): Except this, that under the Act of 1891, it does not apply to transfer cases, if a patient should be transferred from one institution to another.

293. Yes, I follow that. I suppose the purpose of the month-end report is formally to apprise the Board of Control of the condition of the patient after he has been under observation for a reasonable time?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes, I think that is the object.

294. I think it is Section 39 which deals with all these reports?—Yes, under Section 39, when the visitors of licensed houses get these month-end reports arrangements are made for a visit by the medical visitor of the justices, who is, of course, an independent officer, and he has to make a special report on the case, and if he reports that he is doubtful as to the propriety of the detention of the patient, we get a copy of the report, and are thereupon required by the Act to make such inquiries as will satisfy us whether the person is properly detained as a lunatic or whether he ought to be discharged, and whether the case ought to be reported to the Lord Chancellor with a view to an inquisition. We quite recently had a case where the medical visitor expressed a doubt whether a person was or was not properly detained, and we sent a Medical Commissioner to make a special report on the case, and after considering the report we informed the superintendent that in our view the case ought to be discharged and it was discharged. We could ourselves have made an order for the discharge in that case if we had liked, but that was the more formal way of proceeding. As to the last words in the Section, we are required to say whether the case ought to be reported to the Lord Chancellor with a view to an inquisition. We considered whether that course should be adopted in that case, and I discussed it with Sir Claud Schuster. Also the Section says we may report, yet the machinery does not exist, and practically those words were of little or no use.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

294A. Then important action may follow on the month-end report, I take it?—Yes, very.

295. The Section prescribes what is to be done on its being received, and is a visit essential immediately after the reception of the month-end report?—Yes. (Mr. Macleod): The first thing to be done is that the medical superintendent of the institution has to send a report to the Commissioners in all cases.

296. What I really want to know is, what follows upon that report?—May I refer to Sub-section 2 to clear it up. There the medical officer shall in cases of houses licensed by justices send a report, and then comes Sub-section (3), which provides: "The Commissioners after receiving a report upon any person in a licensed house within their immediate jurisdiction" (of which there are 19) "shall make arrangements for a visit being paid as soon as conveniently may be to the patient by one or more of the Commissioners; and the Commissioner or Commissioners so visiting shall report to the Commissioners whether the detention of the patient is or is not proper."

297. That is with regard to licensed houses?—That is with regard to houses licensed by us—what are called metropolitan licensed houses, and of those there are 19 as distinct from those licensed by justices, which are called provincial houses, of which there are 36.

298. Sub-section (3) ensures consideration and visitation by the Board of Control?—Yes.

299. What happens in the case of the others?—That is dealt with by Sub-section (4), which provides that "the visitors after receiving the report shall in every case of a private person in a licensed house in the county or borough for which the visitors are appointed, make arrangements for a visit being paid by the medical visitor." The medical visitor is one of the visitors appointed by the justices, and he has to pay a special visit to see the new patient as to whom the month end report has been given; and then the sub-section goes on to tell you what he shall do: "And if on such visit there appears to be doubt as to the propriety of the detention of the patient, such visitor or visitors shall forthwith report the same in writing to the Commissioners, who shall thereupon make all such further inquiries as may be necessary," and so on. So that there, you see, you get an independent report of a medical visitor who has been appointed by the justices of the county or the borough. (Sir Frederick Willis): It really occurs at the end of the month in the report of a medical examination which has to come to us, and we have power to discharge the case if necessary.

300. And you obtain it through the visitor?—Yes.

301. By your own visitor, in the case of a metropolitan licensed house?—(Mr. Macleod): From the Commissioner. Under the Act the metropolitan licensed houses have to be visited six times a year by the Commissioners, but the Lord Chancellor has a power of dispensation, and every year authorises a reduction of the statutory visits to two—that is visits by a Medical Commissioner and a Legal Commissioner, and we undertake that the number of actual visits shall be no less than are required under the Act. In fact, eight visits are paid to each house during the year, though at two of the visits only new cases are seen.

302. Then after a month has elapsed you have the report of a visit which is an ad hoc visit, a special visit following the report as soon as conveniently may be?—Yes, we really have eight visits a year to these places, seeing the new patients when we go; but the visitors of the justices to provincial licensed houses are compelled to pay four visits in the year by two or more visitors, and twice a year by one or more. In addition, the medical visitors have to pay ad hoc visits to see all new patients. See Section 39 (4).

303. We will consider a little later the regulations as to visits, because that is an important part of the inquiry, but now one is anxious to see and inquire into a patient's history; and as I understand it, a month has elapsed, a report has been made, a visit has taken place, and no cause has been seen by the Board of Control to discharge the patient; then I think one should next ask how long does the order last?—Under Section 38 as amended by Section 7 of the Act of 1891, the order lasts for a year in the first instance, and then it lasts for another year, then for two years, then for three years, and then for five years, if continuation orders are made in pursuance of Section 38 of the Act of 1890, and Section 7 of the Act of 1891. You must look at Section 7 of the Act of 1891, which provides that "A reception order shall remain in force for a year after the date by this Act or by an order of the Commissioners appointed for it to expire, and thereafter for two years, and thereafter for three years, and after the end of such periods of one, two, and three years for successive periods of five years, if not more than one month nor less than seven days before the expiration of the period at the end of which, as fixed by this Act or by an order of the Commissioners under Sub-section 2, the order would expire, and of each subsequent period of one, two, three and five years respectively, a special report of the medical officer of the institution or of the medical attendant of the single patient as to the mental and bodily condition of the patient with a certificate under his hand certifying that the patient is still of unsound mind and a proper person to be detained under care and treatment is sent to the Commissioners." So that for all these respective periods the medical superintendent at the institution or the medical attendant of a single patient has to send a report on the mental condition of the patients, and give a certificate, if he can, that a person is of unsound mind.

304. So that, apart from the question of visitation, which brings you into contact with the patient, the stages are, a report at the expiry of one year, then at the expiry of a second year, then for two years, and then at three years and five years?—Yes.

305. Mr. Jowitt: Is this procedure limited to a private patient?—No, it applies to all patients.

306. Chairman: This periodical report is applicable to all patients?—It is applicable to all patients; they cannot be detained unless these detention orders are made. Then as a further precaution, if you look at Sub-section (6) of Section 38 of the Act of 1890, it provides: "If in the opinion of the Commissioners the special report does not justify the accompanying certificate, then (a) in the case of a patient in a hospital or licensed house or under care as a single patient, the Commissioners shall make further inquiry, and if dissatisfied with the result they or any two of them may by order direct his discharge." That applies to single patients and patients in licensed houses or in a registered hospital. In the case of a patient in the asylum, that is to say, a county or borough asylum—then

"(b) in the case of a patient in an asylum, the Commissioners shall send a copy of the report, with any other information in their possession relating to the case, to the clerk to the visiting committee of the asylum, and the committee, or any three of them, shall thereupon investigate the case and may discharge the patient or give such directions respecting him as they may think proper."

307. The important matter is that the case is brought up for reconsideration in that form at these intervals?—Yes, that is so.

308. What happens to the report when it is received in your department?—When the report is received in our department, and I suppose there are about 800 a week, they are all examined by an experienced clerk first of all, and then they are examined by the Commissioner on duty, and they are initialled by the Commissioner on duty to show that he has seen them.

309. Those reports are the justification for the continued detention of the person?—That is so.

310. Do you find in point of practice occasions on which the special report does not justify the certificate of continued detention?—I should say there are occasions on which we think sometimes the facts are rather meagrely put, but I do not know myself of any case in my experience since 1908 where the patient has been discharged after it has been sent back so far as our part is concerned. (Sir Frederick Willis): I would like to explain in regard to that, that in Section 83 it is provided that "The manager of every hospital and licensed house, and a person having charge of a single patient, shall forthwith upon the recovery of a patient," do various things, including discharge; so that all the time it is the scheme of the Lunacy Act that the medical man responsible for the case under review has to say whether a lunatic has recovered, and can discharge him; they do not consider the point only at this period, and therefore practically all the discharges take place at different times.

311. You do not await the formal review?—We do not.

312. The importance of Section 83 is that it keeps each case continuously under review?—Yes, a practice recommended by the Commission.

313. Is there provision made also for the compilation and preservation of records, both in the asylums and institutions and so on, and also in your department, of all the cases under the Act?—(Mr. Macleod): They are all kept, every one, and if anyone comes into the office and inquires about any patient A B in such and such an asylum, within ten minutes he can get the information.

314. So that you have a clue to every case throughout the country?—Yes, except those in workhouses (Sir Frederick Willis): I do not want you to assume that we disclose that information to anybody who may turn up.

315. You do not hand them the papers, of course?—(Mr. Macleod): No.

316. But you have before you, as it were, a patient's dossier?—Yes, we have his dossier, but we verify the cases; we say to the people making enquiry, "Who are you?" and if the reply is not satisfactory we do not disclose anything; if the reply is satisfactory, we give them the information.

317. Is the system of records satisfactory, do you think?—Yes, I think so. (Sir Frederick Willis): We suffer rather from a lack of clerical assistance. I do not think we have a big enough staff to do all the work we have to do.

318. Do you work on a card index system?—Yes.

Chairman: I think we might next turn to the provision for the visitation of patients.

319. Lord Eustace Percy: May I ask the reason for the omission of the month end report in the case of rate-aided patients?—I do not know; it is not in the Act.

320. Chairman: Can you suggest any substantive reason?—I suppose it is the same reason as I have mentioned before—there is no inducement for keeping a rate-aided patient in the institution at all.

321. But if you are so anxious to get rid of the rate-aided patients, why protect them against improper detention at all?—(Sir Frederick Willis): I think all that can be said is that it is not there; why the legislature omitted it I do not know.

322. Does it not come to this, that it is a feature of this legislation, that you do not require so much formal protection in the case of rate-aided patients as you do in the case of private patients?—That is so.

323. And there might be an illegitimate motive for detention in the one case which would not be present in the other?—I think that must be the reason why there is the difference. (Dr. Bond): But also historically one of the changes was almost entirely directed to the private patient.

324. Earl Russell: You are referring to the Radnor Committee?—No; I was referring to the 1877 Committee. (Sir Frederick Willis): I think the reason may be that the rate-supported cases do not come under the same protection as a private patient.

325. Chairman: Not because there was less money in the matter, but rather because the motive might be different?—Yes. There is keen competition among men connected with asylums to get a good recovery rate.

326. Mr. Jowitt: I think you said you found this month-end report of considerable value as to private patients?—I mentioned one case where I found it recently to be of value; I do not think I said generally it was of value, the great safeguard is having responsible, upright men, as there are in these institutions—that is the real safeguard.

327. Chairman: But you surely do attach importance to being brought into contact with these cases?—It does compel a formal revision of the case, and I would not like to give it up.

328. Mr. Jowitt: Would the institution of a month-end report generally involve a great deal more work?—Yes, it would mean a great many more documents coming to the office.

329. And with your existing staff you say it would be impossible to deal with it?—Quite impossible. (Dr. Bond): I should like to say this—I have not heard mention made of what we in the office know as further reports which very frequently take the place with regard to pauper patients of month-end reports. In certain of those cases which we are not satisfied with, we send for what we call a further report. We ask the person who is making the further report to add to his statement a certificate, if he can, that the person being dealt with is of unsound mind and a proper case for care and detention. Those words do not come in either in the week-end or the monthly report, and it is only when we have reason to be anxious that we send for a further report. There is the same provision in rate-aided cases as in private cases, and we make no difference at all between them, and certainly send in all cases for it where we think it necessary.

330. But you do attach importance to having your attention jogged from time to time by the receipt of reports relating to the patients, and having them brought to your knowledge in that formal shape?—Yes, certainly, in every case where we have a scintilla of doubt, we ourselves take additional steps and have our memories jogged by making a mark for a further report. When these cases come before us, the Commissioner on duty will ask for a further report in a fortnight, which goes to the Secretary and the clerk, and so we get the further information.

331. On the other hand, it is undesirable that a form should be repeated for form's sake, and there is no value in accumulating useless paper?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Quite.

332. Chairman: I think you might help us now with regard to the visitation system if you will tell us who the visitors are, the different classes of visitors, their duties, and generally what they do. I want to know what visits are paid to persons in institutions, and to persons under single care?—(Mr. Macleod): I have told you what visits we pay to metropolitan licensed houses.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

333. Those are visitations by the Commissioners themselves?—Those are visitations by the Commissioners themselves.

334. But there are many other places and other classes of visits I want to know about—will you tell us what are the kinds of visits paid?—First of all there are the visits of the Commissioners and the visitors of licensed houses in the country, who are specially appointed by the justices at Quarter Sessions; they appoint a certain number of visitors, one of whom must be a medical visitor.

335. But these licensed houses are also visited by yourself?—Yes; first, there are the Commissioners, then, secondly, there are the visitors of licensed houses who are specially appointed by the justices with a medical man. Then, with regard to public asylums and county and borough asylums, there is the visiting committee, which is appointed to visit once every two months all the patients, and at those visits they have to see the patients and the admission papers of the newly-admitted cases.

336. Are not there some general visits?—General visits are only made under special circumstances under a special section of the Act, under which orders have been made as to property, and the Master can ask visitors to visit.

337. With regard to the different classes of institutions first, as to the county and borough asylums in which the great bulk of the patients are maintained, what visitation are they open to?—They are visited once a year by two Commissioners, and they are visited by members of their own visiting committee once in every two months.

338. So that they are visited by two different authorities; they are visited by the headquarters' representatives, and also by the local people?—Yes. (Sir Frederick Willis): Those are members of the county and county borough councils. (Mr. Macleod): They are the statutory committee appointed under the Act. (Sir Frederick Willis): And also I might mention the guardians have a right to visit cases coming from their Unions.

339. They may go and see how their patients are getting on?—Yes.

340. But they are not bound to do so?—(Mr. Macleod): No, they are not bound to do so, and that is why I did not mention it.

341. Then with regard to the licensed houses, by whom are they visited?—They are visited twice a year by the Commissioners. The provincial licensed houses are visited, first of all, by the Commissioners twice a year, and by the visitors who are appointed by the justices four times a year.

342. Miss Symons: In order to clear up one point under Section 205 of the Act of 1890, do I understand you to say that the Lord Chancellor or a Secretary of State could only visit in the small number of cases you have mentioned?—No, the Lord Chancellor can visit other cases. Perhaps I had better quote the section.

343. Chairman: The Lord Chancellor's visitor may go to any particular case he wishes, I understand?—Certainly, but he can only send to cases in which there has been an inquisition, or cases where the patients have property dealt with by the Master.

344. Miss Symons: Under Section 205 it is provided that the Lord Chancellor "in the case of a lunatic so found by inquisition, and the Lord Chancellor or a Secretary of State, in any other case, may at any time, by an order in writing directed to the Commissioners or any of them, require the persons or person to whom the order is directed to visit."—(Mr. Macleod): That is another provision altogether. The Lord Chancellor may order or direct a person to visit and examine a lunatic and to report, and that occurs in this way—

345. Earl Russell: It is an order directed to the Commissioners or to any other person so that he might send his visitors?—He might. The position is this—sometimes information is laid before a Commissioner that a person is of unsound mind but is in illegal custody—that is to say, without being certified he has been received by someone to look after him for payment, and that is a breach of Section 315 of the Lunacy Act. Now, when we have that information before us, and we think it a proper case, we would report to the Lord Chancellor, who appoints someone nominated by the Commissioners to visit and see the case, but he never sends one of his own visitors.

346. But he might send one of his own visitors?—He might, but he sends an independent person, who goes down and reports to the Commissioners on the patient's mental condition, and whether the patient is a lunatic and a proper person to be certified insane.

347. Chairman: I think Miss Symons is accurate in pointing out that the Lord Chancellor's visitors are not necessarily restricted to visiting lunatics so found by inquisition or those with property; but that the Lord Chancellor could, if he so desired, utilise their services for any special visitation?—That is quite a different thing.

348. But in practice you say that such visits do not occur?—Certainly. (Sir Frederick Willis): In addition, I think the Lord Chancellor is concerned with persons who have property: he does not confine himself to lunatics so found by inquisition; he also visits cases of persons in whose property he has concern. (Mr. Macleod): May I give you the section to make it all clear—it is Section 183, which provides: "The Chancellor's visitor shall visit lunatics so found by inquisition at such times and in such rotation and manner, and make such inquiries and investigations as to their care and treatment and mental and bodily health, and the arrangements for their maintenance and comfort, and otherwise respecting them, as the Rules in Lunacy, or as any special order of the Judge in Lunacy in any particular case, shall from time to time direct." When an order has been made under Section 116 for the appointment of a receiver, very often the Master sends one of the visitors to inspect patients in respect to whom that order has been made.

349. Suppose a case of a person found by inquisition to be insane and confined in a licensed house, and subject to visitation by the Chancery Master, he would be subject to visitation then also by the Commissioners, would he not?—Yes, he might be—we should see him, but we should have no power over him.

350. Would he be subject to visitation by any of the local visitors?—Well, they would see him in going round, but they would have no power to deal with him in any way.

351. Earl Russell: In fact they would not see him at all officially?—Quite. Sometimes our Commissioners will go to a large county asylum where there are patients subject to the Lord Chancellor's visiting orders, or where there is a person who is subject to a Master's order, and they see them there; very often the Lord Chancellor's visitors are there while we are visiting other patients.

352. Chairman: But that is quite accidental?—That is quite accidental.

353. What I want to know is the extent to which each different class of person is seen by responsible visitors and has an opportunity of complaining and bringing his or her case before the attention of the visitors?—In the case of metropolitan licensed houses, provincial licensed houses, registered hospitals and patients in single care, patients so found by inquisition, and other persons as to whom the Master has made an order are visited by the Lord Chancellor's visitors also. Visitors of licensed houses do not visit registered hospitals, which are visited by their own managing committees. Then the county and borough asylums are visited by the Commissioners once a year and by members of their own visiting committee every two months, and there is a guardians' visit if they like. (Sir Frederick Willis): Then, of course, on the question of visiting every petitioner in the case of a private patient has to undertake to visit not less than once in six months. (Mr. Macleod): The visits to single patients are made by Commissioners as often as are ordered, but they are all visited once and some twice a year, and if for any special reason it is thought desirable that one should go oftener, a special visit is made. They are visited by a person who is called the medical attendant, who has to visit the patient, unless an order is made to the contrary, once a fortnight. We make a dispensation order very promptly in the case of, say, a chronic patient, and a record is kept in what is called the medical journal.

354. What is the purpose of the visit?—In the case of the single patient the reason of the visit is, first of all, to inquire into the condition of the patient, and whether the patient, in the opinion of the Commissioners, is properly detained, and, secondly, to see that the conditions and the circumstances under which the patient is residing are proper—whether the patient is being properly cared for, in other words.

355. The Statute prescribes, does it not, the matters to which the visitor is to attend?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes, the point with regard to a single patient is that they have to inquire into the treatment and the mental and bodily state of health of the patient.

356. And, of course, they have to record the result of inspection?—(Mr. Macleod): Yes. We have a little book in the case of every single patient, and when a Commissioner goes down to visit that patient he takes the book with him, and having seen the patient and made his notes in the book, he writes a report on what he has found, and states whether, in his opinion, the patient is properly looked after—that report goes before the Commissioners at their meeting every week.

357. Will you tell us what is done by the visitors with regard to other institutions?—Taking the county and borough asylums, the statutory visit must be by a Medical and Legal Commissioner, and we go there without giving previous notice. What we do generally is this—we drive out to the asylum and ask for the superintendent, or, if he is out, we ask for the deputy-superintendent, who sees us, and we tell him that we have come to pay our annual visit. We then give him a list of things as to which he has to give us certain answers—the number of patients resident, the number of patients who have been discharged, the number who have died, the causes of death, whether seclusion has been used, the number of the staff and so on. When we go into the asylum the superintendent, and, as a rule, the doctor who has charge of the branch we are about to visit are in attendance. We may be asked which side we want to visit first, the male side, or the female side, and we say we will go to whichever side is most convenient to us. Then, in the case of people who are at work out of doors, we say to the attendants, "Leave the people as they are, we do not want you to bring them into the wards, we will see them as they are, we want to see how the asylum is carried on day by day." Then we go into the ward, whichever it may happen to be, male or female, and ask for the charge nurse. We ask him the number of the ward, the number of patients in it, the number of the staff, how many epileptics there are, how many there are on special card—that is, how many patients there may be who are suicidal and for whom there are special nurses to be provided—how many there are in bed, have there been any accidents, and, if so, we get a list of them, and then we go round the ward, and perhaps one of us will look at the beds, one of us will inspect the lavatory, another will see whether the medicine chests are kept in order, whether the poisons are kept separate from the ordinary medicines; then we ask to see the ward records and things of that sort. We then see the patients in the ward, and if any patient wants to engage us in conversation, he can speak ad libitum, and talk quite freely, and if they do not feel inclined to talk, and are rather shy, we try to draw them into conversation. We often find that there are people who will not at first talk at all, but when they have been encouraged, they will do so. When we come to the sick people the Medical Commissioner sees them especially—he sees every sick person and has a long conversation with the medical officer in charge of them. Then we go into the chapel, into the bakehouse, into the kitchen, into the laundry, where we see them at work, and at the end of our visit, which may last during one or two days, we have all the books brought before us; we have to sign all the books. Then the two Commissioners discuss the condition of the place, and if there is anything special that anyone wants to mention, he mentions it, and the Legal Commissioner writes the report and we sign it.

358. The account you have given us shows that there is, then, a very thorough investigation into the conduct of these institutions you are visiting, but I should like to know a little more in detail what are the opportunities the patients have of seeing the Commissioners individually, or, possibly privately?—Any private patient has a right under the Statute to demand a private interview, an ordinary rate-aided patient has no such right, but if any patient says he wants to have an interview with one or both of the Commissioners, that interview is granted at once, and we see him in one of the rooms, nobody else being present, so that the patient has a chance of making any statement he desires either with regard to his detention or anything else.

359. Earl Russell: Has the patient any opportunity of requesting a private interview without anybody knowing it?—Yes, a patient has every opportunity of asking us for a private interview, and frequently we have letters sent to the Secretary asking when the Commissioner comes round if the patient can see him as he would like to see him, and the answer is sent that on the next occasion of a visit the Commissioner will give that patient a private interview, and when we go down we tell the Superintendent that we have such and such an application and we want to see the patient.

360. Chairman: I should have thought there were many cases where a patient would not be in a position to take advantage of an interview?—Yes, of course if a superintendent says that a patient is a dangerous character we have to use our own discretion, and there are some cases in which we cannot possibly see the patient, because we are told that he is homicidal.

361. Sir David Drummond: Do you think that with the time you devote to visiting such an institution as you are speaking of you are able really to interview 1,500 or 2,000 patients and find out all about them?—(Dr. Bond): Certainly not—of course we have not sufficient time to satisfy all our aspirations, but I do think that we have time to make an effective inquiry into any case from the point of view of the Lunacy Act. And more and more I think the Commissioners are being appealed to and looked up to for guidance and advice—personal advice by those conducting mental hospitals, and those who have the care of persons mentally afflicted. More time is taken up with the discussion of important matters with members of the medical staff, and sometimes we meet members of the visiting committee whom we meet accidentally, which all takes up a great deal of time. If there were more time certainly I think it could be used to advantage.

362. Because it seems to me that the utility of a visit is summed up in a consultation with the medical officer?—No, not quite.

363. Chairman: I think I might ask Dr. Bond this question—of course the visitors are not the people who are responsible for the certification of the patient or for his detention?—No, neither the visiting committee nor the Commissioners.

364. But they are responsible for his general supervision, and to see that the Statute is being observed?—Yes, that is so.

365. And any person desirous of bringing up his case, you admit, should have an opportunity of doing so?—Yes, certainly.

366. There is no examination made of a patient in the sense of making a medical examination?—No, none at all. It has been often put to me by those who do not know and probably have never seen the inside of a mental hospital: "How can you see in two or perhaps three days the working of a large mental hospital?" Well of course those who ask that question have never seen one and know nothing about it; but, as a matter of fact, those of us who do know, appreciate that a large proportion of the patients are suffering from secondary or other forms of dementia; and, although, as Mr. Macleod has said, when we are there as we go amongst them we do our best to draw them out (I think I might say we speak to practically every patient), still in cases of secondary and terminal dementia and other cases of acute excitement, it is quite impossible; and to insist upon it would be interfering with the doctors and nurses in their treatment of the patients. In the case of a great many patients you can do all that can possibly be done by visitors like ourselves in a very short time, and, as a matter of fact, we have time to talk over quite a large number of cases.

367. Chairman: In short, you would not have an application from a person who was in an advanced state of dementia?—No, certainly not. We should probably say to that person, "Good morning, how are you?" and our training tells us whether it is worth while to stay more than a moment with him; sometimes we can see that a patient is not suffering from dementia, but from something like shyness, and we then encourage that patient to talk a little further, and there are some cases in which you can see it is no good pursuing the matter at all. We do our best, but the nature of the case in many instances prevents us doing much.

368. Miss Symons: With regard to interviews with private patients, could you say whether a large proportion of those interviews are granted on the application of the patients?—A substantial proportion. In the case of every private patient the patient has a right to demand an interview, and it is always granted. Nor is it ever refused in pauper cases—we make no distinction.

369. I was wondering whether you thought that the fact that that right existed in private cases restricted the number of interviews with regard to pauper cases?—No, I think not.

370. Mr. Jowitt: Is any record kept of these interviews?—I think so, with regard to the private patients. The proceedings are entered in the visitors' book, containing a report of our visit. We never make any mention of the patients' names, but there is another book kept, known as the patients' book, and in that book we do enter names. For instance, if we have private interviews with seven patients we do say in the patients' book that the patients with whom we had had seven private interviews were So-and-so, and against each of the names put some remark.

371. The question is, do you or do you not keep a record of the purport of the interview?—(Sir Frederick Willis): No. (Dr. Bond): In my own private note book I nearly always do, and I think we all express our view in the case of patients who complain of detention as to their fitness for discharge. If one patient was improving we would say that one was improving.

372. Chairman: A rate-aided patient might want an interview, to complain with regard to food or clothing or it might be to complain of being there at all?—Certainly, that is what the usual complaint is.

373. Can you see any reason why the rate-aided patient should not equally with the private patient be entitled to complain to the visitors?—I should say they are equally entitled to.

374. They are not entitled to demand a private interview?—No.

375. I mean that they should be on an equal footing with the private patient in that respect?—I think they are now. (Sir Frederick Willis): It would not secure to them any more private interviews than they already get, and we should not object. On the point as to whether a record is kept of some of these private interviews, I should like to say that in certain cases it would be quite absurd to keep a real record, because the most mad people ask for interviews and talk about all sorts of silly things, like electricity coming down the wall, and that kind of thing, and to make a record of such an interview would be a waste of time; but if there was anything worth recording, of course, by all means let a record be kept.

376. Earl Russell: You have interviews with people on the question of their sanity or otherwise?—Oh, yes.

377. And many of them make all sorts of complaints, some of them being quite absurd?—Yes.

378. But if you made a note in all cases, would you not get some information as to what is the kind of thing which a patient is complaining of?—Well, we have that.

379. But I think if you made short notes of all the interviews, you might get some information which might enable you to deal more effectively with the patient. A patient might, of course, complain of anything. (Dr. Bond): In regard to Earl Russell's point, there is a differentiation to some extent between the private patient and the rate-aided patient. We take round with us books with the name of every patient, which we keep up to date, with regard to the private patients, but the reason is not that one patient is a private patient and the other is a rate-aided patient, but because we have the power to discharge the private case; and with regard to the private case we make a note against every patient.

380. Are the books you speak of books belonging to the Board of Control, or belonging to the asylum?—They are our own books.

381. Chairman: There are also books kept at the institution, are there not, in which entries are made?—Yes. (Mr. Macleod): There are the medical journals and casebooks, and also the visitors' book, in which we enter the report of our visit. (Dr. Bond): In case there might be some misunderstanding about it, complaints are matters to which we attach the utmost importance, but in the great majority of cases they refer to questions of liberty, and if that is all that one has to listen to from each patient who makes a complaint about detention, and we are satisfied that none of the patients are fit to be discharged, it can all be summed up at once in a very few words. If we receive no complaints, except on the score of detention, one word or one phrase would be sufficient for a number of patients—"My opinion of them was they were not fit for discharge"—that comprehends a good deal. But if we find that these complaints are growing, and are more than we are accustomed to, we not infrequently say we are surprised to find the complaints are more numerous than we are accustomed to, and contrariwise we might say, "We received no complaints." Now complaints may not be confined to detention, but they may relate to ill-usage, and those are investigated at once on the spot in a judicial fashion, because we have the benefit of a lawyer who is with us. The result of our investigation in such a case is set out in full in our report. We do not mention the patient's name, but in the patients' book we say the patient who made such-and-such a complaint was heard, and that is recorded. The complaint may not be one of ill-usage—it may be a complaint with regard to something else, and if we are satisfied that it is of a trivial nature, we may say nothing whatever about it; but if many patients complained about some dereliction of duty, as sometimes happens, we say so in our report—we say that we have received an unusual number of complaints about the dinners, it may be, and that it is a matter which wants looking into. Therefore, I should not like it to be thought that there is no record made of complaints—I think there is, and sometimes it takes a long time to deal with them.

382. I am concerned for the moment with the question of safeguarding a patient against illegal detention, and on that matter at present the first safeguard is the periodical revision of the case, or the ordinary consideration of the case in the institution, and discharging the patient if recovered?—Yes.

383. While he is at the institution there is the formal investigation and report at recurrent intervals?—Yes.

384. Then I was considering the importance of visits in regard to these matters. If a patient is under the impression that he or she is being illegally detained, do they have an opportunity of putting forward their case?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes, and a great many of them, in talking to us, say, “I am illegally detained,” and one or two minutes conversation shows you that they are very mad indeed. But if, on the other hand, a patient makes a complaint which appears reasonable, you make a note of it and discuss it with the doctor. (Mr. Macleod): And we would ask for his papers, and get out the medical journal and the case book, in which a record is kept from period to period of what the mental condition of the patient is, and that would be discussed with the superintendent.

385. It must be apparent that owing to the character of the ailment a person might imagine all sorts of things, and the position is more complicated than in the case of an ordinary person suffering a certain amount of injustice which he might be able to explain. But does the visit give to a patient an opportunity to put his case to a visitor?—(Sir Frederick Willis): I should say it did, and I should say any sane person would have a very full opportunity of explaining the whole circumstances. (Mr. Macleod): Might I say still further, supposing after discussing the case of a patient we said to the superintendent, “Have you ever given this patient a trial?” and the superintendent said, “No,” we would suggest that he should consider it; and, if he thought fit, the patient might have a trial to see how he got on; if he did not get on he would have to come back. Very often patients are given an opportunity in that way, on our suggestion. We have no power to discharge rate-aided patients, but we do often make that suggestion.

386. By trial you mean an experimental period of liberty?—Yes, and also, you see, there is the case of sending a patient out under Section 79. Section 55 of the Act provides that absence on trial or for health may be granted, and Section 79 provides: “When application is made to the visiting committee of an asylum by a relative or friend of a pauper lunatic confined therein, requiring that he may be delivered over to the custody and care of such relative or friend, any two of the visitors may, if they think fit, discharge the lunatic upon the undertaking of the relative or friend, to their satisfaction, that the lunatic shall be no longer chargeable to any union, county or borough, and shall be properly taken care of and prevented from doing injury to himself or others.” So that we do suggest trial with a view to discharge—and to see whether a patient is fit to be sent to the care of his friends.

387. Mrs. Mathew: I should like to know if it is a common thing to have patients interviewed?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes, we often do so.

388. A large proportion, or a small proportion?—Well, not a large proportion, but a large number in the end.

389. In particular asylums?—I cannot say in any one asylum more than in another. (Dr. Bond): I should say that the highest proportion are in the metropolitan licensed houses, where they know us and we know them.

390. Chairman: Do you find them often wanting interviews over and over again?—Yes, we find the same patients every time we go asking for interviews. (Sir Frederick Willis): They like talking to the Commissioners really, strange as it may seem.

391. I can quite understand that, and that a certain type of patient may have a predisposition to air his views to the Commissioners when they really have nothing new to say?—(Dr. Bond): Yes, nothing new whatever.

392. Mrs. Mathew: Are any particulars of the interviews taken down in a book?—That is a matter for each of us to determine. Interviews are always recorded.

393. Chairman: But not the purport of the interview, officially?—No, although by the words we use I think we would generally know what the purport was.

394. I suppose we may take it that a large proportion of the interviews are necessarily futile?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes. (Dr. Bond): I would not like to say that. I believe that the really free talk of the men, and their being let loose to talk, does them good; it does them good to talk about what they wish to talk about, and it helps to content a patient. I would not say, therefore, it was really futile, though from the point of view of discharge it may be so.

395. I can imagine it might well be a certain solace to them?—Yes.

396. But I was thinking of it from the point of view of its operative effect.—(Sir Frederick Willis): Really a great majority of them are futile from the point of view of discharge, certainly. (Dr. Bond): I would not say it does not happen that an order putting on trial very often follows after the interview.

397. Lord Eustace Percy: Do I understand that the Commissioners have no statutory power to discharge or procure the discharge of a patient from a public institution?—(Mr. Macleod): We have no power to discharge rate-aided patients except under Section 34 (2); we have power to make representation to the visiting committee if we think a patient ought to be discharged, and there is no doubt he would be then discharged. In the case of the pauper, the rate-aided patient, the power of discharge vests in the visiting committee. (Dr. Bond): We have an indirect power, I think. Have we not been given a power of intervention by Section 49? It is a circuitous method, but it is there. (Sir Frederick Willis): It is certainly the fact that if we came across a proper case which we thought ought to be discharged we should be able to get the discharge, although we have no legal power.

398. Chairman: Then we find in the Statute directions as to what the visitors are to attend to?—Yes, it is all set out. (Dr. Bond): We do a very great deal more than is set out in the Statute.

399. You have to do the things prescribed in the Statute, but you do more. Then a record has to be kept of what you have done, and I understand everyone in charge of the institution has to give you every facility?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes.

400. Later on, no doubt, we shall have evidence from members of visiting committees, but in regard to the evidence you have given to-day, you have been speaking of the Commissioners and your own practice?—(Mr. Macleod): Yes.

401. Are you satisfied with regard to the value of these visits?—Oh, indeed, yes.

402. Do you regard them as affording an important safeguard against the detention of any person who ought not to be detained?—It is a safeguard, undoubtedly; but there is no inducement for institutions to keep a patient, quite apart from our visits, but it is a strong safeguard, undoubtedly.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

403. It seems to me to be a very important one, because it gives you an opportunity of being brought into contact with cases as to which there is any doubt?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes. I should say in the matter of private cases it is a strong safeguard. (Mr. Macleod): Yes, I should think it is a great safeguard. (Dr. Bond): I think the most important part of our work is the personal contact with the patients, if I may say so.

404. Then I think the petitioner, in the case of a private patient, has to visit him?—He undertakes to visit once in six months, and if we find out he has not done so, a letter goes from the office pointing out what his statutory duty is.

405. Is provision made for visits of friends and relatives to patients?—Do you mean in county and borough asylums?

406. Yes.—Yes, there are regular visiting days when patients can be visited, and if any patient is seriously ill notice is sent to the relatives that he is so, and if the relatives cannot visit him on visiting days they can attend at another time. Dr. Bond will tell you that they are always encouraged to do so.

407. Suppose you have a person under treatment in a county or borough asylum, not a very acute case, who is anxious to see a relative, you say the relative would be admitted to see that patient at any time?—(Dr. Bond): Practically so, yes, but there are exceptions.

408. I put it as being a certifiable but not an acute case, supposing a patient was visitable, would a relative have access to him?—(Mr. Macleod): Certainly. (Dr. Bond): Except where it was thought that a visit might be harmful to the patient.

409. I was putting a rather ordinary case. In the case of a patient who might be unreasonable or unwilling to dilate on his own grievances to a Commissioner, would he have an opportunity of speaking on the subject to his or her relatives—would the relative have an opportunity of putting the points before you?—(Mr. Macleod): Yes; any relative would either write or come and see us. They constantly do that.

410. The importance of the point is, Is there any vehicle by which complaints may reach you, apart from the purely official machinery?—Yes, a relative seeing the patient might lay the case before us.

411. Then the relative would be the vehicle in conveying any complaint?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes, and it frequently happens. (Mr. Macleod): And they come to the office.

412. What would be the ground for not allowing a relative to visit a patient?—(Dr. Bond): That a visit had already been proved to have had a detrimental effect upon the patient, or, as has happened from time to time, that a relative disobeys an important rule framed for the safety of the patients generally, and after a warning still disobeys. Then they are told regretfully that their visits will be barred. There is one other point—with regard to fresh arrivals, the most competent physicians of a hospital urge relatives not to be in a hurry to visit, but to let a month go by without a visit at all, and some of them prescribe that in their visiting regulations—that no visit should be permitted for the first month, but even where that is so, that could be abrogated in a moment if there were any necessity.

413. Lord Eustace Percy: Taking the case of a girl who is quite properly placed in an asylum, whose mother is very anxious to get her out, and says that she will look after her, and the girl is very anxious to get out as well, precisely in proportion as the mother is anxious to get the child back, I suppose that any visits on the part of the mother would be very undesirable, and have a detrimental effect upon the girl from the medical point of view?—Yes, and that undoubtedly happens.

414. Is there not that danger, that interviews with relatives should be refused in precisely those cases where there is liable to be what one might call agitation displayed on the part of the relative, to the detriment of the patient?—I see the trend of your question, but I do not know of an identical case, and there is not a single instance which I can call to mind, except that there are some cases in which a relative has willingly, after being interviewed, probably at length, by the medical staff, acknowledged the undesirable way in which they were acting with regard to patients, and the harm it was doing. I daresay there are occasional cases, but they are very rare, and I cannot call to mind one case where a responsible near relative has been told that his visits must cease. Of course, one comes across cases of division in the family, where one side is working against the other, and then one cannot tell.

415. Not an uncommon form of delusion is that a patient may conceive a hatred against a person of whom, under sane conditions, he is most fond?—Yes, that is most common.

416. And, as I understand, in such a case it might be dangerous to excite a patient?—It might be so, but visits are much encouraged throughout the country, I am sure, both in institutions for private patients and in public institutions, and I think the cases that are forbidden are extremely few and far between, and we have power to override that forbidding. (Mr. Macleod): That is Section 47.

417. Chairman: So that the relation of relative and patient is very well safeguarded in the Statute?—Yes.

418. Miss Symons: Taking the hypothetical case of a mother who is very anxious for her daughter to come home, would she, in a case of that kind, be allowed to bring her own doctor in to see the daughter, or not?—(Dr. Bond): Ordinarily the physician of a mental hospital is only too willing to allow any medical man to come in and see his patients.

419. Chairman: I rather thought there was something about that in the Act?—(Mr. Macleod): Yes, there is, in Section 47: "Any one of the Commissioners, as to patients confined in an institution for lunatics or other place (not being a gaol) authorised to be visited by the Commissioners, and any one of the visitors of a licensed house, as to patients confined in such house, may at any time give an order in writing under his hand for the admission to any patient of any relation or friend or of any medical or other person whom any relation or friend desires to be admitted to him."

420. That is permissive?—That is permissive. Then Section 49 gives a further power. (Sir Frederick Willis): But the point Miss Symons was making was whether there is any disinclination on the part of a medical superintendent of an asylum to allowing, apart from any Statute, a medical man to go and see a patient. But in the last resort we have power to authorise it, and I would like to make it quite clear that there is no disinclination on the part of medical superintendents to admit outside doctors.

421. Miss Symons: I wonder whether in practice it is ever done?—Permission would not be often refused, quite apart from statute, if a mother said, "I should like my own doctor to see my girl, who is in your asylum"; I am sure he would be allowed to go.

422. Chairman: Is that permission often asked?—No, it is not often asked.

423. Is it ever refused?—I have never heard of it.

424. Earl Russell: You have never had to make an order under this section?—(Mr. Macleod): I have never heard of such an order. (Sir Frederick Willis): Of course, you may get busybodies wanting to make visits to asylums for no reason whatever, but no bonâ fide application would be refused.

425. Sir David Drummond: The fact is that you must have confidence in the superintendents?—Quite.

426. Chairman: I do not think it has ever been the subject of complaint that such visits have been prevented, or that opportunities of access by private medical attendants have been refused.—(Sir Frederick Willis): I think that is so.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

427. Then there are various other provisions in the Act for the protection of persons in asylums—the Lord Chancellor may direct visits, and there are various other directions. In a very serious case I understand the Commissioners can hold an inquiry on oath?—(Mr. Macleod): They can.

428. Under Section 332?—Yes.

429. And call witnesses?—Yes. We do hold those inquiries.

430. Have you held any such inquiry?—Yes, I have—I held two last year, I think it was.

431. What subject-matter was under consideration?—The last long one I held was with Dr. Bond in the north of England—it was a case of an allegation by the husband of a deceased patient that she had been improperly treated in the asylum; the inquiry lasted two or three days.

432. And what was the other case?—The other case was a case of some broken ribs, I think, or some injury, but I cannot remember the facts now.

433. Then correspondence is a very valuable means of communication. Are there ample facilities afforded for that?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes, they are allowed to write letters, and they have to be sent unopened to the Board of Control or to the Lord Chancellor or to a Master or Judge in Lunacy.

434. Earl Russell: Or to any Judge.—Or to any Judge; and we get hundreds a week.

435. Chairman: Then it is very largely taken advantage of?—Yes.

436. And the great bulk of the correspondence is quite futile?—The bulk of it is futile. If any allegation of cruelty is made on the part of any official, of course, there is at once an investigation, no matter how mad the letter may seem to be.

437. Mrs. Mathew: Where are the letters put when they are written?—(Mr. Macleod): Do you mean where they are put after they are written? In most of the asylums there are letter boxes in each of the wards, where the patients put their letters, and in other cases they hand them to the person in charge of the ward, who hands them to the superintendent for posting. (Sir Frederick Willis): Were you wondering, Mrs. Mathew, whether they always got out?

438. Yes.—I do not think there is anything of that kind, judging by the great number we get. (Dr. Bond): I think the head of the place has by law a wide discretionary power with regard to many of the letters sent, but he cannot by law refuse to post letters addressed to persons named in Section 41 of the Lunacy Act, and if they are sealed down they must go without being opened. With regard to all other letters he has a discretionary power, but our experience is, and we have often been into the matter regarding individual complaints, that the discretion is used most generously, kindly and sympathetically, and in the public asylums the almost universal practice is that where letters are not sealed they are put before the chairman or visiting committee at the next meeting.

439. I think the requirement that letters should be forwarded unopened, is an important matter, and there is a penalty attached, is there not?—Yes.

440. In fact a good many of the matters with which we have been dealing have penalties attached to them. Is it required that all patients should be notified that they have these privileges?—(Mr. Macleod): Section 42 deals with that. It provides: "Whenever the Commissioners so direct, there shall, unless there is no private patient therein, be posted up in every institution for lunatics, printed notices setting forth (a) the right of every private patient to have any letter written by him forwarded in pursuance of the last preceding section: (b) the right of every private patient to request a personal and private interview with a visiting Commissioner or visitor at any visit which may be made to the institution; (2) The notices shall be posted in the institution, so that every private patient may be able to see the same; (3) The visiting Commissioners or visitors may give directions as to the place in which such notices are to be posted; (4) If the manager of any institution for lunatics makes default in posting such notices, or does not within 10 days carry out any directions as to such notices given by the visiting Commissioners or visitors, he shall, for each offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds."

441. Earl Russell: You ought to direct your mind to the words "unless there is no private patient therein"?—Yes.

442. Chairman: The first point that attracts my attention is that it is permissive—notice may or may not be put up.—Yes, but we insist on it in all cases, especially in the case of private patients.

443. Why should there be a notice where there are private patients, and no notices where there are not? If you look at the last line and a half of Section 41 you will see that it says, "and may also, at his discretion, forward to its address any other letter if written by a private patient." Nothing is said there about rate-aided patients, you see, so that it is left to the absolute discretion of the superintendent, but as Dr. Bond has explained, they are dealt with in a very kindly and thoughtful way. (Dr. Bond): The great majority of the letters are from rate-aided patients, but I do not think there is a notice with respect to the section and the rights under it in every ward in every mental hospital in the Kingdom, but I do not think you would find that many patients have not the knowledge.

444. Miss Symons: Do I understand that there are not many wards in public institutions without these letter boxes?—It is a growing practice to have them, but there are wards without them; I hardly think there is a hospital in the Kingdom which has not a letter box on each side of the building, in a convenient place, in which patients can post letters; they are the glass-fronted letter boxes, locked, the key of which is carried by an officer. I should not like to say that every ward has a letter box, but it is a growing practice.

445. I suppose the important consideration is not so much by whom the letters are written, but by whom they may be read?—Yes. Speaking generally, patients and nurses are on the very best of terms, but there are some patients who have delusions, and who are no doubt inclined to resent a nurse being able to read a letter, and the letter boxes such as we devised would prevent that. The patients feel themselves secure because they see the box unlocked and their letters taken out when it is cleared.

446. Chairman: I see that notification has also to be given in the case of a private patient of the right to request a private interview.—(Dr. Bond): Yes, that is posted up, too.

447. I find difficulty, personally, in seeing why, in regard to matters of correspondence and notices, there should be any difference made between a pauper patient in an institution and a private patient.—(Sir Frederick Willis): No, I do not see any reason whatever, but it is historical.

448. Being historical does not make it necessarily right.—(Mr. Macleod): No, but as far as we are concerned we make no distinction.

449. But it seems to me in practice you have made this a matter of law?—Yes.

450. But you see no objection to all inmates being put on the same footing in regard to the matter of writing, in regard to the matter of interviews, and in regard to the matter of the notification of privileges?—(Sir Frederick Willis): No objection whatever. (Dr. Bond): With regard to the notification of privileges, it would have this disadvantage that the more you put up notices of this kind the more you are going away from what you would expect in an ordinary hospital. If you go to an ordinary hospital you do not put up notices of this, that and the other, and the more you go in for this line of safeguarding the more you mark the mental hospital as different from an ordinary hospital.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

451. Yes, but there are ways in which the notice can be dealt with—I mean if it is worded: “If anyone who wishes to send a letter will be good enough to place it in this box,” and so on, it would be innocuous; but, of course, if you say: “Under section so and so, you may post here” it is quite a different thing?—(Sir Frederick Willis): We have been pressed to put up Section 79, which gives a right to a relative or friend to get a particular patient out; but we think it would be a mistake to do that, because a patient might say to a relative: “Why do not you take me out under that power?” and it would cause a lot of illfeeling. But we do insist on a new admission that people should be told there is that right. (Mr. Macleod): I told you, Sir, what we are bound to do with regard to statutory visits by a Legal and a Medical Commissioner, but I should point out that during and since the war these strictly statutory visits have not been made by two Commissioners, but in many cases by one only because we have not the staff.

452. The next thing we come to is the trial or experimental leave of absence—do you find that the provisions of the Act on that subject are very useful?—Most useful.

453. Do they enable you to try whether a patient is in point of fact sufficiently recovered to be completely discharged?—It is the mode of testing.

454. Is it largely resorted to?—Very largely.

455. Will you tell us what you do in cases of temporary release?—Any two visitors of the asylum can let a patient out on trial. They are the people who can do it, and they do it on the advice of the medical superintendent. Now what would happen would be this—the medical superintendent and his staff would have a patient under complete observation, and they would come to the conclusion: “We are not sure that this patient can go out on his or her own, we will give him or her a trial.” That patient is brought up on visiting day, and the probability is that he or she is recommended for trial—“I think the patient might go out on 28 days’ trial,” and if at the end of 28 days the patient has gone on well then another extension of time may be granted. It is done for the purpose of testing. Then there is another power by which the committee may give an allowance to a necessitous patient during the trial to help him.

456. Is it the visiting committee in every case, or can the Commissioners do it?—In the case of county and borough asylums by the visiting committee.

457. And in licensed houses?—In our own licensed houses it may be granted with the consent of the Commissioners.

458. But when it is done by the Visiting Committee, is it reported to the Board?—No.

459. So that you do not know how many people are out on trial?—(Dr. Bond): No, we do not, but very frequently with regard to the special reports and certificates and the month-end reports we ask that a patient should be further reported upon, and we are constantly getting replies saying that the patient may be allowed out on trial from such and such a day to report on such and such a day. Apart from that, we have no knowledge of individual patients going out on trial, but when we go to an institution one of the things we invariably ask is: How many patients have been transferred to other care, how many have been discharged, of those how many have recovered, how many were sent out on trial by way of test first, and of those we always ask how many had an allowance.

460. And it is largely taken advantage of, is it?—Yes.

461. Can you give us any number?—(Sir Frederick Willis): We have not any collected statistics of how many people were let out on trial last year.

462. But it will be on record somewhere?—At each institution they would have a record there.

463. Earl Russell: I suppose you could inquire from half a dozen representative asylums?—Yes.

464. Chairman: One would very much like to know to what extent this very useful provision is taken advantage of?—Quite, we will make inquiries and give you the figures.*

465. I think you might make inquiries at two or three institutions?—Very well.

466. Miss Symons: Under what power is the allowance made?—(Mr. Macleod): Under Sub-section 2, Section 55: “The visitors may make an allowance to a pauper lunatic absent from the asylum on trial, not exceeding the charge in the asylum, and that allowance, and no more, shall be paid for him as if he were in the asylum.”

467. Earl Russell: What is the meaning of these words in your proof?—The meaning is that the visiting committee of a county or borough asylum have power to allow a pauper patient out on trial, but in the case of other patients the power is not only given under this section to go out on trial, but to allow a patient to go away for the benefit of his or her health. For instance a patient might go to the seaside for a month in the summer, or a patient might be allowed to travel with friends, but there is no power with regard to a rate-aided patient.

468. Do you mean that a pauper patient should not be given this privilege?—They use the trial for everything you see there, so that it makes no real practical difference.

469. Chairman: The objective is different—the purpose of the trial is to see whether freedom can be given to the patient, while leave is given in order to benefit his bodily health?—Yes.

470. Sir David Drummond: Do you think a medical superintendent is influenced by the fear that his reputation might suffer in the event of a patient out on trial going wrong?—(Dr. Bond): I have heard of that, but I think if there was such a feeling it is dead now. (Sir Frederick Willis): There was a case in one of the Courts last week of a girl who was out on trial breaking a window, and the magistrate made some remarks about the danger of letting people out on trial. (Dr. Bond): With regard to that, 25 years ago one certainly heard expression given to the view, and advice sometimes given that it was better to wait till patients were well and then discharge them in case something might happen during the period of trial for which the superintendent might be held more or less responsible, but I hope and think that that feeling is dead. We have encouraged the system of trial to our uttermost, and have gone so far as to say that should any untoward event occur and some inquiry is made with regard to the occurrence we ourselves will give evidence that we do advise it. (Sir Frederick Willis): It is certainly a very valuable provision.

471. What happens if the period of trial turns out to be useless, or, rather, is not productive of any beneficial result—what is done then—does the patient come back?—(Mr. Macleod): If the patient is not a fit and proper person to be out he would go back.

472. I want to see what happens during his absence from the institution?—On trial?

473. Suppose the patient unhappily turns out to be not capable of being released, who has charge of the matter then?—Technically, I believe, it has been said that if a patient is on trial he is a free agent during the period that he or she is on trial, but in point of fact when the patient is allowed out on trial there is a condition attaching to that under which it becomes necessary, if the mental condition of the patient requires it, for him or her return to the institution before the time has expired. That is what happens. (Sir Frederick Willis): Those interested would at once communicate with the institution and say that he or she had broken down.

474. But the reception order is still in operation?—Yes, that goes on all the time.

475. Supposing a person, on the other hand, shows that the trial is effective, is the patient released

* See Appendix III.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

at the end of the trial?—(Mr. Macleod): Certainly, the patient is discharged then. (Dr. Bond): The practice differs a good deal in different hospitals; in some hospitals, for instance, in London, it is the invariable practice to get the patient back to the hospital in order that the medical staff might see him or her and assess the recovery, and see if they were satisfied that the recovery was good, and, as a matter of fact, whether the patient had fallen backward rather than progressed. But if they were satisfied then, as Mr. Macleod says, a discharge is ordered on such and such a date by the visiting committee.

476. What is the alternative?—The alternative of that, as provided in the section, is for a doctor who is cognisant with the place where a patient is residing on trial to send his certificate.

477. And is that sufficient?—If the visiting committee, on the advice of the superintendent, like to act on that, they could do so.

478. So that the release of a patient may be much less formal than the proceedings at the beginning?—(Sir Frederick Willis): I think if they are satisfied that the person out on trial is no longer necessary to be detained, they have no power, to recall the case. (Dr. Bond): No, but we usually arrange with the patient to come back on a certain day. (Mr. Macleod): Sub-section 8 of Section 55, I think, deals with the point. It says, "If a person allowed to be absent on trial for any period does not return at the expiration thereof, and a medical certificate certifying his detention as a lunatic is no longer necessary is not sent to the visitors of the asylum or the manager of the hospital or house, he may at any time within 14 days after the expiration of the period of trial be retaken as in the case of an escape." So that if he does not return at the end of his trial, and there is no certificate of recovery, he can be taken within 14 days, but if there is such a certificate, he cannot.

479. It does seem to be the case, then, that a patient can really be relieved from detention with less solemnity than occurs on his detention?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes.

480. It may be quite right, but it may be that a patient who has been admitted on an application with two certificates and with all the formalities, may cease to be detainable, on being let out on trial and simply getting a doctor to say that he is of right mind?—Quite, but I should like to say the general practice is that patients are now seen by the doctor at the institution.

Mr. Walter Stewart (representing the National Society for Lunacy Reform): May I ask, Sir, if you are in a position to indicate whether any facilities will be given to any person representing any organisation which is interested in this matter of being heard by Counsel, or being allowed to put questions after the evidence-in-chief has been led?

Chairman: We do not propose that witnesses attending here should be examined or cross-examined by other than members of the Commission, but, on the other hand, if any persons are interested on behalf of any responsible body, and think that any subject has not been explored sufficiently, the most convenient course would be to submit that matter or any questions to myself, and, if it is appropriate matter, or if the questions are appropriate, we will see that they are put. I do not think it is desirable that questions should be addressed to witnesses by everybody in the hall.

Mr. Stewart: But it would be permissible to put, through you, any questions?

Chairman: Quite, and no doubt that would be a useful course to follow.

(The Witnesses withdrew.)

481. Chairman: Sir Frederick, I think this morning we might proceed to consider the question of discharge, dealing with the private patient and the pauper patient separately. Perhaps you would be good enough to inform us of the methods by which a discharge is obtained, first of a private patient and second of the rate-aided patient.—(Sir Frederick Willis): There are a number of different provisions contained in the Lunacy Act in regard to the discharge of private patients. First of all there is the point which was mentioned yesterday, that if the reception documents are not amended to our satisfaction we have a right to say that the case must be discharged.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

482. That is the early stage, I take it?—The earliest stage. On that point I would like to say that the number of discharges that take place because the medical certificates do not disclose sufficient ground for the detention of the case, and, when amended, still do not disclose sufficient ground, is very small indeed. I do not know what the actual figures are, but I should doubt if there are more than one or two a year. We are going to get the information for you; we will take a year's figures. Then another point that I think we mentioned yesterday is that under Section 38 a medical report has to be made at stated intervals, and if we are not satisfied that sufficient grounds are shown for keeping the case, again we have got power to order the discharge; that applies to cases in a registered hospital or a licensed house or in single cases. Then under Sections 75 and 76 the Commissioners have power to discharge from a hospital or licensed house, or a single patient if after visit they consider it is necessary and desirable to do so. Then there is a provision in Section 49 of the Act which gives us power, on the application of either a relative, or friend, or other person, to make an order authorising two medical practitioners to visit the case; they have to make two visits. The section is a little ambiguous as to how those visits should be paid, but our view is that the two doctors have got to go together twice; there are two visits, on each occasion by two doctors, seven days elapsing between these two visits, and if they report to us that the patient may without risk to himself or injury to the public be discharged, we may order the patient to be discharged. I do not know whether, in going through this, you would like me to say anything about the policy on which we act; but with regard to Section 49, of course, it may easily be that a patient might be discharged without risk to himself or injury to the public, though he is still quite insane; and there may be reasons for thinking that in the interests of the patient himself it is not desirable that he should be discharged. Then Section 72 (3) primarily gives the petitioner the right to discharge a patient.

483. That is the person upon whose application the patient has entered the institution?—Yes. That is subject to a right on the part of the doctor to give what is called a "barring" certificate—Section 74. If he says that the patient is dangerous and unfit to be at large then the petitioner cannot discharge the case; there would be an appeal to us, or the Visiting Committee, as the case may be.

484. Against that "barring" certificate?—Against that "barring" certificate. Perhaps I might read the words: "A person shall not be discharged under"—the section I have referred to—"if the medical officer of the institution, or, in the case of a single patient, his medical attendant, certifies in writing that the patient is dangerous and unfit to be at large, together with the grounds on which the certificate is founded, unless two of the visitors of the asylum, or the Commissioners visiting the hospital or house, or the visitors of the house, or in the case of a single patient, one of the Commissioners, after the certificate has been produced, consent in writing to the patient's discharge." Then, in addition to the petitioner having that right to discharge the case, if he is dead or cannot be found various relatives mentioned in Section 72 (2) have that right. Section 72 (3) says: "If there is no person qualified to direct the discharge of a patient under this section, or no person able or willing to act, the Commissioners may order his discharge." We come in there really in lieu of the original petitioner.

485. On consideration of what you have told us, does it come to this, that a patient must always be discharged if the person upon whose application the patient is being detained desires that discharge, provided only that a patient is not in a state which would be dangerous to himself or to the public, or provided that he is not unfit to be at large, in the opinion of the medical officer in charge of him, subject to appeal to your Board or the Visiting Committee?—That is the position, yes.

486. Now, of course, the person on whose application the patient has been detained might conceivably be a person who had an interest in the continued detention of the patient?—Quite.

487. Suppose some person equally interested in the patient is of opinion that the detention is improper, or has been improperly obtained by the applicant, what redress would such a party have?—He could come to the Board of Control, and under Section 75 "Two of the Commissioners, one of whom shall be a medical and the other a legal Commissioner, may visit a patient detained in any hospital or licensed house, or as a single patient, and may, within seven days after their visit, if the patient appears to them to be detained without sufficient cause, make an order for his discharge."

488. What I am concerned with for the moment is the independence of the inquiry into the state of the patient, because one can see the desirability of providing independent means of inquiry?—Quite.

489. That is achieved, is it, by the person who wishes the inquiry addressing the Board of Control, who will then proceed at their own hand to investigate the case?—Yes, it seems to be the most independent form of medical examination you can secure. It is a Government Department.

490. That independent inquiry is the right, is it not, of any person who approaches you?—Yes, they have got a right. They would have to disclose some reason. If we got such an application as that, the first thing we should do would be to get a medical report from the medical superintendent of the hospital or licensed house in which the patient was.

491. Has such a person interested in the patient, but not the petitioner, a right of access to you?—Oh yes, certainly.

492. And is it your duty, on such an approach, to take the steps you have indicated?—It would be our duty to take the case up quite seriously.

493. And do you have such cases?—Yes, we have had such cases; I cannot give you the numbers, but Dr. Bond says they are fairly frequent.

494. And are they always inquired into in that independent fashion?—They would be always inquired into unless you did get an application from somebody whom you knew to be an absolutely unreliable person, or if it were in regard to a patient we had ourselves visited very recently, and knew all about; but there is no doubt whatever that the thing would be considered quite seriously, and there would be no disinclination on our part to investigate, visit, and discharge.

495. Now you are speaking of the policy of your Board rather than of any matter of obligation upon your Board?—There is no statutory obligation. It says, "Two of the Commissioners may visit," but in the case of a Government Department in dealing with a matter of this kind it is exactly the same as if it were worded "shall." In my view it is rather better, because if it said "shall" you would have to send two experienced men in some instances to visit a case where you knew it was perfect waste of time to do so; it is only to that extent that I prefer "may" to "shall."

496. Then you read the power as a power coupled with a duty?—I should, certainly.

Sir David Drummond: Suppose there is no such independent person to move the machinery?

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

497. Chairman: Suppose there is no interested party, interested in the welfare of the patient, and the petitioner is not moving, who really is entrusted with the consideration of the case?—Well, you see, in the case of single patients we have got to pay visits to the cases and consider this sort of question for ourselves. In the case of a registered hospital and licensed house we have to visit those frequently.

498. May I take it that it is the machinery you described yesterday which would bring to your knowledge that sort of thing? It would be your domestic machinery which would bring to your notice anything deserving attention?—Yes, and from my experience of the medical heads of our registered hospitals and licensed houses there is no sort of inclination on their part to detain a case that ought not to be detained. I wish to say that most definitely. It is a very adequate safeguard. If to-day officers were willing to work in collusion with people who wanted to lock up patients unnecessarily, the position would, of course, be dreadful.

499. Of course, one knows that the institutions concerned pride themselves on their percentage of recoveries?—Undoubtedly. On that point, I should like to mention Section 83, which says: “(1) The manager of every hospital and licensed house, and a person having charge of a single patient, shall forthwith, upon the recovery of a patient, send notice thereof in the case of a patient not a pauper to the person on whose petition the reception order was made, or by whom the last payment on account of the patient was made, and in the case of a pauper to the guardians of his union, or if a local authority is liable for his maintenance to the clerk of the local authority. (2) The notice shall state that unless the patient is removed within seven days from the date of the notice he will be discharged. (3) In case the patient is not removed within seven days from the date of the notice he shall be forthwith discharged.”

500. But the initiation there starts with the person in charge of the case?—Yes, he has an absolute obligation in law to discharge a case on recovery.

501. Earl Russell: His notice is not sent to you, I observe, under that section.—After discharge a copy of every discharge comes to us.

502. But I mean the notice the section refers to—the notice of recovery?—No.

503. Chairman: What we are concerned with is to examine into all the safeguards, and to satisfy ourselves with the adequacy of those safeguards?—Certainly.

504. It is not from the point of view of reflecting upon the administration of the Act; it is rather from the point of view of seeing whether the Act gives you sufficient powers, and one is, therefore, scrutinising those sections a little closely from that point of view?—Of course, we welcome any scrutiny of that sort.

505. Now you have been dealing with discharge from the point of view of the Commissioners' intervention. Of course, there are other persons who may intervene and bring about a discharge?—Yes.

506. The Committee of a registered hospital; they may discharge, may they not?—As regards registered hospitals, there is Section 38 (7), but that is not quite the section I wanted; that is after considering the month-end report; that is at a specific time.

507. Mr. Mackinnon: That is the wrong reference, I think?—(Mr. Macleod): It is Section 39. (Sir Frederick Willis): As regards the registered hospitals, the Justices who are specially appointed do not visit; there, the managing committee are constantly visiting, but the duty primarily rests on the superintendent to discharge a case when he thinks it ought to be discharged. See Section 83.

508. Chairman: There is a safeguard there, is there not, in visitation by your Board?—Yes, that is so in the case of the registered hospital, the licensed house, or the single patient; we have the absolute right.

509. Then take the case of the public mental hospital. In the case of the public mental hospital the visiting committee has the power to discharge under Section 77 (1): “Any three visitors of an asylum may order the discharge of any person detained therein, whether he is recovered or not. (2) Any two such visitors, with the advice in writing of the medical officer, may order the discharge of any person detained in the asylum.”

510. With the advice of the medical officer two of the visiting committee may do so?—Yes, and of course it is the practice of visiting committees to be constantly seeing cases that want their discharge; I mean they personally interview them; they come up at their meetings, they meet very frequently, and it is quite a regular part of their business to see applicants for discharge.

511. Then I think the visiting committees have also power to discharge if they are dissatisfied with the continuation report?—Yes. What so very often happens with these poor people who have no friends to look after them is that they could be discharged if the friends were able really to look after them; I mean they would not be a danger to the public or to themselves, but they do need a very great deal of care and supervision, and it frequently happens that there is no home suitable for them to go to, where they could get the necessary supervision. There is always an inclination on the part of a visiting committee to discharge as many cases as they safely can discharge.

512. But if there is no home where the patient can be received and properly treated it may be very much to the detriment of the patient that the discharge should be granted?—Very much, and cases are kept in the mental hospitals for that reason, not because they want to detain them; there is no sort of object for them to detain them. (Mr. Macleod): In Section 79 there is power to discharge to the care of friends.

513. That is the pauper case, rather. For the moment we were taking the private patient. We will deal with the pauper patient later?—If you please.

514. In the case you mention, Sir Frederick, of a patient who might be discharged without danger to himself or to the public, you are figuring the case of a patient who is still insane?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes.

515. Of course, if the patient is not insane he must automatically be discharged under the general duty of discharging recovered patients?—Yes.

516. But you are figuring the case of a patient not recovered, but who might, if adequate provision were made for him, be discharged with safety to himself and to the public?—Yes.

517. The discharge being in that instance not because of the recovery, but because provision could be made outside the institution, with safety?—You would say in that case that he no longer needs detention or care.

Sir David Drummond: Supposing the patient is still insane, but in the opinion of the visitors the conditions are not favourable, what steps are taken?

Chairman: The question put is rather from the medical point of view with regard to the patient.

Sir David Drummond: It is rather that there is overcrowding in a particular place, or that the conditions are not favourable in a particular private asylum.

518. Chairman: What would happen in that case? Is the balance of consideration whether the provision that could be made for him outside would be more beneficial than the provision being made for him inside?—Of course, it very often happens that the visitors to licensed houses, or ourselves, come across cases where we think removal to another institution is desirable. We, or the visitors, then communicate with the petitioner, and suggest removal.

519. Let us follow it out. Take the harmless case figured: Do you consider in such a case whether it may not be more detrimental to the case that it should be retained in an asylum or registered hospital or whether it might not be better for him to be handed over to his friends?—Yes, we should consider that, or to single care. One often gets a case where it seems desirable on every ground that the case should no longer be in an institution, but should go to single care. A case a little bit better than that would be one where we thought it should be sent out on trial. I would like just to give you these figures. I was asked yesterday how many cases went out on trial. We got out the figures last night for the year 1922-23, and the number of cases that went out on trial was 5,525.

520. Is that all patients, both private and pauper?—Yes, from county and borough mental hospitals; it does not include the much smaller number in registered hospitals or licensed houses; we have not had time to get those figures out; but those are the figures from our public county and borough mental hospitals, and they are for the whole country, England and Wales. I should like to say on that that it is the policy of our Board to press that cases shall be allowed out on trial freely.

521. It would be interesting if you could complete that by telling us, after the 5,000 odd cases were sent out on trial, how many it was found necessary to bring back?—I think we could get that for you; unfortunately, many do come back.

522. It would be interesting to know in how many cases the trial proved successful and the patient did not require to return?—Yes.

523. Miss Symons: Might I know what is the maintenance grant for such cases on trial, or is there a maintenance grant?—Not for private cases, but for the public rate-aided cases the visitors can make an allowance which is equivalent to the cost of keeping the case in the asylum.

524. And what is that cost?—It varies; it is anything from 18s. or 20s. up to 36s. or £2 a week, that is the sort of figure it is; and although that is a very substantial number, 5,525, yet we should like more cases to go out on trial. We find on going round that some visiting committees send hardly any cases out on trial, and we invariably draw attention to that in our reports, and we correspond with the visiting committees, urging them to attend to this point, and to use their powers.

525. Chairman: I suppose, like other public administrative bodies, you issue circulars from time to time, indicating the powers that are possessed and how they should be exercised?—Yes, constantly. In some instances you get a medical superintendent who is frightened of taking any responsibility. He says, "Well, the patient is being very well looked after here; there is a little risk in letting him go out." We are always urging them to take their courage in their hands and risk certain things, because we think in the general interest it is a wise thing to do.

526. Earl Russell: Every now and then they do?—Yes, and the public says, "This is a monstrous thing."

527. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Might I ask whether there is any difference between that category and the "on trial" category, and if there is any difference with regard to the question of certificates?—Do they remain under certificates?—The case on trial remains under certificate; the case discharged to friends under Section 79 ceases to be under certificate. As Dr. Bond says, very often discharge to friends and discharge from certificate come after the case has been kept for three or six months on trial.

528. Chairman: But the essence of the trial is that the legal nexus is still there. As the result of the trial it may be thought desirable to discharge, whereupon the legal nexus disappears altogether; but the case where it is thought expedient that the patient shall be removed from the place of detention, and entrusted to friends is a case of discharge?—(Dr. Bond): It may be after trial.

529. It may or may not be after trial?—(Sir Frederick Willis): And of course there is very great convenience in maintaining that nexus in a large number of cases; it saves the friends a great deal of trouble. If the case breaks down they write and say, "Can you have him back?"

530. You have not to begin de novo?—No.

531. Now in addition to the cases where the patient is discharged through the intervention of the Commissioners of the Board, and the cases where the visiting committees and managing committees discharge, there is discharge also by operation of law, is there not?—Yes.

532. May we just take these very shortly? If there is recovery, you have already referred to the section dealing with that, and the patient must be discharged under penalty?—That is so.

533. Then if a patient has escaped from detention and is not recaptured within fourteen days, again automatically the certification lapses, does it not?—Quite. Why that should be so I do not know; I have tried to find the origin of that provision, but I do not know what it is.

Chairman: It seems curiously arbitrary.

534. Earl Russell: It can only be that they thought if a man could maintain himself for fourteen days he could look after himself?—Yes. Under the Mental Deficiency Act a case like that does not become discharged within fourteen days.

535. Chairman: It is difficult to find the reason for it?—I do not know what it is.

536. Is it an inheritance from older days?—Yes, it is an inheritance, from 1845, I think.—(Dr. Bond): Of course, there is a great difference between mental defectives and lunatics. One is suffering from a permanent condition, whereas presumably all the cases we are dealing with are going to recover, or have a chance of recovering.

537. Supposing an admittedly dangerous lunatic gets away and manages to secrete himself for fifteen days somewhere?—There is recourse to Section 14. (Sir Frederick Willis): Then he has to be taken in charge by a constable or relieving officer and brought back again; he is a wandering lunatic.

538. Earl Russell: And the re-certification costs about £5?—It would cost at least that—perhaps more.

539. Chairman: It is not based on principle; it is purely an arbitrary provision?—I think so.

540. Then if a patient is out on trial and fails to return after the expiration of fourteen days he is treated again as an escaped patient?—Yes, unless a medical practitioner sends a certificate.

541. Then discharge also follows where an urgency order or a reception order lapses?—Yes.

542. And I think we need scarcely refer to the Habeas Corpus powers, which are always in the background?—Yes.

543. Now would you pass to the case of the pauper patient?—In the case of the pauper patient there is no petitioner, of course, and the primary way of discharging those patients is through the visitors—that is, members of the county or borough council who have the duty of looking after the various institutions. It is the same for all inmates of public institutions.

544. Then if a special report is received on the subject by the Commissioners, are the visiting committee directed to consider the case and to investigate it?—Yes, invariably. If we consider that a continuation certificate did not prima facie disclose grounds for detaining the case we should at once inquire into it, and when a Commissioner was next going there, if they did not act on our view or did not take much notice of us, we should pay very special attention to that case.

545. Does one find the explanation of the difference between the cases of the private patient and the pauper patient in the matter of discharge in this circumstance, that there is no pecuniary inducement in the case of the rate-aided patient to detain the patient?—It is an essential difference, really.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

546. There may be, although there ought not to be, a motive in the case of the private patient?—Quite. There can be none in the case of the rate-aided patient.

547. But notwithstanding that there may be no motive to detain, there is this machinery which you are describing for obtaining discharge?—Yes.

548. I mean, there is in their case also supervision and an investigation by the Commissioners?—Yes.

549. What power have you as Board of Control in the case of a rate-aided patient, to direct discharge?—The only direct power, I think, is, in Section 49; that applies to private or rate-aided patients; that is on the application of anybody. We can make an order allowing two doctors to go and visit the case, and on the report of those two doctors we could discharge it. Then there is Section 34; that is if the original documents are not amended.

550. Have you had in recent years any instance of the necessity for your intervening in a case?—Do you mean a rate-aided case?

551. Yes. We have had some applications under Section 49 to send two doctors, and in some cases we have discharged the case on the report of those doctors. I have seen, I think, all those cases within the last two or three years, and in the cases that have been discharged, though one does not like to say they will certainly not recover, my impression is that they were not normal; but the doctors said that they could be discharged without risk of injury to themselves or to the public, and there seemed to be some sort of ground for thinking there were friends going to look after them, and we have ordered the discharge of the case. Our leaning is always to discharge a case if we can possibly think it might be discharged.

552. Just one point on that: Take the case of the rate-aided patient; with whom does the initiative in obtaining the discharge lie?—Under that section it may be a relative or friend, or anybody.

553. I put that question because I gather that some members of the public are interested in it—the question of the right of a person interested in a rate-aided patient to have the case considered?—Quite.

554. And to procure, if expedient, the discharge of such patient?—Yes.

555. What is the right of such a person?—They have an absolute right to make an application to us in respect of any patient.

556. What is your duty in that matter?—Our duty is to consider the application—not necessarily to make the order authorising the two doctors to visit. We get a number of foolish applications under that section; there are certain busybodies about; there are one or two societies who form themselves with a view to using this section; I suppose it is a little advertisement for them; but some of the applications we have had under the section are very foolish applications.

557. Some, on the other hand, I suppose, would be serious—I mean disclosing grounds for inquiry?—Yes, proper for inquiry, but, of course, in the case of these rate-aided patients the medical superintendent or his medical staff and the visiting Committee are all anxious to get rid of the cases all the time; the patients are constantly under review from that point of view.

558. Still, one is anxious to see that there are means by which their condition might be judged from outside?—Quite. There is an absolute right for anybody to make an application to us under Section 49, and we have a duty to consider that application.

559. I suppose one of the difficulties in the matter of imposing an absolute duty or obligation upon the Board of Control is that many of the communications you receive on the face of them appear to be baseless?—Yes, but I think even on those very absurd applications, or at any rate applications which at that stage seem absurd, we should take some action; we should get some report on the case.

560. Mrs. Mathew: Who pays for the examination by the two doctors?—Whoever makes the application. Then with regard to Section 49, I would just like to say that of the applications we get under that section more are complied with than are refused; that has been the experience up to now, but there have not been a very large number; during the last year perhaps there have been 30 at the outside, under Section 49.

561. Chairman: Now, with regard to the documents upon which a patient is detained: I think the statute puts an obligation of secrecy upon you, does it not?—Yes.

562. You are not entitled to disclose the documents relating to a particular patient except under certain circumstances?—That used to be statutory, but although those sections are repealed we do still regard these things as secret, and we do not disclose them. But there is a section, Section 82, which says this: "The secretary to the Commissioners shall, upon the discharge of a person who considers himself to have been unjustly confined as a lunatic, furnish to him upon his request, free of expense, a copy of the reception order and certificate or certificates upon which he was confined, and if the order was made upon petition, also of the petition and statement of particulars upon which the reception order was made." Those particulars have also to be furnished.

563. But suppose a person bona fide interested in the welfare of a patient desires to know upon what statement of particulars or on what certificates that patient is being detained, is there any provision for such an applicant seeing the documents?—There is no provision, and we should want to be very, very fully satisfied that they were entitled to any information of that kind. That person coming and asking for documents of that kind could himself go and visit the case if he liked.

564. Or have this medical examination?—Or have this medical examination, or they could see the medical superintendent. The doctors at our public institutions are quite willing to see any friends and would discuss a case with them, and advise them about the case.

565. Of course we are dealing with the position where the sufferer himself and his relatives may not desire to disclose to the public the unhappy state of the individual?—Quite.

566. Is that the justification for the secrecy?—I think so. Sometimes it may happen that a wife has furnished a lot of particulars about her husband when he was ill, and if he recovers it is rather undesirable he should know his wife had stated this or that about him; it may really lead to his becoming ill again.

567. Lord Eustace Percy: On the other hand, the wife of a pauper patient would not be able to obtain information from you as to the grounds upon which her husband was detained?—Yes, I think we should give information in a case like that, and I think she would have no sort of difficulty in getting the information locally. I do not think there is any disposition on the part of the medical superintendent or anybody in a responsible position not to give her that information.

568. Chairman: So far as the proceedings before the judicial authority are concerned, there is a statutory obligation of complete secrecy. I think we find that in Section 6, subsection (5)?—That is so.

569. I was considering for the moment the bona fide case of a person interested in the welfare of a patient, who says, "I should like myself to see the documents on which that patient is being detained." Is the public consideration to the contrary the undesirability of making public private statements which you have received and which might cause pain, or really be disadvantageous?—Yes.

570. On the other hand, do you not think that if you are satisfied that the inquirer is a responsible person interested in the welfare of that patient, there is something to be said for that party having a right to see the documents?—If I were dealing with a case like that and I was quite satisfied that the man ought to know something about the case, I should tell him sufficient for his guidance without actually showing him the documents. I think it is rather important to maintain the view that he shall not have actual access to the documents, but I should tell him quite enough for him to know all about the case, and for him to take any action if he wanted to. It would, I think, be exceedingly undesirable to give anybody a sort of absolute right to come and demand to see all the private papers about people.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

571. I suppose they frequently contain the most intimate details of the life of the patient?—Frequently.

572. Which are given on a confidential basis?—Yes. I am sure it would be productive of much more harm than good.

573. Lord Eustace Percy: In the case of a private patient there is a person who may be appointed by the lunatic himself who is present at the judicial proceedings?—Yes.

574. There is also the relative who signs the petition. Those two may be the same people, and they may not; but in the case of a pauper patient those very people who would be closely interested and have full knowledge in the case of a private patient would not be entitled to any information at all, and if you gave them any information you would give it them verbally rather than show them the documents?—I should give anybody who came to our office verbal information, rather than show them the documents, whether private or pauper, but there is no similar procedure in the case of the pauper that the relation has in the case of the private patient. In the case of the rate-aided patient it usually is the case that the wife or the husband moves the relieving officer to take action.

575. Chairman: And gives the information necessary?—And gives the information.

576. But there is no provision for the patient having a friend at hand who is conversant with the facts, in the same way as a private patient is entitled to have?—No; but this sort of thing very often happens: You have a pauper case, a man, and this man is visited by the wife, and she writes to us and says, "I visited my husband yesterday; he is very much better, and I should like him to be discharged." We should send that on to the medical superintendent and get a medical report on the case. If on medical grounds it was considered wise that his period of treatment should continue, we should write to the wife and tell her we have had the case specially investigated, and the medical advice is so-and-so, and in the interests of her husband we advise her that it is the best thing to allow him to remain for a further period; and of course they can approach the visiting committee in the same way as they can approach us.

577. But there is always access by any relative or friend to a rate-aided patient in the institution?—Yes, they can go and visit.

578. They can go and visit, and they can further, if they think that the patient ought to be discharged, apply either to the Board of Control or to the visiting committee as the case may be?—Yes.

579. And are they entitled to have the patient visited by a medical attendant of their own selection?—Yes, they could do that. Under Section 47 they have got a right, but as we were saying yesterday, a medical superintendent usually would welcome a visit from another doctor if a friend felt very uneasy about a case he had under his charge; I do not think any medical superintendent would object, but if he objected we have a right to give an order saying, "You shall admit this doctor to see that case."

580. Miss Symons: In a case of that kind, where you admitted the patient's own doctor, if he happened to disagree with the view that the doctor in the hospital took, what would be the procedure then?—Are you taking a pauper case now?

581. Yes.—If it were a pauper case we could not discharge the case. If Doctor A, acting for the friend outside, says, "I think patient B ought to be discharged; he is certainly not insane," and the head of the institution, knowing very much more about that case than the doctor who comes in for half an hour, says, "These are the facts about this case: It is quite true that on the day Doctor A saw him he was comparatively quiet and harmless"—that is the way with these unfortunate people; they have their periods of sanity and insanity—nothing statutory would happen upon that.

582. Chairman: The new outside doctor's certificate would be an authoritative element for consideration by the Board of Control in their investigation?—Absolutely.

583. But it has no sanction attached to it?—That is so.

584. It really comes to be a competition of medical views?—Yes. You realise the difficulty there is in seeing a case for half an hour; it is sometimes exceedingly difficult for a doctor on a visit of that kind to form any judgment.

585. Earl Russell: Would he be allowed to see the case-book, or be told what was in it?—I think the medical superintendent would usually tell him all about the case. Doctor Bond, who was a medical superintendent, says that in a case like that he would show the outside doctor all his notes.

586. Have you had a case in your experience of a friend wishing an independent medical examination of a patient under your care?—(Dr. Bond): Yes.

587. Did the medical attendant come in and make the examination?—Yes.

588. Did you accord to him the sort of welcome Sir Frederick indicates is accorded?—Freely.

589. Did you give him facilities?—Full.

590. Did you give him, in fact, access to the case-book of the patient?—Yes.

591. So that that outside doctor had not, of course, been with the patient, but had the history of the case and had the opportunity of examining the case?

—Yes. I may mention, upon the very point you have raised, in which there has been a disagreement between the superintendent and his visiting committee on the one hand, and the family doctor on the other, that there is a case in my mind now where not so very long ago, at the request of the Board, I went down and saw a patient at once.

592. Has that arisen frequently in your experience?—No.

593. It is a rare occurrence, is it?—It is a rare occurrence for that chain of events to occur.

594. But is it a rare occurrence for a difference of opinion to arise between the outside doctor visiting a patient, and the staff doctor?—I should think it is a very rare occurrence. It is not a frequent occurrence in the case of rate-aided patients for doctors to visit; but there is a growing and happy practice—it is not universal, but there are a few places where it exists, and certainly I could name one place in which it is universal—by which, on the admission of a patient, the superintendent, in getting out the history of the case, finds out the name and address of the family doctor, if there is one. On finding out that, he writes him—it is a nice but stereotyped letter, to save time—to say that so-and-so, whom he believes is a patient of his, has been admitted; he tells him very brief facts about the case, and says he would be so much obliged if he would tell him such facts as are known about the patient, and perhaps the family, at his discretion, and if he is near the hospital and can find the time, he would be so glad to welcome him and to discuss the case further with him. I think it is a splendid practice; it is universal in the hospital I am thinking of; and it is one which is going to grow and should create very nice relationships.

595. Earl Russell: The section to which you refer, Sir Frederick, seems to me to be only permissive, not to give a right to pauper patients' friends?—(Sir Frederick Willis): It is permissive as far as we are concerned.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

596. That is to say, they cannot be visited by two medical men unless you assent?—That is so.

597. It is not an absolute right?—It is not an absolute right.

598. I understood you to refer us to it as an absolute right?—Perhaps I did; I may have been wrong. It is not absolute in this sense: there might be cases where it would be very unwise to allow a particular doctor to visit a particular patient.

599. Chairman: I suppose, as I have said, the difficulty in all these matters is that, dealing as you are with abnormal people, a certain measure of discretion must be reposed in responsible bodies?—I think it must: it will lead to very, very great difficulty if you do not.

600. Then the question really for consideration is whether the exercise of these responsible discretionary duties is sufficiently safeguarded. It was said once by Bishop Blomfield that, "When you leave a thing to a man's discretion you equally leave it to his indiscretion."—I hope we have not much indiscretion.

601. What one has to consider is whether there are safeguards which fence about the discretion?—On that the Lunacy Commission was formed to be a very independent Government Department. We have only the patients to look after.

602. That is the feature in considering this legislation, that the element of discretion must be present at some point?—It must. It seems that the best way is to have a Government Department doing this kind of thing and to select men of character and ability to fill the posts. I do not see anything better that can be done. If you were to allow an appeal to the Secretary of State, it seems that you would be going from an expert body to an inexperienced body.

603. And even so it would still be his discretion?—Absolutely.

604. Now, to exhaust the question of the rate-aided patient, you have given us the sections, but there is also discharge to Poor Law institutions, is there not?—Yes, Section 80: "When the visitors of an asylum order a pauper lunatic confined therein to be discharged, except on the application of a relative or friend, they may when they think fit, send a notice in writing, signed by the clerk of the asylum, by post or otherwise, of their intention to discharge the lunatic to a relieving officer of the union in which the lunatic is chargeable, or to the clerk of the local authority liable for his maintenance. Upon receipt of such notice, the relieving officer or clerk shall cause the lunatic upon his discharge to be forthwith removed to the workhouse of the union to which the lunatic is chargeable."

605. The matter is dealt with also, is it not, in Section 25?—Yes; but it is a case "not recovered" which they consider is suitable to be treated in a workhouse as distinguished from an asylum.

606. Then there is discharge by operation of law in the case of the rate-aided patient, analogous to that of the private patient?—Quite analogous, the continuation order and all else apphes.

607. And in the case of the rate-aided patient have the friends of the patient as well as the patient himself very wide facilities for approaching the Commissioners directly?—Very wide.

608. Do you receive a great many letters daily in the case of rate-aided patients?—Yes, far more than in the case of private patients.

609. And do you receive visits from their relatives at your office?—Constantly.

610. Are these persons received?—Yes, and seen by responsible officials; their cases are discussed, and they are helped as far as we can help them.

611. Now before we come to the workhouses, which is our last topic, I just want to pick up one or two small points on the way. In the case of private patients they may have some property which can be administered for their benefit?—That is so.

612. The Act, I think, provides for the management of their property during the period they are under care; I am speaking of Section 116?—Yes.

613. And is provision made for their money being utilised for their benefit?—Yes, that would be the usual thing. (Mr. Macleod): We can report under Section 100. You are speaking of Section 116?

614. Yes. There is another section as well. (Sir Frederick Willis): Section 100 is: "Where the Commissioners report to the Lord Chancellor that they are of opinion that the property of any person detained or taken charge of as a lunatic, but not so found by inquisition, is not duly protected, or that the income thereof is not duly applied for his benefit, or to the same effect, the report shall be filed with the Masters, and shall be deemed to be an application for inquisition supported by evidence, and the alleged lunatic shall have notice of the report from such person as the Judge in Lunacy directs." We have got a right to require information as to the property of any person detained as a lunatic.

615. I was only concerned that we should see there is provision for the means of a patient being applied for the benefit of that patient—There is that provision.

616. Then as regards the institutions in which patients are kept, you have powers, have you not, in connection with the licensing of houses for the reception of patients?—Yes; what are called the metropolitan houses we license. Outside the metropolitan area the justices license them.

617. We will consider in the evidence of the Ministry of Health the procedure as to the passing of plans and so on; but there is machinery which is concerned with seeing that the premises are comfortable and satisfactory from the public health point of view.—Yes. With regard to plans, of course, primarily we start by looking into any plans, alterations proposed, or anything of that nature; we thoroughly investigate them. After that has happened they are passed on to the Minister, who sometimes, I think, again thoroughly investigates them.

618. That is only incidental to our reference in so far as it relates to the care of patients. One wants to know that some authority is concerned with seeing that the premises are, as I put it, comfortable and satisfactory from the public health point of view?—Quite.

619. Then there is machinery in the Act dealing with licensing and an appeal from you to the Secretary of State?—Under Section 221, the Lord Chancellor, on the recommendation of the Board, has power to revoke a license.

620. As regards the places in which one will find the patients, I think we might just get this on the note: Pauper patients are to be found only in either public asylums or workhouses?—Yes. They can, in law, be in licensed houses, and in registered hospitals.

621. Yes, but they are not as a fact?—No.

622. So that at the moment all the pauper patients in this country will be found detained either in public asylums or in Poor Law institutions?—Yes.

623. On the other hand, the private patients will be found, all of them, either in registered hospitals, in licensed houses, in single care, and to some extent in public asylums?—That is quite true.

624. Then we will also find some cases, but you have told us comparatively few, where the boarding-out provision has been taken advantage of?—Yes.

625. Is that pauper patients only?—That is only pauper patients.

626. We find, therefore, some pauper patients boarded out?—Yes. Then those receiving outdoor relief are not certified cases; they are regarded as lunatics, but are not certified; they are given outdoor relief and are living with their friends.

627. Sir David Drummond: I should like some information about the licensed houses and private asylums (we know that new licences are no longer granted), as to whether, in your opinion, there are sufficient, and sufficient accommodation throughout the country; what are the grounds for limiting the number of private asylums?—That is a matter of big general policy. I gather, in 1890, Parliament decided that there should be no more licensed houses, and however full they may be, and some of them are full, the law says there shall not be any more.

628. Earl Russell: The existing ones may be enlarged, I suppose?—Not to take more cases.

Chairman: I think probably there was a feeling at the time that any person who was in charge of a patient for gain might have an interest in the continued detention of the patient; that was the history of the thing.

629. Sir David Drummond: In the district I am familiar with there is only one private home within a radius of 100 miles, and the difficulties in the way of disposing of a private patient are enormous?—I have considerable sympathy with that. As far as I know our private asylums are exceedingly well administered.

630. Chairman: Take the case of a private patient where there is no accommodation for that private patient in any neighbouring licensed house: He is quite well-to-do, but it is desirable that he should be sent to an institution: There is no licensed institution, they are all full. Registered hospitals are also full, or there are none in the neighbourhood, and it is desired to have the patient kept in the neighbourhood of his family. How would such a patient be disposed of?—He would have to go a distance in the case you put.

631. Or to a public asylum.

632. Sir David Drummond: Or to the workhouse?—No, he would not go to the workhouse.

633. Chairman: Has he any right to demand as a private patient to be received into a public asylum?—Yes. However wealthy the person was, if he had got an acute breakdown and required to be removed somewhere at once, no matter why it is, you could give notice to the relieving officer and the relieving officer could take the case to the workhouse.

Sir David Drummond: That is what happens.

634. Lord Eustace Percy: It can only be done through the Poor Law machinery?—Yes, an emergency case like that.

635. I think you told us that certain asylums refused to take private patients?—Yes, some of them.

636. Therefore that person would have to go into an asylum as a rate-aided patient?—Yes. (Dr. Bond): And the cost would be recovered by the guardians from the person's estate. (Sir Frederick Willis): It would not be a charge upon public funds, because although technically he is a pauper, they would recover from him.

637. Chairman: Must not the treatment all be exactly the same in the public asylum?—They get the treatment which the medical man says they ought to get.

638. I mean he would get no advantage of his means. (Dr. Bond): The county mental hospitals that will not have a patient upon a private list are very few indeed, but I know of cases such as Sir David Drummond is referring to, and you cannot call those rare, although I do not think that many are in a position of being rate-aided for long.

639. It is suggested that the matter might be dealt with by treating the case as a single care case, if you could get somebody to undertake it?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes. Of course some cases are not fit for single care; you must occasionally have a padded room to put a case in.

640. Earl Russell: Does single care count as a licensed house?—No sanction is required at all for one case. The person taking the one case has got immediately to inform us that he has got that case, and the case must be under certificate; we must have a copy of the admission documents, and we have to visit the case almost immediately.

641. Chairman: It will not always be possible to provide by single care for a case such as is figured?—(Dr. Bond): Not possible and not desirable. Many of the private cases, although in a well-to-do position, cannot possibly afford the nursing required in single care, because if it is really an acute case it means two nurses by day and one by night—that is three.

642. Of course this is raising a very large question as to the adequacy of accommodation in this country for the various classes of patients?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes. Speaking generally, the accommodation is inadequate, and the position will, I think, be very serious in a comparatively short time.

643. Earl Russell: If I might follow out this single care question for a moment, you have to give no antecedent sanction at all. Do I understand that you may say a house is not a fit one for the patient to be kept in?—We could say it. (Mr. Macleod): A person cannot take more than one single patient without our consent.

644. I am dealing with the one case. Have you power to say that the patient shall not be kept there if you disapprove of the accommodation?—(Sir Frederick Willis): I think we have, but I will look it up.

645. Lord Eustace Percy: Arising out of that point, might I ask this question: You have told us that the reason for the special safeguards in regard to private patients is to prevent the relatives of the private patient getting him put away for financial reasons, but it appears that in practice not only can the relatives of a man of means get him put away as a rate-aided patient with none of those safeguards, but, indeed, they are forced to do so very often by reason of the inadequacy of the private accommodation?—I would not say they are often forced to do so, and, of course, if a wealthy sane man did get to an asylum he would not remain there more than a day or two.

646. Why not?—Because the medical superintendent would see that he did not.

647. But why?—I said a wealthy sane man.

648. I beg your pardon. My submission really was that in view of the inadequacy of the accommodation, in view of the policy generally pursued by public asylums, in view of the fact that you can recover the cost of a pauper patient from the relatives, the substantive reason for any distinction between the private patient and the pauper patient is really gone by the board altogether. There is nothing whatever to prevent any man of means being detained in an asylum through pauper machinery and not through private machinery, and that at the request of the relatives?—Of course, if a wealthy man goes in via the Poor Law, he goes in under the ordinary Poor Law machinery; there is one certificate instead of two, and in so far as those safeguards are concerned, in the case of a private patient, they do not apply to the wealthy man going in via the public machinery; but I should suggest that they are not required in that case, because you are dealing with public officials, and I do not think they would be willing to work with persons who wanted to do wrong things.

649. That is an argument for abolishing the private patient procedure altogether?—Well, yes.

650. Chairman: There is the public point of view that if beds in public asylums are occupied by these persons, the accommodation is taken up, and there may be more charges on public money to extend public asylums?—Quite.

651. Mr. Mackinnon: They only get the cost of maintenance out of them.—You mean if it grew very much.

652. Chairman: Yes.—At present very little of that sort of thing goes on.

653. It is only what we may call surplus accommodation in asylums that is used for this purpose?—Yes. Some institutions provide special accommodation for private patients.

654. In the case of those private patients they pay?—They pay.

655. Mr. Mackinnon: Can they pay more than their cost?—Yes.

656. I was looking at Section 315, and I was wondering whether you could, for profit?—(Mr. Macleod): Section 315 provides that "Every person who, except under the provisions of this Act, receives or detains a lunatic, or alleged lunatic, in an institution for lunatics, or for payment takes charge of, receives to board or lodge, or detains a lunatic or alleged lunatic in an unlicensed house, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." If a person has a patient in an unlicensed house who is a lunatic and should properly be certified and is not certified, that is a contravention of that section, and that person is liable to prosecution.

657. Chairman: Section 271 disposes categorically of the matter?—Quite. Clearly that is the section. Some of these asylums have villas and private places exclusively for these private patients; others have them mixed with pauper patients, and others have separate wards for them.

658. But we must take it from Sir Frederick that his evidence is this, that at the moment, no doubt due to national exigencies, the accommodation for different classes of patients throughout the country is reaching its limit?—(Sir Frederick Willis) Is reaching its limit.

659. And there may be embarrassment in dealing with the appropriate accommodation of the different classes very soon?—Quite. The accommodation of to-day will be quite used up in a year or so by mere growth of population; I do not mean by increase in insanity.

660. Then it may be necessary therefore to reconsider the policy which has arrested the licensed houses which cater for a particular class of patient at the present stereotyped figure of 55?—Yes. In my opinion the private licensed houses perform a very useful purpose in the whole system.

661. It might be put in a sum of proportion, that if 55 was a reasonable number in 1890, it may be necessary to have a larger number in 1924 after a lapse of 34 years?—Quite. Might I say with regard to cases in single care, the point raised by Earl Russell is met under Section 59 (3).

662. Earl Russell: So that if you disapprove of it you can close the house?—We can remove the patient.

663. Chairman: Then with regard to the care of the lunatic, your Board, I understand, has power to investigate the question of the comfort of the patient in the matter of diet and bedding, and all the other ordinary incidents of domestic life, and to see that these are properly attended to?—Yes.

664. You may have complaints about these matters. Would those be investigated?—They would.

665. Have you any duty with regard to rules and regulations for institutions?—(Mr. Macleod): Section 275 is the section.

666. Section 275 deals with the general framing of rules and regulations, and these have to be prepared by the Visiting Committee and submitted to the Secretary of State. I take it that is now the Minister of Health?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes, but via the Board of Control.

667. So you have opportunities of considering and dealing with the comfort of the patients, apart from their medical treatment?—Yes. I would like to say generally about that that after the Commissioners have visited an institution they invariably make a report which is entered in the books of the asylum; a copy of that report comes to the Board of Control; it is read by an experienced clerk and a Commissioner. I read all these reports on asylums, and if any of us think that correspondence ought to be started on some particular point, it is started, and we follow it up.

668. That is on the domestic side of the life of the asylum; but in regard to the treatment of the case what is your jurisdiction?—That would be dealt with in the same reports. If the Commissioners considered that the medical arrangements were insufficient, we should correspond about it.

669. One is aware, of course, that on the initiative of the Ministry of Health, in conjunction with the Board of Control, various meetings and conferences have taken place, and Committees are at present considering matters relative to the internal administration of institutions?—Yes. The Board of Control themselves called a conference when a number of these points were discussed. As the outcome of that conference we formed three departmental Committees, which have practically finished. One was on records and rules to be kept at these institutions; we wished to simplify them as much as possible. One of our Commissioners was Chairman, and that Committee have presented their report, and it is in process of being given effect to. There was another Committee on nursing: Dr. Bond was Chairman of it; it has concluded its report, but it has not yet been published. We have another very important Committee on dietaries, and that report is published.

670. So that over and above the statutory duties incumbent upon you, the Board has been concerning itself with large questions of policy in the administration of asylums?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: May I ask whether this would be the proper time to raise the question of penalties attaching to medical men who retain a certifiable case.

671. Chairman: Yes, I think it would come appropriately now. Throughout the Statutes various duties and obligations are imposed upon various persons. Is the scheme of the Act to constitute disobedience to those obligations a misdemeanour?—Yes.

672. And are penalties of varying degrees of severity imposed for contraventions?—That is so.

673. Do you think that the penalties are adequate?—I should say they are. So far as my experience goes, I should say the provisions of the Act are being carried out scrupulously.

674. Have you any statistics of the number of cases that have come up where proceedings have had to be taken under the Act for contraventions?—I do not think they have been gathered together, but they would be very, very few. If we came across a case of a public official not complying with the Act we should communicate with him always. Usually it would be inadvertence—he had overlooked something, and we should say, "You must be careful to see that that does not occur again." It would be impolitic, directly you came across a case like that, to prosecute the man.

Sir David Drummond: My point was with regard to patients who may be possibly certifiable, and there may be a difference of opinion, and the patient is retained uncertified, and something happens. There is a penalty attaching to it. That is a very difficult question, and I should like to know how the Board views that side of the question, in the case of a private institution.

675. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Does that come under your control at all?—Yes, directly. We can authorise prosecutions.

676. Earl Russell: If there have been so few prosecutions, there would be no difficulty in giving us a return of them for the last five years, would there?—Yes, we could, but the case Sir David mentions is one of detaining a person who, some doctors say, is certifiable, and others say is not certifiable.

677. (Chairman): It arises in this way, that a medical practitioner called in privately may well say: "My patient seems to me to be in a very doubtful state, but it is very undesirable that he should be certified, and I will take the risk of looking after him in his present home." In point of fact he might well have been declared to have been certifiable?—Of course he can remain at home any length of time.

678. Take the case where he is sent to a nursing home: In point of fact he is a certifiable person, but in order to avoid the stigma of certification, the medical practitioner says: "I will shut my eyes to his state, and will just have him treated as an ordinary patient." If he is a certifiable person it is a contravention of the Act to have him retained uncertified in a nursing home?—That is clearly so.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

679. And very serious penalties attach?—Yes, and very often we should not know of the patient.

680. I suggest that we might consider that topic when we come to deal with the second branch of our remit, because it may be that a way of escape from that dilemma is in the treatment of the uncertified patient?—Yes.

681. That class of case at the present moment may involve a contravention of the law, and we shall have to consider whether that case shall be provided for under the voluntary treatment which we shall have to consider later?—Yes.

682. Of course the circumstances may vary infinitely; it may be a border line case?—If we came across a nursing home that was contravening the statute, we should put the papers in the hands of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

683. It would be useful if you would give us the number of prosecutions under the different heads of the Statutes in the last five years?—Yes;* we will do that.

Sir David Drummond: It is a matter of opinion whether the patient is certifiable.

684. Earl Russell: You go to the Lord Chancellor in this case, because the case not being certified, the Commissioners have no powers?—Quite, but he has the power to give us an order to go. Every year in our Annual Report we do set out what prosecutions have taken place during the year, and we can gather them together for you.

685. Chairman: Sir Frederick, let us pass to the question of insane persons in workhouses. The figures you give show that there is a substantial number of insane persons in Poor Law institutions?—Yes.

686. And a number of cases are permanently detained there?—Yes.

687. And others are passing through under the procedure you have indicated?—Yes.

688. I should like to have from you a reference to the Sections under which insane persons are detained, either temporarily or permanently in workhouses?—Section 20 is the first Section, I think.

689. Section 20 deals with the urgency case which you referred to in answer to Lord Eustace Percy a few moments ago?—Yes.

690. The next is Section 21?—Yes; the Justice can send a case temporarily for 14 days only, with no certificate as it were of insanity; it is merely his order. (Mr. Macleod): Under Section 21 (1) the order might be made; under Sub-section (2) the order has in fact been made.

691. In either case for 14 days the patient may be received into a workhouse?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Under Section 20 only for three days, and under Section 21 for 14 days.

692. Section 20 being the urgency case and Section 21 being a more deliberate case?—Yes.

693. Then what about the permanent detention?—That is under Sections 24 and 25. Under Section 24, if the medical officer of the workhouse certifies that the accommodation of the workhouse is sufficient for the proper care and treatment of the patient, and that the patient's condition is such that it is not necessary for the convenience of the patient or of the other inmates that he should be kept separate, he can then be permanently detained in the workhouse with a justice's order.

694. There must be a justice's order?—Yes.

695. And a certificate of an outside doctor, and of the doctor of the workhouse?—Yes.

696. Sir David Drummond: There is no provision with regard to where the justice would see that patient. In some places Dr. Bond knows of, the patient is brought to the police court where the justice is sitting; in others the justice visits the patient at the workhouse?—(Dr. Bond): If I might correct that, Sir David, under the Section you are dealing with at the moment I do not think that a patient is ever brought to the police court. The instances that you allude to, which we Commissioners dislike very much, are those in which it is intended that the patient shall go to a mental hospital, and the justice has got to see the patient either at home or in a Poor Law institution. If the justice cannot go to the home, certain justices in certain neighbourhoods—about four neighbourhoods, taking England and Wales as a whole, have the practice which we object to, of getting the patients to the police court; and we write to them from time to time about it. Of course there are emergency cases which are brought in by the police; the circumstances do not give rise to any objection. But I do not think your point, Sir, arises under Section 24. That Section does not relate to a patient as to whom there is any thought that he will pass on to the mental hospital. Section 24 leads up to permanent detention in the Poor Law institution, and I have never heard of such a patient, when he has to be seen by a justice, being taken to the police court. (Sir Frederick Willis): As regards the workhouse cases that are detained permanently under Section 24, the justice is not obliged to see the case at all; he has to have two medical certificates.

697. Chairman: That is rather like the private patient case?—It is really.

698. There are two certificates, but one is the certificate of a medical practitioner not being an officer of the workhouse, and the other is the certificate of an officer of the workhouse?—Yes. (Mr. Macleod): In addition to the order of the justice and the certificates of two medical men, you have to comply with Form 11, which is contained in the Schedule to the Lunacy Act. This is the order under the Lunacy Act; the order of the justice here does not authorise detention unless something else is done. If you read that Form, it is: "I the undersigned, a Justice of the Peace for . . . being satisfied that A.B., a pauper in the . . . workhouse of the . . . is a lunatic (or idiot or person of unsound mind) and a proper person to be taken charge of under care and treatment in the workhouse, and being satisfied that the accommodation in the workhouse is sufficient for his proper care and treatment separate from the inmates of the workhouse not lunatics (or, that his condition is such that it is not necessary for the convenience of the lunatic or of the other inmates that he should be kept separate) hereby authorise you to take charge of" (that is all) "and, if the workhouse medical officer shall certify it to be necessary, to detain the said A.B. as a patient in your workhouse." He cannot detain him unless they get endorsed upon the back of the order a certificate from the medical officer of the workhouse that it is necessary to detain him.

699. And for his permanent detention there must be a certificate from an outside doctor?—Yes.

700. Now, is it through that avenue that all the patients who are found permanently detained in Poor Law institutions in this country reach their destination?—Yes. (Dr. Bond): Plus Section 25. (Sir Frederick Willis): That applies only when a case is sent to the workhouse from the asylum; but Section 24 is the ordinary way. (Mr. Macleod): And they can be sent there under Section 26 also. (Sir Frederick Willis): Section 26 empowers a visiting committee with the consent of the Board and the Minister of Health to make a contract with the Guardians to take suitable cases into the workhouse.

701. Now, will you tell us what determines whether an unfortunate pauper patient finds his way to a public asylum, a place devoted to that purpose, or finds his way to a Poor Law institution?—I am afraid it is very largely accidental. In some areas practically all the cases go for a part of the time to the workhouse; in other areas practically all the cases go straight to the asylum.

702. It seems to me that a question of policy arises here. Of course, the asylums provide means for treatment and the possible cure of cases?—Yes.

703. And no doubt they are now being more and more equipped with means for treatment?—Much more.

* See Appendix IV.

Sir FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

704. One would think that prima facie the workhouse was not the proper place for the reception of patients who would benefit by those means of cure, but would be a more proper place for cases which are really hopeless, and where the patient cannot benefit by treatment at all?—The chronic harmless case—he is often happier in the workhouse than he would be in the asylum.

705. But surely it is desirable that there should be some means of discrimination, so that the kind of patient who can benefit from the equipment of an asylum should not be relegated to a workhouse where there are none of those advantages?—We entirely agree.

706. Sir David Drummond: I think it is very much a question of lack of accommodation?—It may partly be that.

707. Chairman: And yet the accommodation which is available might be occupied by persons in asylums who ought to be in the workhouse?—Quite.

708. It does seem to me that we are touching here upon a point of very considerable importance?—You are. (Mr. Macleod): The only means of removing them from the workhouse is provided under subsection 6 of Section 24. If the medical officer does not sign the certificate, or if an order is not made by the justice, or "if after such an order has been made, the lunatic ceases to be a proper person to be detained in a workhouse," then the relieving officer takes steps to have him removed to an asylum. The only other power is under Section 60, which is the limited power given to the Commissioners and which is very seldom exercised, but it has been exercised: "Where, upon the visitation of a workhouse by any two or more Commissioners, it appears to them that a lunatic or alleged lunatic therein is not a proper person to be allowed to remain in a workhouse, they may by order direct the lunatic to be removed to an institution for lunatics, and every such order shall have the same effect as a summary reception order."

709. I gather that you would welcome consideration by the Commission of this particular matter?—(Sir Frederick Willis): I should certainly, very much. Put shortly, I think the position is this: These cases that go to the workhouse very often are not seen at once by a person who is really skilled in dealing with mental cases. Sometimes, of course, there is a man of that kind, but we are not at present securing the best use of the total accommodation of this country, and unless it is under expert medical direction I do not see how you can secure it.

710. I suggest that as this topic is one of considerable importance, it might assist our deliberations if you would hand us in a memorandum on the subject of the utilisation of workhouse accommodation on the one hand, and of asylum accommodation on the other, because I think we ought to give you an opportunity of presenting to us a considered view on that matter. You might prepare a short memorandum for us on that matter, which we should carefully consider?—Yes; we will let you have a memorandum opening up the subject, but as to exactly in what way the difficulty can best be removed, it would be much more helpful if you had before you the views of the various witnesses whom you will hear.

711. Yes. We expect we shall have the pleasure of seeing you here again later on; at this stage we wanted to get into our minds an outline of the general system. As this is a matter of reform, you might consider this topic, because I and my colleagues attach importance to it?—(Mr. Macleod): Might I say as regards patients in workhouses, that none of the documents are sent to us, and there is no continuation order.

712. Earl Russell: I think all these differences ought to be brought out in your memorandum, so that we shall have them all before us?—Certainly.

713. Chairman: I just want to have from you now, to complete the matter, what are your powers and duties with reference to patients permanently detained in workhouses?—(Sir Frederick Willis): First of all, under Section 203, "Any one or more of the Commissioners shall, on such day or days, and at such hours in the day, and for such length of time as he or they may think fit, visit all such workhouses in which there is or is alleged to be any lunatic, as the Commissioners by any resolution direct, and shall inquire whether the provisions of the law have been carried out, and also as to the dietary, accommodation, and treatment of the lunatics, and shall report in writing thereon to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners shall forward a copy of every such report to the Local Government Board." Now our visiting staff has been quite too small ever since I have had anything to do with the Board of Control, to visit these workhouses as often as I think they ought to be visited from this point of view. The Ministry of Health, of course, visit these places through their General Inspectors, and I think they are under statutory obligation to visit once a year. When we visit we make a report on our visit and sometimes, perhaps frequently, point out a number of things that we think exceedingly unsatisfactory. We send that report to the Ministry of Health; I think they would generally send it on to the guardians concerned, but I am sorry to say that very often nothing happens.

714. Earl Russell: I thought you were bound to send it on to the guardians?—No, we only send it to the Ministry of Health.

715. Chairman: You have no power to enforce your recommendations?—We have no power to enforce the matter.

716. Then this is a matter really upon which we must examine some guardians?—Yes, and the Ministry of Health will tell you better than I can what they actually do with those reports.

717. Now a question with regard to another matter. What about the discharge of persons from those institutions?—Under Section 81 the guardians have power to discharge any lunatic detained in a workhouse. We have no power to discharge a case, and I do not think anybody else has got any power; but of course here again the guardians have no inducements to detain a case at their expense—no financial inducement anyhow.

718. Does the code with regard to letters and communications, and so on, apply to these patients?—No. A lunatic in a workhouse has no right to write to us and have his letter sent unopened. Whether he has the right to write to the Ministry of Health or not, I cannot say. They will tell you.

719. Is it not rather striking that a patient may accidentally find his way either to a workhouse or to a public asylum? If his fortune has taken him to the public asylum he there finds, subject to your supervision, protection by a code as to his letters, whereas if an accident has relegated him to a Poor Law institution, he has none of those advantages?—Yes, I quite agree. Undoubtedly there are many cases in workhouses which ought to be in mental hospitals to-day, and there are many cases in mental hospitals who would be more satisfactorily dealt with in Poor Law institutions.

720. Do you consider that it would be desirable to have a more exhaustive series of statutory regulations for lunatics applicable to Poor Law institutions?—It is, of course, a very big question to say how that real difficulty should be removed.

721. We are there, of course, trenching upon the province of the guardians and the Poor Law administration?—Of course there has been talk lately of the abolition of the Poor Law. If any big scheme like that were carried out, this is one of the questions that would be dealt with.

722. I propose, if my colleagues agree, that we should postpone meantime hearing your evidence with regard to the early treatment of uncertified cases, and that we should have an opportunity, if you are agreeable, of seeing you later, after we have had the advantage of hearing the criticisms and so on which may be addressed to your Department. Therefore, I do not propose, if my colleagues agree, to carry my examination of your Department through you further to-day. I suggest that if any of my colleagues wish to ask you questions they should now do so. As I understand that Lord Russell has to leave for a public engagement, perhaps he would put his questions first.

723. Earl Russell: I do not know, Sir Frederick, whether it is my inattention or not, but I am still not quite clear about the Board of Control. First of all would you give us the Section of the Mental Deficiency Act which created the Board?—Section 22.

724. Now could you tell us shortly what the composition of the Board is, because to this day I do not know how many members there are, or how it is composed?—To-day we have three honorary Commissioners: Miss Darwin, Sir Marriott Cooke, and Mr. Forestier Walker, M.P. We have on the medical side as paid Commissioners, Drs. Bond, Rotherham, and Branthwaite. On the legal side we have Mr. Macleod, K.C., Col. Hodgson, and a vacancy, and we have got a lady, Mrs. E. F. Pinsent: that is to say, including myself, there are seven paid Commissioners to-day.

725. Are all those Lunacy Commissioners?—We are all the same; we all have the same powers.

726. An inspection of an asylum can be carried out by any one of those members?—Except that sometimes the section says a visit shall be paid by two Commissioners, one of whom shall be a legal and one a medical Commissioner.

727. Do you interpret that to mean two of your paid Commissioners?—Not necessarily. For instance, Sir Marriott Cooke is a doctor and was a permanent Commissioner before he was an honorary one.

728. With regard to your relation to the Ministry of Health, may I sum it up in this way: In the exercise of your powers and functions you are independent, and are only dependent upon the Ministry so far as estimates and finance are concerned?—As regards lots of our powers, we are of course under the Statute quite independent. As regards plans of asylums and contracts they require the sanction of the Ministry of Health, but we invariably negotiate the business beforehand, indeed we must under the Statute, and send our recommendations on to the Ministry. Our relations with the Ministry are of the most cordial character.

729. I am not suggesting they are not, but I really wanted to know to what extent if any you are under the Ministry of Health. The answer is that you are practically independent, in fact, entirely independent except in regard to expenditure, plans, and that sort of thing?—Yes. Of course the Lord Chancellor is also one of the Ministers who is concerned with our Department; he appoints the legal Commissioners, for instance.

730. He also appoints Judges of course. But having appointed, he can give you no orders?—But for certain purposes we have to get his sanction.

731. Now just to come to this question of documents. The documents sent to you in regard to patients admitted to asylums are copies?—Yes.

732. And as regards the disclosure of these documents, you could be compelled by the Court to disclose them in a legal proceeding?—Yes.

733. Let me take the case of a brother who has been in an asylum, certified, has recovered, and desires to bring an action for his detention against his brother, who he says has been responsible. In a case of that sort you would disclose the documents in Court?—Yes. (Mr. Macleod): We do not take the objection now.

734. Then I wanted to ask you about the pauper lunatic. As I understand the Act and what you have told us, and the Chairman I think brought it out too, a man who has been paying his rent and paying his way, and who does not owe anybody anything and is earning his wages, may suddenly be called a pauper when he comes to be certified, although in the ordinary sense of the word he is not a pauper at all?—Yes,

735. Supposing when he has got to the asylum his relations pay the full amount that the Guardians ask for as a contribution, he still is classed as a pauper?—Yes, I do not think we could compel them not to do so. The London County Council do, I believe, class them as private if they make some agreed contribution.

736. I do not think paupers are under any disability as to voting and so on?—No, I do not think so.

737. Now Section 13 is the half-way section, between the private patient and the pauper patient?—Yes, you might put it in that way.

738. In this case he is not a pauper and he is not wandering at large, but he is deemed by somebody to be a lunatic?—Yes.

739. And that somebody tells the relieving officer?—Yes.

740. And then he gets into the asylum. Now, when he gets there, you say he is treated as a pauper?—He has got to be. (Mr. Macleod): Under Section 3 of the Act of 1891.

741. In his case who pays for the certification and so on? Do the guardians pay when action is taken under that section?—(Sir Frederick Willis): The guardians would pay, yes. There is a section in the Act saying they shall pay.

742. So that that would be medical poor relief in the ordinary sense, I suppose?—(Mr. Macleod): If it is medical poor relief he is a pauper, and he may be a pauper under Section 18. (Sir Frederick Willis): I should doubt whether the fact that the guardians pay for the examination would make him a recipient of Poor Law relief.

743. It is rather comparable to paying the fees for a confinement?—Yes; that is rather a nice point. (Mr. Macleod): Section 285 provides for the expenses in the case of a pauper or not.

744. It provides that the guardians shall pay it?—Yes; the justices can make an order for it. (Sir Frederick Willis): But I should hardly have thought that the fact that they paid those fees made the man a pauper.

745. The scheme of the Act draws such a curious distinction all through between the pauper and the private patient?—It does.

746. Chairman: There is rather a curious provision in Section 18: "A person who is visited by a medical officer of the union, at the expense of the union, is, for the purposes of this section, to be deemed to be in receipt of relief" even although he is ultimately going to recoup the cost?—Yes, but these two certifying doctors are not medical officers of the union.

747. Earl Russell: But they are paid by the union?—It is a question whether Section 18 would require that the services of those two doctors should be regarded as affording medical relief.

748. Now, as I understand, the scheme of the Act for taking charge of a patient seems to start by looking at the patient as being created by and under the charge of somebody, either a petitioner or somebody standing in the position of a petitioner, and he seems to be both the person who sets the law in motion and who has the power of requiring discharge?—The relieving officer has nothing to do with discharge.

749. No, but the guardians have power of requiring discharge?—Nothing to do with discharging cases in an asylum.

750. As I understood it, we had the section just now?—"The guardians of the union to which a workhouse belongs may make an order for the discharge of any lunatic detained therein."

751. That is Section 81?—Yes.

752. I thought there was a section under which they had power to discharge their own patients?—If they are in a workhouse, but not if they are in a public asylum.

753. If a lunatic is in a public asylum the guardians who are paying for him have no power to require his removal from there to a workhouse or to discharge him?—No.

Sir FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

754. The view taken of a petitioner apparently is that he puts the lunatic away and is responsible for him, and he apparently on his own motion may require the discharge of a private patient at any time, subject to the barring certificate?—That is true.

755. To some extent the same power exists with regard to the pauper patients?—No. A relative or friend can apply for the case to be discharged. It is Section 79, I think.

756. Section 49 was the one I was thinking of?—I beg your pardon. That applies to any case.

757. I rather gather there that if any relative or friend or a friend who is not a relative satisfied the Commissioners and asks for an examination by two medical practitioners, and they are of opinion that the patient may without risk or injury to himself or the public be discharged, he must be discharged?—It is not that he must be, he may be. We have discretion.

758. Would you in fact exercise that power?—We should consider the case.

759. But you mean, apart from the certificate, you yourselves would consider whether you thought it would be without risk or injury to the public or to the patient?—Yes, but we lean towards discharging the case rather than detaining it.

760. Would you look at the last line of that section?—If you decide that the patient is to be discharged, do I understand that section to mean that you cannot discharge him until ten days have expired?—I should think that is the reading of it.

761. "May order the patient to be discharged at the expiration of ten days from the date of the order"?—Yes.

762. Can you tell me of any reason why you should not have the power to discharge him at once if you think proper?—No; I do not see why we should not.

763. There is no person likely to intervene in those ten days, is there?—No. I do not know the origin of that "ten days."

764. It seems to me a curious provision.—If adequate arrangements are immediately available for that case I see no reason why, having decided that he should be discharged, he should not be discharged forthwith. In some instances it would take some time to make arrangements.

765. It says you are to discharge him at the expiration of ten days?—Yes.

766. Chairman: It might take more than ten days to get arrangements made for him?—Yes, it might.

767. Earl Russell: Now, as to the ordinary discharge of patients, I think you know that I have had a good deal to do with London asylums, and was Chairman at Hanwell. There the Visiting Committee consists of about five, and two would be occupied in visiting the asylum and the others would be seeing any patient recommended for discharge; their powers in that case being to discharge a patient on two signatures of the members of the visiting committee, with the medical superintendent's consent?—Yes.

768. And as you know, I think, it is also their custom to consider what letters written by the patients should be sent on, other than those which have to be sent on?—Yes.

769. I daresay you know that the correspondence of these people is very often voluminous?—Very, and very objectionable, some of it.

770. They are of course themselves a public authority—the visiting committee, and they have an immediate public responsibility, I mean a direct public responsibility to the electors and to a public authority?—Yes.

771. And they, of course, have an opportunity of seeing at these regular visits what is going on in the asylum, and what patients ought to be discharged?—Yes.

772. May I just give you one or two cases about "trial" which occur to me as illustrating how the system works. I recollect a case of a man who had a delusion, a grievance, which led him to break a certain window. The time came round for what you call one of these continuation reports. The Medical Superintendent said that it was quite impossible to certify that the man had shown any signs of insanity in the asylum during the past three months. In those circumstances if he sent up a continuation report of that sort you would have felt bound to discharge the man?—We should have corresponded about it, certainly.

773. He presented that aspect to the Visiting Committee, and said, "I do not know that the man is cured, but in the circumstances I recommend you to discharge him." You would have felt that that was the natural course to take?—I should have thought so.

774. He was discharged and the next day he broke the same window. He was taken by the police, re-certified at public expense, brought back to the same asylum, and six months later the same series of events happened. The Medical Superintendent said his conduct in the asylum was perfect. On that occasion we took further precautions. There was the method of trial which we employed. We found a relative living in Cornwall. We sent this man on a month's trial to this relative in Cornwall. We saw him safely off from Paddington, and we knew he got there. Four days later he broke the window again. That is a case which illustrates the difficulty of saying for certain that a patient is cured, and one of the difficulties that these continuation reports impose?—Quite.

775. Then to illustrate another of the uses of sending a person on trial—this illustrates two of your points—I recollect a case in which a husband was discharged on trial to the care of his wife, and before the month was up she came back and said that his health was bad, and asked us to take him back, and we took him back. That was a case of course where both parties were anxious that the trial should be successful, but the trial showed that in the circumstances of ordinary life it would not work, and that, of course you would agree, is one of the great objects of trial?—Certainly.

776. There is a great deal of difference in the effect on a patient when taken from the surroundings of an institution and entrusted to the care of his family or relatives. On the other hand, our experience as regards the people normally let out on trial was that a very large percentage were discharged at the end of the month permanently cured; that was in my time. Now I want to ask you just one question about a different subject, and that is the procedure by inquisition. There was a suggestion made that it was antiquated and not of much use?—On that I should like to say that I know very little about the procedure by inquisition; we have nothing to do with it.

777. I just want to put this particular phase of it. On a particular inquisition you may find a person able to control himself, but unable to control his property?—You can deal with that under Section 116, without that procedure. Under Section 116 (1) (d) the powers and provisions of the Act with regard to the management and administration of property may be applied "to every person not so detained and not found a lunatic by inquisition, with regard to whom it is proved to the satisfaction of the Judge in Lunacy that such person is through mental infirmity arising from disease or age incapable of managing his affairs"—so that under that section, without finding them to be lunatics, you can do it.

778. I am much obliged to you for referring me to that Section, because it really answers my question. You can do it without this elaborate procedure?—Yes.

779. Now I want to ask you some questions as to exactly what a patient can do who finds himself in an asylum and is satisfied that he is sane and wrongfully detained. He can write to certain people, as we know, and his letters must go?—Yes.

Sir FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

780. That would lead to an inquiry by you?—Yes.

781. If he is a rich man and a private patient, can he send for his own solicitor and instruct him to take action?—I should think there would be no obstruction placed in the way of seeing his solicitor. At any rate, if he wrote to us and said he had wanted to see his solicitor and the medical superintendent had declined to allow him, we should take action.

782. If a man wrote a letter, apparently sane, and said, "I desire to consult my solicitors," if the medical superintendent had not permitted it, you would permit it?—We should very carefully enquire into it. We should have to hear what the medical superintendent had to say first. But I can hardly conceive that in a case like that the solicitor would not get to the man.

783. Would you give him access to his solicitor if the medical superintendent said he was quite irresponsible?—No, certainly not. The case you are assuming is that of a man who thinks he is sane. We should not place the slightest obstacle in the way, although we might think the man might be quite insane.

784. I want to know what rights he would have?—The man would first ask the medical superintendent to let him have his solicitor to see him. If he did not allow it and the man wrote to us, we should want very strong reasons indeed to support the medical superintendent in refusing to allow that solicitor to go.

785. I should be glad if you would be good enough to give me any reason that would be sufficient not to allow him to go?—If the medical superintendent said, "This man has seen his solicitor several times, and after every visit the man has become very excitable and distressed; it has necessitated the man being put in a padded room" and that kind of thing. If he says, "On medical grounds I think it is very undesirable that the man should see the solicitor just now," on the next visit of the Commissioners to the institution that case would be very carefully enquired into.

786. And in a case like that would you also communicate with the solicitor, if he had seen the man several times?—I think we should. We should say, "Is there so far as you know any reason why you should see this patient now?"

787. Now take the case of an application to see his own medical man?—I am sure the medical superintendent would always allow his own medical man to see him.

788. I want you to assume he did not?—If he did not, we should take the same sort of action, but I can hardly conceive any case where we should not require the medical superintendent to admit that man's own private doctor.

789. Has a patient in an asylum got power to instruct his solicitor to go for a writ of habeas corpus? (Mr. Macleod): I should think he has; there is nothing to prevent it.

790. What can the pauper patient do? He of course cannot send for solicitors and doctors. He can apply to have a relation visiting him, or a friend to come and see him?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Certainly he could.

791. Supposing he said he did not want his wife, his son or his daughter, but wanted his friends?—There is no difficulty in his friends coming to see him.

792. Then a friend could apply under Section 49 for a medical examination, which he would have to pay the cost of?—Quite.

793. Now you also recognise the same sort of right as the petitioner has in the friends of a patient—I mean the immediate relations can ask for a patient's discharge?—Yes.

794. Even if he is not cured?—Yes. They have got to satisfy the visiting committee that proper arrangements will be made for looking after the case.

The visiting committee have a certain responsibility to look after the interests of the patients under their care.

795. I fully appreciate that. I just wanted to know what they can do. They can remove the patient if they know there is a proper home for him, although the medical superintendent advises the visiting committee that it is not for the patient's advantage?—Yes.

796. The friends can take him into their care?—(Mr. Macleod): They can discharge without the consent of the medical superintendent.

797. Am I not right in saying that the lunatic's own immediate relations, if they satisfy the visiting committee that he is a proper case to go, can insist upon his discharge?—This is Section 79: "When application is made to the Visiting Committee of an asylum by a relative or friend of a pauper lunatic confined therein requiring that he may be delivered over"—

798. Those are the words I am laying stress on, "requiring that he may be delivered over."—"Requiring" only means "asking" there. (Sir Frederick Willis): I do not think there is an absolute right on the part of the friend to require that the patient should be handed over.

799. You think there still remains complete discretion in the visiting committee not to discharge him if they think it is not for his benefit?—I think so. The Section says "if they think fit."

800. It very often is not for the patient's benefit, I quite agree with you?—That is so.

801. Now about the notices that are put up: Did I understand you to say that notices were put up in every public asylum, practically?—In regard to several of these sections, such as Section 79, which we are referring to, we tell the asylum authorities that on the admission of a patient they are to send to the relatives and friends copies of these sections. What we felt was this, that if the sections were posted up in a room where the patient was seen by his friends, it might lead to difficulty. The patient sees it written up, and he says, "Look here, you can have me out."

802. Yes, I appreciate that, but the notices about letters are put up as a rule?—(Dr. Bond): In registered hospitals and in licensed houses it may be said that in every sitting-room, every room where they should or could be with advantage posted, they are posted; that in the county and borough mental hospitals, in the wards in which private patients are, they are posted; but it would be impossible to say that they are posted in all the other wards, where, perhaps, only rate-aided patients are. But it is a growing practice, and the number of wards in which they are not posted is getting less and less. There are, however, quite a number of wards where I am quite sure there is no notice.

803. Should I not be right in saying that as a general rule the inhabitants of these asylums know quite well they are asylums?—Yes.

804. Therefore, would it be inflicting any fresh injury upon them to put up notices saying they could send letters?—None whatever, provided the notice is suitably worded.

805. Does the Board not take the view that this notice should be put up wherever there is a patient?—We have never made that order, but we have verbally at our visits for a considerable time suggested the desirability of these letter boxes and notices; we have no power to make an order.

806. And does the Act not provide for them being put up?—Not unless there are private patients; but verbally we have recommended it a great deal.

807. That seems to me to be a lacuna in the Act, does it not, if that is not compulsory for public patients?—Yes. (Sir Frederick Willis): There are lots of things it is desirable to do that it is not necessary to put into a statute, where you find they are gradually being done.

808. I was asking whether you do not think the Act ought to so provide in the case of all patients?—

Sir FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

(Dr. Bond): Personally, I like to see these notices and boxes everywhere.

809. There is an expression you used yesterday about out-door relief for the insane. I understood you to say this morning that it was for patients who were not certified?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Not certified.

810. But you did give it us in the return of the number of patients in receipt of relief?—Not in the number of patients in institutions. I think I did give you the figures in out-door relief; there were 3,554.

811. Those are not certified?—They are not certified.

812. Are they being treated as if they were medical cases?—Yes; they would be seen by the district medical officer.

813. They are not really under you, are they?—They are not under us at all. (Mr. Macleod): We have a return of them. (Sir Frederick Willis): They are part of the insane population, and we have to give statistics of them.

814. Are these harmless people?—In the view of the doctor I suppose they are. (Mr. Macleod): The sections referring to them are Sections 201 and 202 of the Act.

815. But these refer to lunatics, and a lunatic means a certified person?—Not necessarily; they are not certified.

816. You mean that in Sections 201 and 202 the pauper lunatics mentioned are not certified?—Yes, not certified. It is Section 202 really. (Sir Frederick Willis): The last part of it says practically that the medical officer must give notice when it appears to the medical officer that a pauper lunatic ought to be sent to an asylum.

817. They are presumably not certifiable, although they might be?—(Mr. Macleod): If they are living with friends they need not be certified. (Dr. Bond): There is no offence against Section 315.

818. Now I want to ask you about keeping a lunatic in your own house in the case of a rich man. Do I understand that a rich man or a rich woman could be kept uncertified in their own house?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes, but not in your house, for instance.

819. However mad?—However mad.

820. Without being certified?—Yes.

821. And without any report being made to you?—Without our knowing of it at all. (Dr. Bond): It is not a question of rich or poor; it is anybody. (Mr. Macleod): A wife can reside with her husband, or a child with the parent without being certified.

822. And although the relieving officer knows of this, it is not a case where he could lay information, assuming they were properly looked after?—Nobody can interfere, either rich or poor.

823. Not if the lunatic is a dangerous one?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Not if he is under proper care and control.

824. If there is any sign of his breaking out?—A public official could come in.

825. I have only one more question: With regard to mechanical restraint, do you call a padded room mechanical restraint?—(Mr. Macleod): No; that may be seclusion if the door is closed.

826. Then mechanical restraint in any other sense is almost extinct?—(Dr. Bond): I should not like to say that. The extent of its use is certainly small, and I think that more and more it is being confined to what one might call mechanical restraint of a purely medical nature, such, for instance, as the use of what is known as the wet pack, which is really a means of hydrotherapy, but it comes within the definition of mechanical restraint. If you were to take the number of hours per year in which patients have been subjected to mechanical restraint you would find that it was largely made up of that, and the small modicum of restraint represented by the use of the soft padded gloves put on to prevent mutilations and scratches and so on. But the use of what is called the straight jacket is getting less and less, and is quite rare.

827. You would not call merely thick clothing that could not be torn mechanical restraint?—No. That does not come within the definition of "mechanical restraint" at all. That, I may say in passing, is also certainly being used less than it was.

828. It has to be used in a padded room very often?—Certainly.

829. Sir David Drummond: What interpretations do the Board put upon the provision to the effect that doctors must see and certify the patient independently?—I do not know that the Board as a Board have ever considered that. We may each have our own opinions.

830. You know how it is interpreted; a doctor brings another doctor, and he just retires out of the room, or even goes to the far corner of the room. I wanted to know your view in the matter?—I can say this, that the Board are most particular on this point in seeing that the law is carried out as laid down about separate examination; but that we have ever discussed it among ourselves, as to whether this is right, or whether it is desirable that the two should consult, I do not know.

831. Chairman: The certificate says an independent examination. Do you, as a Board, go behind that statement and require a degree of independence?—If we see any evidence that possibly there has not been that independent examination, we make enquiry to see that it has in point of fact been independent.

832. It would appear on the face of the certificate if there were any want of independence?—One occurred a few mornings ago, and it led to correspondence and enquiry on the point. In the result it turned out that it was an entirely independent examination.

833. Sir David Drummond: The second doctor may be in the room at the time the independent examination is being made, or in the house, or just outside the door. Or do you imagine that the doctors visit the patient at a separate time?—We imagine that the examination of the patient by two doctors is separate, but we do not go into the question at all as to whether the two are far away. (Mr. Macleod): If you look at the certificate you will see that in many cases they are made on different dates. (Sir Frederick Willis): If a doctor said he had examined the man separately from the other doctor we should not question it.

834. Mr. Mackinnon: Of course there are a tremendous lot of documents coming to you every day, such as admission documents, reports and masses of letters?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes.

835. Do you have a staff of clerks who read the letters first, or are they handed to someone who is more responsible?—The letters would go to a clerk first. Of course there are a lot of letters which are addressed personally to me or to Mr. Macleod, or Dr. Bond, and they would come to us. I get at least every morning a dozen, and I make a practice of opening and reading them; some I deal with and some I pass on to the clerk, who would pass them back to me again after dealing with them.

836. I suppose there are a heap of letters which on the face of them are not worth considering?—Yes.

837. And I suppose anything of a nature which the clerk cannot deal with he hands over to someone who is more responsible?—We have a Principal Clerk of the Lunacy Division, and he is responsible for seeing that everything is dealt with properly.

838. Is your staff provided under the Civil Service Commission?—Yes, they are Civil Servants. We have no First Division clerk, the office is not recruited in that way—we have no Class I clerks at all.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

839. But they are appointed like the clerks of any other Government office?—Yes, just the same, and those holding important positions have been with us many years and are very highly trained in the technicalities of the thing.

840. What sort of staff have you, approximately, in numbers?—We have 35 clerks altogether of one sort and another, but many of them are engaged on Mental Deficiency work.

841. Miss Symons: On the second page of your précis you mention various matters which you have under consideration, and it might be rather useful if you could tell us briefly what statutory powers, or what control you have over questions of internal administration, such as staff, and so on?—We have no statutory power to say, “You shall do this,” or “You shall do that, you shall appoint a medical man,” or “You shall have a particular dietary or a laboratory.” As a matter of fact I think we gain more from not having any statutory power. My experience of Government Departments is that when you have power to mandamus local authorities you very often start a sort of fight, and we do very much more by simply advising them, and we find the response to any recommendations of the Board is very good, and our suggestions are generally accepted.

842. Referring to Section 52 of the Act, do those powers relate to your Commissioners?—Yes. (Mr. Macleod): There are no paupers in licensed houses or registered hospitals. (Sir Frederick Willis): They do not go to these places, so the section has no operation. We cannot regulate the diet of paupers in public asylums. We have a duty when we visit there to inquire into the diet and make a report and follow it up by correspondence.

843. So that if you have any criticism to make on such a question as diet, or think the staff is inadequate, you can only make recommendations and give advice?—That is so, but that is really a very effective way of dealing with the thing. (Mr. Macleod): Amongst other things we do is to see the patients have their dinners and teas, and we see exactly how they are served, and what quantities they get; we know their diets every day, and whether they have a fixed diet or otherwise, and if we are not satisfied with what we see we make a report in the visiting book, which is forwarded to the Board, and action is taken. (Dr. Bond): And I may supplement that by saying that we discuss these matters very freely with the medical superintendent, and sometimes we meet accidentally the members of the visiting committee, which gives us a further opportunity of verbal discussion, and verbal discussion can often do a great deal more than bare correspondence.

844. Mrs. Mathew: What is the procedure on the reception of a pauper patient into an asylum?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Perhaps Dr. Bond will explain in detail what takes place.

845. Yes, I want to know how the doctors satisfy themselves as to the condition of the patient?—(Dr. Bond): Immediately on arrival a medical officer—not necessarily the superintendent—sees the patient. The patient is undressed and put into bed either in the dormitory of the admission ward, or better still, a custom which is growing, in a clinical room attached to that ward; a preliminary physical examination of the patient is made there while the person or persons accompanying the patient to the hospital remain on the premises. They are not kept on the premises, but they have the opportunity, and are invited to remain while the examination is being conducted. That examination is specially directed to such matters as the state of cleanliness, or evidence of injury—every trivial injury is noted, bruises or scratches, or any evidence of recent or old injury. All these matters are noted there and then, and, in addition, a rapid physical examination of the patient is made with the aid of the stethoscope and other means.

No detailed examination is made then, but the examination is sufficient to at once describe in a small carbon duplicate notebook the state of cleanliness of the patient and any injuries, whether the health of the patient is good, bad, indifferent, or weak, and so on; and if the patient has been brought in on a stretcher or an ambulance because of bad health that would be noted also. Occasionally a patient is brought in actually under mechanical restraint and, if so, that is noted on a slip, a duplicate of which is handed to the person bringing the patient. Then ordinarily the patient is bathed, unless the doctor gives a direction to the contrary. You may take it there is no rule about it, but it is the universal practice to put the patient to bed in an appropriate dormitory, or in a single room in association with the dormitory. Then the patient remains in bed for at least a week, though not necessarily so, because we have been encouraging more and more treatment in the open air, if possible; and you will now find in a great many institutions there are glass-roofed verandahs where the patient spends a week, which time very often extends to several weeks according to the nature of the case. During that week a much more elaborate examination is entered into which may take up a whole week a bit at a time. For instance, it may be that on the staff of the hospital there is one man who is experienced in the examination of the eye, and he will probably do that one day; then again many of the neurological cases require an examination of the fluid which exists in association with the spinal cord, and that is done, or attempted to be done, during the week as far as possible, by a doctor who undertakes that kind of work. Then there are such things as counting the blood corpuscles, and the temperature would be watched throughout the week night and morning, and there are many other particulars of examination which I will not detail now, but it goes on all through the week. In the course of that week a statement, not a certificate, has to be sent to us of the mental and bodily condition of the patient, and that really in nine cases out of ten is done on the last day—that is, the seventh day. There is a tendency to postpone it as far as possible in order to make it as complete as possible. In the course of that time the mental state, by means of talking to and watching the patient, is investigated, and any changes are noted. I think that covers the main points. In addition, visitors are not encouraged to visit a patient under a month, although patients are encouraged to talk to the doctors, but that is not done until some later time.

846. So that the previous history of the patient, I take it, is well gone into?—Yes, it is a difficult matter, but efforts are made to get the previous history, though in some cases there is almost a blank. There are forms, and every hospital has its own form which it sends out, and sometimes they are never returned, or if they are returned they are so imperfectly filled in as to be useless, and the only chance is to wait until a responsible relative comes to see the patient, and then thrash the previous history out by cross-examination.

847. Is that examination repeated in the case of a pauper patient?—Yes.

848. At what intervals?—The rules made by the Commissioners are that entries are made in what is known as the Case Book, which may be a big book, or which may consist of loose sheets—it depends on what the clinical system of the hospital is. An entry has to be made once a week until the patient has been in the hospital a month, and after that once a month until—the words are rather indistinct, but it is sometimes until three or four or six months. Many mental hospitals ignore that altogether and make notes monthly, or even more frequently, for a year. At any rate there must be three monthly notes, and after that every patient must be noted up once a quarter. No breach of the rules is involved if this is not done. The notes do not contain a repetition of the physical examination, but there is a rule that all important changes should be noted. We think it would be medically inadvisable to prescribe exactly the time when a special physical examination is made, because we think it better to leave that to the discretion of the medical man, as you get far better results in that way than by attempting to describe at a particular date the condition of the heart and lungs, and so on, of the patient. We do enjoin weighing once a quarter, which is an important guide to a physical examination.

Sir FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

849. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I want to ask a question about the certification of private patients. What is the percentage of private patients as compared with rate-aided patients?—I have never worked it out, but on 1st January last there were 14,196 private patients (including 4,775 service patients) and 95,049 State-aided.

850. An alleged lunatic has the option of being interviewed by a judicial authority other than the one making the order?—Yes, there is no option on the part of the medical superintendent who is bound to draw the private patient's attention to his rights.

851. So that you do not go back to the man who made the order previously?—No, he would not be eligible under the Statute.

852. So that the judicial authority who expresses an opinion on the mental condition of a patient is expressing it on the state of mind at a period which is subsequent?—Yes.

853. As regards the two medical certificates, if you send back one of the medical certificates as not being properly filled up does it go back to the medical man who has failed to fill it up properly?—Yes.

854. Supposing that that medical man is away, what is done then?—It would depend—we might come to the conclusion to take no further action and pass the order; on the other hand, if it was ab initio bad on the face of it and in fact contained no statement at all of mental disorder, and he could not be got at to rectify it, we should declare the order invalid.

855. So that you would have to have both certificates again?—Yes, we should start over again.

856. How often has it happened that the first certificate being given by a man who is well acquainted with the person, the second certificate is given by a man who really is not an expert in mental disorders?—The certificate first mentioned is not always given by the medical attendant, but it is not always practicable and sometimes there is no regular medical attendant.

857. But it is desirable?—It is desirable, and if it is not done the reason why it is not has to be stated. I think the answer as to how often it is given by an expert in mental disorders depends very much on the locality. Taking the metropolis, it is frequently found that the second medical certificate is that of a well-known specialist in mental disorders, but when you get away from the metropolis, unless you happen to go to an area where there is a number of experts in mental disorders, it is very infrequent.

858. May I ask which scheme you think the best?—I think there you are asking me a difficult question, if I may say so. I do not know that I really have any view on the point. Though we have talked a good deal about medical certificates being imperfect in some way or other and of the action we take, yet there are extremely few cases of that kind in proportion to the many hundreds and thousands which come through our hands, and I do not think the medical profession as a whole need be ashamed of the medical certificates which are sent in. If there is a failure I should say that we do not officially see it, but where the lack of expert knowledge comes in is when we have a chance one of us ourselves of examining the patient from time to time, and not very infrequently we are astounded to hear that Dr. So-and-so has stated he could not write a medical certificate. That is where some amount of failure comes in, but we have never looked into it in a way to enable me at least to answer your question in the way I should like. My view is, if there is a failure it is with regard to people not under certificate who we think ought to be under certificate. For instance, if you go to a house where there is a patient in single care we endeavour to go all over the house; we are not entitled to see any other people than the patient, but we do see other people, and we get into conversation with them, and we sometimes find cases whom we regard as quite obviously insane. When we go a little further into the matter, we are told the doctor said it was not possible to write a certificate of insanity in the case. Now that does suggest perhaps some lack of ability; I do not know, but there may be some other explanation, although that is the case. Then we go to the Poor Law institutions, and very constantly we come across cases not under any form of order. A cordial welcome is given us to examine these patients; we never have any difficulty put in our way, and we see at once that such and such a person is of unsound mind, and we make a note of it in our report and pursue the matter, and ask the medical officer about it; then we get a reply that he finds himself unable to write a certificate of insanity. We take that course with regard to the Poor Law infirmaries, and it is a growing practice which we pursue with the knowledge and concurrence of the Ministry of Health. We sometimes suggest that it would be a good thing if the guardians called in in consultation the medical superintendent of a neighbouring hospital, and that has been done.

859. Sir David Drummond: You have given us a very elaborate account of what takes place when the patient is admitted, but have you found in your experience that medical officers are so trained that they are incapable of carrying out these duties to which you have referred?—Well, it varies.

860. Would you suggest that it is desirable that the medical officer of an institution should be one who has some experience in these special matters?—We do that. We have done what we can to aid examining bodies in instituting special training.

861. That is not quite what I mean. No authority up to now, I take it, has insisted that a resident medical officer of a hospital, or a house surgeon, should have any special training?—It has not been insisted upon, but it was one of our recommendations in a circular which we sent out about two years ago. In addition we have for some years been pressing, and are now succeeding with growing rapidity, that all mental hospitals should have a full visiting staff, not so much a consultant in mental disorders, but a general physician and an operating surgeon.

862. But the officer who carries out the preliminary examination in every case would probably have some general knowledge on the subject?—I think the great majority are quite capable of making a good examination.

863. But you do not suggest that it should be a sine qua non that a medical officer should have some special training?—I think we would like to enforce it at once if it was practicable, but I do not think you would get the doctors.

864. You think it would be desirable?—Undoubtedly.

865. Do you also think it would be desirable that every medical officer appointed to an asylum should have some special training before appointment?—I would not say before appointment, but before he gains a responsible position.

866. Mrs. Mathew: Is a dentist any part of the staff of a lunatic asylum?—Not of the resident staff, but there are very few mental hospitals now without a fully qualified dental surgeon who visits according to requirements once or twice a week, or in small places once a fortnight; and for whom a properly equipped dental room exists with the necessary apparatus. There are some mental hospitals without it, but we have a note of them, and it is a thing we never forget on our visits.

Sir FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

867. Sir Ernest Hiley: You, Sir Frederick, are going to prepare a memorandum, I understand, with regard to the classification of patients and the use of the existing accommodation in asylums and workhouses?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes.

868. Would it be possible for you in that memorandum to touch on the question of the liaison which exists, or which ought to exist, between a county council and a town council, or whatever authority provides the asylum, and the guardians who control the workhouse, and who provide the patients generally for the asylum?—Yes, certainly.

869. You will deal with that in your memorandum?—Yes.

870. In reply to Lord Russell this morning with regard to the constitution of your Board you referred to a Section of the Act—but the position of your Board is really defined in the Radnor Report, is it not?—They did set out what it was.

871. You set out a quotation on page 4 of your précis which I will not trouble to read now?—Yes, that is so.

872. May we take it that that is the sort of position which you now enjoy with regard to the administration of the Lunacy Acts?—Yes, that is so.

873. Lord Eustace Percy: I think you said that the Board have no control, or no power of enforcing advice on public authorities, but has the Board got, or does it discharge, any functions at all in conjunction with the Ministry of Health in connection with the Lunacy grant-in-aid?—No, that grant is a purely automatic thing—the 4s. grant.

874. In the case of the workhouse how does the Board know when there is a mental patient in a workhouse?—We do not always know. (Mr. Macleod): There are some workhouses which we visit once a year, and the small workhouses once in two or three years, but in the big workhouses there are, we know, chronic patients under the Lunacy Act. When we have been to a small workhouse and find there are no patients we probably question the master and ask if since our last visit he has had any patient, and if he says no, we do not proceed further.

875. I suppose there are a very large number of pauper patients who come to the asylums through the workhouses?—Yes, no doubt; I should think about 50 per cent.

876. I suppose an appreciable percentage of those patients pass through the hands of the police before passing through the hands of the Poor Law authorities?—A small number do.

877. But most of them are cases of wandering at large?—There are a large number, but not most of them, I should say.

878. And I suppose there are a good many instances where a policeman may have a case of obvious insanity brought to his attention in the streets?—Yes.

879. And he may take a man to the police station?—Yes.

880. Where he would be examined by the police doctor?—Yes, I suppose he would be.

881. In the case of a medical officer of health he has no experience in dealing with mental cases, I take it?—(Dr. Bond): No, he would have no experience of making a skilled examination into the mental condition, but an examination would be made. The policeman has ample power without a doctor to take a patient to the Poor Law institution, and on his order, or the order of a relieving officer or overseer, they can sign a three day order for the man's detention without any doctor.

882. Do you think there is any tendency in this system with regard to the admission to workhouses to do injury to a patient—I mean on the part of a doctor or any other authority forming an idea that a person is a lunatic?—I think I might say in many instances I have known of a patient strongly objecting, but, on the other hand, there are lots of instances in which it has turned out to be the right course to adopt.

883. But would you say on the whole that this passage through the hands of the Poor Law Authorities is the best or the only practicable way?—You are there opening up a large question. I understand the Commission are going to have a memorandum upon that subject, but I think we can at once give you the names of big areas in which it has been found; it is a very rare thing for anyone to go through the Poor Law institutions except it be in the vicinity of a large city. Of course when you come to a place like London and large places they stand on a different footing to other places. With regard to the system I originally accepted the explanation, but the more I go into it the less I believe in the inherent necessity that everyone must go through a Poor Law institution. I have been inquiring into it a great deal during the last two or three years, and the more I examine it the more I think it is a matter which is open to doubt, but I would rather not give expression to any strong feeling until the memorandum promised the Commission is ready.

884. I suppose we may take it that the promised memorandum will deal with the workhouses both as a collecting agency and as permanent places of detention.

885. Chairman: Perhaps, Dr. Bond, you will discriminate with regard to the two, and I think we might ask you to extend your memorandum in order to deal with the system of procedure of admission temporarily as well as permanently?—(Dr. Bond): Yes.

886. Lord Eustace Percy: The use of the Poor Law machinery should be fully explained?—(Sir Frederick Willis): Yes.

887. Chairman: You understand, Sir Frederick, what is desired?—Yes, I think so, and I should rather like to deal quite fully with all the points.

888. Earl Russell: There occurs to me a proposal which I remember being made during my time on the London County Council which has never been carried out for having a sort of clearing asylum to which these cases might be taken instead of to the workhouses—have you ever heard of that?—Yes.

889. I think there were some legal objections to the course?—Yes, I believe so, and I think the County Council made one or two attempts to get an empowering Act.

890. Perhaps you might deal with that in your memorandum?—Yes, but I think at this stage I would rather refrain from saying what system I consider best.

891. The proposal as I understand it was that a sort of clearing asylum should take the place of all the London workhouses, and that there the patients should be sorted out, classified, and sent to the appropriate asylum, and that three days' detention there should operate as though they were confined in a workhouse infirmary. Was not that the idea?—I think it was. There is one point as to our getting knowledge whether there are lunatics in workhouses or not which I should like to mention, and that is that the authorities are required to furnish a quarterly return of pauper lunatics who may be in the workhouse.

892. Lord Eustace Percy: To you?—To us. (Mr. Macleod): That is on a given date. (Sir Frederick Willis): The Rule is No. 32.

Chairman: Mr. Stewart, you have been good enough to hand me certain questions which you suggest in conformity with my proposal should be put to the witnesses. I understand that later on you will probably be calling some evidence, or placing some evidence at our disposal, on behalf of the society you represent, and I do not know whether you would be able to supply us with the names of the persons whose evidence you propose to bring forward.

Mr. Stewart: I should be quite willing to furnish you with a note for your personal information.

Chairman: And with a précis of the evidence they propose to give.

Mr. Stewart: That is a matter which has been the subject of discussion amongst us, but I may say it is not desired that the nature of the evidence should be disclosed until it has been given to yourself.

Sir FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

Chairman: When you say to myself do you mean myself and my colleagues?

Mr. Stewart: I should prefer, on the instructions I have received, to limit it to yourself, for this reason—that you might have some objection to take which it would be convenient to discuss as between you and counsel representing the society I appear for, and it might be quite easy to decide whether a witness should be heard under those circumstances; but if it became a matter of discussion with every member of the Commission collectively, or individually, with a great amount of preliminary investigation—

Chairman: Any witness who was going to be examined before the Commission would be expected to furnish a précis of the evidence which would be available for all the members of the Commission. I quite understand you might wish to consult me as Chairman as to the desirability of calling any particular witness, but I think you will appreciate that any evidence proposed to be given should be open to all the members of the Commission.

Mr. Stewart: I will convey that intimation, Sir, to the society, and perhaps it might be a matter of preliminary consideration for you as to whether, in certain cases, any proof should be put forward.

Chairman: Of course, any members of the public who are desirous of participating in this Inquiry may communicate with the Secretary of the Commission, and the Secretary of the Commission, if any question arises, would naturally come to me in the first instance, and I would consider the matter, and if it was a question of large importance, I would, of course, consult my colleagues. But I am rather anxious that we should have a view at the moment of the possible length of the inquiry and its ambit, and we should be grateful if you could, at the earliest possible moment, give us an indication of the probable length of the contributions you are likely to give us.

Mr. Stewart: I may say that we have about 30 proofs of witnesses which have been taken, and as the Commission sits it may be advisable that additional witnesses should be seen and proofs taken from them, but that is at present the number.

Chairman: Yes, but I doubt whether we shall be in a position to examine 30 witnesses, because you know in the course of examining witnesses one can easily eliminate certain matters.

Mr. Stewart: Quite—of course, duplication will be avoided, but, for instance, with respect to controversial matters, such as alleged acts of cruelty in institutions, it might be the view of the association that there should be corroboration, and that would necessitate calling on one case two or three witnesses.

Chairman: We have safeguarded the matter of dealing with any questions of fact—they would be dealt with separately, but I quite appreciate if any individual case arises for investigation in a more or less judicial manner you would be expected to bring more than one witness, but on questions of administration and policy we should certainly not want to hear more than one witness—your best witness.

Mr. Stewart: We will bear that in mind, Sir.

Chairman: I have considered the questions you have been good enough to hand me, and I think you will agree with me that most of them have been already put?

Mr. Stewart: I quite appreciate that, but I think with regard to the liberty of the subject there are questions which have not been put by the Commission in quite the form desired.

893. Chairman: I am quite prepared to put one or two of these questions, and I shall put them in my own form. (To the witnesses:) In the event of allegations being made of cruelty to a patient in any of the institutions we have been considering, what means would you have of knowing what was going on, and how would such acts be brought to your knowledge?—(Sir Frederick Willis:) In various ways—by letters sometimes, sometimes a person would call and say: “I was at such and such an institution yesterday, and I was told this, that, and the other”—but more frequently it would be by letters.

894. Have you had many charges to investigate of cruelty to patients in institutions?—Yes, one gets a great many complaints of that sort.

895. From what sources?—I should think chiefly from the patients themselves.

896. Do these complaints come in letters to you?—Yes, generally in letters.

897. And have you investigated these cases?—We always investigate a case of that kind, and the length of the investigation would depend on what we found on our preliminary investigation. Sometimes the investigation would proceed to the length of holding an inquiry on oath.

898. In how many instances have you found charges of cruel treatment to be substantiated in recent times?—In very few cases—I should say in my recollection possibly once during the last three years, and I am not quite sure about that. You see what sometimes happens is this—a complaint may be made to the visiting committee who themselves may hold an inquiry, and if they think the case is proved against a particular attendant or nurse they themselves would discharge the attendant or nurse, and very likely prosecute as well.

899. Can you tell us in how many instances prosecutions have been instituted in respect of ill-treatment of patients?—During the last few years?

900. Take the year 1923?—In our tenth report, which is in the Press now and will be published in the course of three or four days, we give particulars of two prosecutions which took place during the year to which this report relates. Your question, I think, was how many prosecutions there have been?

901. Yes?—There was one case at Cheddleton Mental Hospital where the defendant, an attendant, was convicted at the Leek Petty Sessions for striking a patient and fined £2. That was the only prosecution of that kind in 1923.

902. Apart from prosecutions, how many cases have been brought to your knowledge of cruelty taking place on the part of attendants towards patients either in public asylums, or in licensed houses, or hospitals—cases which have been dealt with (without prosecution) by the dismissal of the offending servant or otherwise?—I should have to look that up.

903. Can you tell us whether there have been many?—No, I should say very few—not that there have not been many allegations, but I should think at the outside only half-a-dozen have been established.

904. In cases where allegations have been made have they been followed up?—Always. (Mr. Macleod:) In addition to that we get notices from the institutions of the dismissal of nurses and attendants, and sometimes those nurses and attendants are dismissed because they are alleged to have struck patients. (See Rule 25.)

905. Earl Russell: Do you keep a note of all the dismissals?—Yes, of all dismissals.

906. Chairman: Suppose a patient is ill-treated by an attendant, the patient's position is a difficult one, is it not, because he or she may not have anyone to turn to for assistance?—(Sir Frederick Willis:) Quite, I agree.

907. With whom would a complaint of ill-treatment be lodged?—The patient could always mention it to the doctor—he sees the doctor every day, and he could also mention it to the charge attendant who is a superior officer.

908. Or he could write about it?—Or he could write about it.

909. Or complain to a visitor?—Yes.

910. Have you ever heard of cases where a patient has been frightened to complain of ill-treatment which he has received?—That has been stated, but I have never heard it substantiated. Of course it is quite easy to state these things without any proof.

911. But is it a thing which could conceivably happen?—Of course it could happen; with 130,000 patients under care it is almost inevitable that something wrong must happen occasionally just the same as in the case of 130,000 public school boys.

SIR FREDERICK WILLIS, K.B.E., C.B.

912. What one would like to safeguard would be the opportunities of complaining to some responsible person or body?—The opportunities are, I think, ample. Occasionally when the Commissioners are going round a patient makes a complaint about the treatment by some of the nurses, and forthwith they hold an inquiry.

913. There and then?—There and then. (Mr. Macleod): And report it, and if there is anything very serious we hold a sworn inquiry, but they are very few in number.

914. Earl Russell: Do not you find the difficulties in regard to holding such an inquiry almost insuperable?—They are very difficult indeed—there is nothing so difficult. (Sir Frederick Willis): I should like to tell you very briefly about the inquiry I held at Long Grove.

915. Chairman: I only wanted to get at what the machinery was which is available for bringing such cases to your notice. With regard to establishments which are licensed for the reception of patients, and therefore run at a profit, who appoints the heads of such establishments?—The licensee—it is like a business concern.

916. The licensee obtains a license, runs the house, and makes a profit by it?—Yes.

917. In the case of a licensee of such an establishment he need not be a doctor, need he?—Not the licensee himself, but there must be a doctor.

918. But would such a place be licensed unless there was a resident doctor?—The Act requires that there must be a resident doctor, or a visiting doctor.

919. According to the number of patients?—Yes.

920. But the licensee who may not be a medical man may own what we call the business?—He may own the property.

921. And conduct the business of accommodating patients in his house for profit?—Quite, and it pays him to do it well.

922. And it may also pay him well to do it?—Yes, both ways.

923. That is perhaps the reason why it is thought that that class of institution should not be multiplied?—Yes, some people think that.

924. Because of the possible risk that the desire for gain might interfere with the efficiency of the institution?—Yes.

925. I think one may say where a medical man, a practitioner, is mentioned throughout the Act it is nowhere prescribed that he shall have special qualifications other than that he shall be a duly qualified medical man?—No, in most Acts of Parliament it is implied that a medical practitioner knows about everything appertaining to a doctor.

926. In the same way as a barrister is supposed to know all about every branch of the law. But there has not been any special requirement in regard to medical practitioners?—No. Recently where there has been a vacancy for a medical superintendent we have corresponded with the committee, and have said that we shall be glad to help them in selecting a medical superintendent, and we have formed a small committee with one or two outsiders on it to go through the applications and select from 40 or 50 half-a-dozen applications which are considered to be the best.

927. I suppose they will be persons who have had experience, and who would be considered to be best adapted for such a post?—Yes.

928. But there is no special qualification required?—No, nothing at all.

929. Have you any statistics of the number of persons who have been discharged from detention on the ground that they were not insane when admitted?—Yes, we publish those in our annual report.

930. Are those cases numerous?—No, they are very small in number, and what it means is this—that some superintendents when they find a patient is no longer insane say, “Discharged, not insane.” That is what your question is directed to?

931. Yes.—And it has been assumed from that that the patient was never insane, but the medical man at the asylum, when saying that, you will remember, says it at a different period to the time the original medical practitioner said the patient was insane.

932. Will you tell us whether in your large experience you know of any cases where persons not insane have been wrongfully detained in an asylum. One might ask you a general question—in your own experience?—I should say I have no experience of that at all.

933. None at all?—None at all.

934. Do you regard the existing machinery in the matter of certification and provisions with regard to detention as adequately safeguarding the liberty of the subject?—I do, yes.

935. On the other hand, if ingenuity can suggest any additional reasonable precautions I suppose your Department would not resent their introduction?—Not at all, on the contrary; but one would only like to know what the working of those things might be.

936. Of course, I mean practicable means.—Quite so.

937. If such suggestions reach us later on, of course, we shall have an opportunity of putting them before you, but you would welcome, I take it, anything which is practicable and likely to be useful?—Yes, absolutely.

938. With regard to curative treatment in hospitals themselves, how far have you any responsibility for that?—Only in an advisory capacity.

939. You cannot direct that certain treatment should be introduced?—No, the responsibility for treatment must rest with the doctors at the institutions.

940. Supposing you saw an institution was lax, and that very little was being done for the patients, what steps would you take?—We should mention that in the report which went before the committee of the institution, and we should subsequently write to them and ask what they had done, and follow it up as much as we could, but we have no power to say, “You shall get an extra doctor,” or “You shall provide a laboratory or an X-ray apparatus.”

941. You cannot compel anything like that?—We cannot compel it.

942. But I suppose you can bring pretty strong pressure to bear on the medical superintendent or the local authority?—Yes, very strong pressure.

943. Have you ever done so?—Yes, and one would often ask the chairman of the committee to come and see one when in town and have a serious talk with him.

944. Is it in many cases a question of money?—Yes, when they do not do certain things it is largely a question of money.

Chairman: We are very much indebted to you, Sir Frederick, Mr. Macleod and Dr. Bond, for the assistance you have given us at this stage, but we shall, no doubt, have to ask your further assistance at a later date.

8 October, 1924.]

Sir CLAUD SCHUSTER, K.C.B., C.V.O., K.C.

Sir CLAUD SCHUSTER, K.C.B., C.V.O., K.C., called and examined.

945. Chairman: You are Permanent Secretary to the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

946. And as such are you conversant with his jurisdiction in matters regarding lunacy?—I think I may say that I am.

947. I think the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction in lunacy is probably the oldest form of legal association with this matter?—I believe so.

948. He is the custodian of the prerogative of the Crown in this matter?—Yes.

949. And, as we know, historically lunatics were originally supposed to be under the protection of the King. What are the departments into which the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction divides itself?—There is the direct control, if I may use the word, though it is not a true word, by the Lord Chancellor over the Lunacy Departments, as we call them, at and about the Royal Courts of Justice.

950. What are these?—The office of the Master in Lunacy and the office of the Visitors in Lunacy.

951. The Master in Lunacy is appointed by the Lord Chancellor himself, I think?—Yes.

952. Do his duties relate to the property of the lunatic?—Primarily, yes.

953. What concern has he with the person of the lunatic?—In effect he has great concern with the person of the lunatic, because the effect of finding by inquisition that a person is lunatic results presumably in his confinement, and, furthermore, patients who have come within the jurisdiction of the Master get a great deal of attention from the Master as to what actually happens to them personally. I expect really whatever jurisdiction he has is founded in property, and most of the overt legal acts done by the Master are acts connected with property. He has to concern himself enormously with the patients' comfort.

954. There may be a committee appointed for the property, and none for the person, of course?—You may have a person who is deprived of the management of his property and who is not considered unfit to have charge of his own person.

955. I should think such cases are rare?—They are rare, but I cannot give you any statistics.

956. Is this jurisdiction of the Master in Lunacy confined to persons so found by inquisition?—No; lunatics so found form a very small part of the number of lunatics with whom he has to deal; the majority are people with regard to whom an order has been made under Section 116 of the Act, who have not been so found, and with regard to whom no inquisition has been held.

957. There again he is dealing with their property only?—Primarily, but he has a great deal to do with what actually happens to every person.

958. But he has to do with the question of whether the property is being applied for their benefit?—That is his primary duty.

959. And that brings him into contact with the person's condition?—Quite. A constant subject of discussion, for instance, is whether a lunatic should be moved from place A to place B, or should be allowed out on parole, apart from questions as to whether he should have a new pair of boots or how his money should be invested, and so on.

960. The Master in Lunacy has become, has he not, practically the repository of the judicial functions of the Lord Chancellor?—Broadly speaking, yes.

961. Always subject to the Lord Chancellor's supervision, and, of course, that of the Lords Justices?—I should rather say subject to the supervision of the Lords Justices. The Lord Chancellor would consider, and does consider, the operations of the Master as judicial acts, and he would not consider he was entitled to supervise or control or take any step in relation to them that he would not take with regard to any other Judge.

962. Putting it technically, there is an appeal from the Master in Lunacy to the Lords Justices?—Yes.

963. And there might, I suppose, be an appeal beyond that to the House of Lords?—Well, I ought to be able to answer that, but I am afraid I cannot.

964. I am afraid I cannot, either. This jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices is derived, I believe, from a Royal Warrant which is renewed on each Succession?—Yes I think I have sent you a copy of the Warrant. May I say I think it is desirable that everyone should understand that as far as the legal position of the Lord Chancellor is concerned in respect of the Lunacy Law or the doing of legal acts under the Lunacy Law, it is this—that he has no position at all, and he never does any legal act, beyond the powers he exercises as a Judge, because everything has been drained out of him, and nothing remains except the empty tank. I do not mean to say, therefore, that there is nothing to do, but what I mean to say is that any proceedings in lunacy never come before the Lord Chancellor.

965. But he still retains the reputation of being the repository of great powers?—Yes, and in many ways he has great powers, but as a Judge he never exercises any powers whatever.

966. Mr. Mackinnon: There is an appeal to the House of Lords, but it has never been exercised, I think?—I think that is so.

967. Chairman: Who are the Lord Chancellor's Visitors—who appoints them, and what do they do?—There are three of them, two doctors and one lawyer, who are appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and their duty is to visit at certain statutory intervals all lunatics so found by inquisition, and in fact they visit in addition a great many other lunatics not so found, whose property is within the jurisdiction of the Master—practically speaking, all of them, at one time or another.

968. Then the only persons visited at such times are firstly the patients so found by inquisition, which is a diminishing class?—Yes.

969. Or secondly the persons who are otherwise within the cognisance of your Department through their having property in the hands of the Master in Lunacy?—Yes.

970. Are the Visitors' services utilised in specially visiting any person whose case has been brought to the Lord Chancellor's notice?—They pay three classes of visits—the statutory visit to the lunatic, the non-statutory visits, and special visits made on the order of the Master on his own motion or on the suggestion of the Lord Chancellor—any Visitors, as such, of the Lord Chancellor may pay in any particular cases visits in regard to which special information may be wanted.

971. Those special visits may be to persons not so found and who have no property in the hands of the Master?—Yes, but we are not so much inclined, except in extreme matters, to send one of our Visitors to a patient with whom we have nothing to do, though we have done such a thing.

972. There is machinery for that under the Act?—Yes.

973. And there is that additional power in your Department to direct visits?—Yes. Of course, you know, the relations between the Lord Chancellor with regard to his duties and the Board of Control are so intimate that it is difficult to remember whether you have done a thing because you have power, or whether you have done it because you are asked to do it; and I have some difficulty myself in knowing sometimes whether I have been acting because I have the power or because I think it is reasonable under the circumstances.

974. With regard to the Board of Control, what is the Lord Chancellor's relation to them?—Primarily to appoint four Commissioners on it, who are to be, I think, barristers or solicitors, out of a possible fifteen members. Then there are a number of detailed duties cast upon the Board of Control in the way of furnishing information and such like things to the Lord Chancellor, which keeps the Departments together to a great extent. Those are the legal relations. The actual relations are in some respects very close. We constantly ask for the help of the Board of Control, and they sometimes ask for our advice.

975. One very important matter, is it not, is that the Lord Chancellor or Secretary of State may direct the Commissioners specially to visit a lunatic or an alleged lunatic?—Yes, but there again I cannot call to mind ever having given a direction to the Board of Control to do anything at all—it is quite enough to ask the Board to do anything, and they, being sensible, do it.

976. But you have the big stick and you could use it?—Yes, we have the big stick, but we always keep it in the cupboard and keep the cupboard locked.

977. Then, further, are you brought into connection with Section 206 of the Act?—Yes.

978. Section 206 is with regard to persons detained without payment in charitable institutions?—Yes. We do get reports as to these.

979. And as the result of the reports the Lord Chancellor may order the discharge of a patient or his removal?—Yes; I am trying to think whether we have ever done it, but I cannot remember; but I expect we have made an Order.

980. That is another of the residual powers vested in the Lord Chancellor?—Yes. The powers I was speaking about were the prerogative powers and the powers conferred to some extent by Statute.

981. Then another Section, I think, with which you are concerned, is Section 199?—There again we do get reports from the Board of Control frequently of that sort of thing, but it is difficult to know what to do with them when we get them.

982. Then there is Section 221?—We have never had, in my time, a case in which we have been called upon to consider the question of revocation of a licence.

983. But still, there is that power?—There is that power, and I think the power rests in the Lord Chancellor only, as far as I remember.

984. Then in Section 39 there is a reference to the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, Section 39 is a very embarrassing section. It really looks as if the draftsman of it had endeavoured to work for some conclusion or other, and, having gone on a long way into the section, did not know what to suggest, except the concluding words, but the concluding words, with great respect, are nonsense. The Lord Chancellor could only indirectly bring an inquisition about, but it is inconceivable that he should do so, because to whom is he to hand over its conduct, and who is to pay for it? I wish something could be done with regard to the section, because it is a very embarrassing section, providing that these authorities when in trouble should turn the matter over to us, and we do not know what to do. We had a case the other day which gave ourselves and the Board of Control a great deal of trouble, and we did not know what to do, and we were relieved when the difficulty solved itself by a discharge.

985. You think the concluding words of the section are rather a lame conclusion?—Yes, they signify nothing; but it is not an important point, except that it is always rather important, especially from our point of view, that we should not appear in the eyes of the public to possess powers which we cannot properly exercise.

986. Your Department does frequently receive reports?—Yes, from the Board of Control, certainly, and of course we have very elaborate reports from the Visitors.

987. But there does not seem to be anything to prescribe what is to happen on those reports?—Nothing does happen—they are information reports, but I think the Lord Chancellor to-day is considering, and I am sure would consider, any views on the part of the Board of Control, or anything they wish to call attention to, and would consider what was best to be done. The reports from Visitors are of a very different character from the reports we have heard about—they are very serious documents which require very serious consideration.

988. Do you refer now to your own Visitors?—Yes.

989. What machinery have you, what staff and office facilities have you for dealing with these matters?—None specially. The volume of the work is not very great, but the trouble of reading the lunatics' own letters, which is another matter, is very great indeed. When any question does arise it is regarded as an important question quite fit to be dealt with, in the first place, by the Private Secretary, and then by myself. I mean if any question arises as to which the Private Secretary is in any doubt with regard to any patient, he would come to me, and I should go to the Lord Chancellor.

990. What follows on a Visitor's report received by you—would you confer with the Board of Control?—Yes; we should communicate with the Board of Control and ask them what they thought about it.

991. You would ask them to look up their records?—Yes, and ask them if they had any recent reports, and compare what they said with what our Visitors said. If there was a conflict between the two I do not know what we should do, because we have never had such a case. It would be a matter then subject to the Lord Chancellor's personal decision.

992. But I suppose you could call for additional reports?—Yes, if we were in any trouble or difficulty we could. For instance, if a difficulty arose on some report of Lord Sandhurst we should cause the lunatic to be visited by some medical man, perhaps, who was not a Visitor—we should call for an outside opinion, but we certainly should not drop the matter until we were quite definitely satisfied.

993. Has a case of that sort often occurred in your experience?—No, but it has occurred sometimes.

994. How often do you think it has occurred?—Well, I should only be guessing, but it is very rare indeed. It is not very rare that we cause a preliminary inquiry to be made on some report received—that is very common—but it is very rare indeed that one is left in any doubt in regard to a case.

995. With regard to letters written by patients to the Lord Chancellor, they have to be sent unopened, I understand?—Yes.

996. Do you find your postbag a very heavy one?—Very.

997. What happens to those letters?—They are all read by the Private Secretary.

998. It must be a severe task.—Yes, but it is not such a severe task as it sounds, because a great many people write every day, and you know exactly what they are going to say. Some of them do not write complaining about anything, but they write to tell you how they are getting on, and sometimes they write very elaborate essays on the subject of their delusions. They write such things day after day and day after day, and they obviously take a pleasure in committing their daily thoughts to paper.

999. So that a great many of the letters are immediately seen to have no bearing on matters of importance?—Quite. The difficulty, of course, is to pick out the particular letter which really ought to be further investigated.

1000. Who has the responsibility of doing that?—The Private Secretary. If he is attracted by anything in any one of the letters he at once asks for a report—he asks the Board of Control and asks our own Visitors, and if what he gets from them is not sufficient to discharge his mind of any doubt he entertains, he talks to me about it, and we take then the kind of measures I have indicated.

1001. What becomes of those other kinds of letters which you receive?—The great majority of them are destroyed. Any letter which, on the other hand, contains any complaint for the first time, is taken very seriously indeed, especially if it is a case of complaint of loss of liberty. A first letter of that kind would be preserved and filed, and the inquiry made on it would be preserved and filed, too, but if it is found a man makes the same complaint every day for a year, of course you would not pay any attention to it, once you had satisfied yourself that he was properly detained. The real difficulty about the whole thing is this, that you have to deal with people who get better, and it is difficult to determine at what time that betterness has reached such a stage that the patient should be released, and we do not know how to deal with it. But when the question has been once determined it is a case in which we are bound to rely on medical advice alone.

1002. It is really from the point of view of being a custodian and responsible for the liberty of the subject that the Lord Chancellor's jurisdiction is of importance, apart from property matters?—Yes, that is so.

1003. Do you regard the retention of that sort of shadowy jurisdiction as being of any value?—I find that question extremely difficult to answer. I do not want you to think that we are so foolish as to imagine that we can supervise the actions of the skilled Board of Control, or even supervise our own Visitors or Masters. We are only there to retain a principle, I think.

1004. If one thought that it was an additional and effective check—and there cannot be too many checks in cases of this kind—there might be a good case for the continuance of the authority you possess, but do you think the authority you possess serves that purpose?—It is extremely difficult to tell. I think it would be a very great pity if there was no one left to exercise authority, and who did not look like a sort of champion. It is a great pity that it should be thought that there is nobody who is not some sort of champion in a position to look after the interests of these people, and to supervise what has been done by other people, who have, of course, done their duty effectively—I mean it would be ridiculous for us to retain an elaborate staff to check what has been done by the Board of Control.

1005. Undoubtedly the Lord Chancellor has occupied in earlier times a more prominent position as custodian of the rights of lunatics?—Yes, no doubt.

1006. Do you think the time perhaps may have now come when the statutory body, the Board of Control, might be safely entrusted with the whole of the duties?—I am not expressing the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, but I am expressing my own opinion, when I say that that depends to a great extent on the constitution of the body.

1007. Would you agree that a body comprised solely of persons of great responsibility would be a desirable body to set up?—Certainly.

1008. A body carefully chosen, and a body in a position of as great independence as possible?—Yes, and I really mean more than that. I think it is obvious that such a body must comprise upon it men of the highest medical experience and possessed of the highest science, particularly with regard to questions of lunacy—I think that is absolutely necessary, and it also should comprise other people.

1009. Do you regard the legal element as of any value also?—Yes, I do; not so much because there is anything legal to do, but because the legal mind is capable of looking at things from a different point of view from the lay mind.

1010. And you think it would be probably useful in sifting any evidence and arriving at the value of that evidence?—Yes, especially having regard to the kind of way in which doctors necessarily look at these things, and to the kind of way in which they express themselves.

1011. Probably where the professional medical man is called upon to administer a Statute it is almost essential that you should have the assistance of a legal mind?—Yes, but I should like more than that. What I want is to have some people in control who would be able to sit, in the case of a man who is lunatic, over the doctor. The doctor may think from the lunatic point of view he is able to cure the man of the disease, but it is possible that a man ought not to be looked upon prima facie as suffering from the disease. If a man was suffering, say, from cancer, the doctor knows he is suffering from cancer; but in the case of a disease of the brain I think it is necessary that there should be some control which should be in the shape of a legal control, and that the person should not be deprived of the opportunity of producing evidence in a case which involves him in the deprivation of his liberty. If you read, as I do, a number of medical certificates relating to lunatics in the course of the year, you could not be but struck by the way in which they are drawn. I am perfectly certain that those certificates I have read are certificates which are honestly given by the men who sign them, and that they have come to the conclusion that the person concerned ought to be deprived of his liberty; but they are given in such terms that the lawyer, with his legal mind, would never act upon them. I do not want to be disrespectful, or to say anything against the doctors, but I do say that they are not able to express their thoughts sometimes in such a way as to carry conviction on paper to the legal mind.

1012. You mean with regard to the presentation and arrangement of the facts?—Yes, and the description of the facts. I mean, what constantly occurs is that we get a report or a statement of the history of the case which we do not like, and we say we do not like it, and, "You had better go into the matter again and report to us again"; then when you get from the same man another report, it discloses some reasonable ground on which a reasonable man would advise detention.

1013. Sir David Drummond: Does not this evidence rather conflict with the evidence which we have heard from Dr. Bond, when he referred to the rarity with which he found a certificate unsatisfactory?—The point is this: we only see cases in which there is some sort of reason that we should see them. Dr. Bond sees any number of certificates—many more than I do—in the course of a year, and his observations, I am sure, are justified, but all I can say is that there are an enormous number of certificates which are open to the criticisms I have been making.

1014. Lord Eustace Percy: A medical certificate under the Lunacy Act is a certificate that a person is of unsound mind, and is a suitable person to be detained for care and treatment, but it does not say on what ground he is a suitable person to be detained for care and treatment. In the case of a discharge there is the liability that the patient might do some injury to himself and others, and that, you say, from the doctor's point of view and from the legal point of view, is a different thing?—I do not say it is a different thing if it is accurately expressed, but it is differently expressed, and it is doubtful on the certificate. They do not express their views. They look at it from a different point of view. A doctor naturally looks to curing a man, and he thinks a man might be cured by being under supervision and by being shut up in an asylum, but lawyers would not consider that such a man ought to be shut up.

1015. Chairman: Form 8 requires, does it not, the grounds on which any conclusion has been reached to be set out?—Yes.

1016. And is it there that you say you find in certain instances which have come under your notice that the descriptions and the arrangement of the facts on which the certificate proceeds are sometimes lacking?—Yes, and I think everybody in the habit of reading those things would say the same.

1017. I mean it is not that you are questioning what the practitioner has actually said?—No.

1018. And you find, do you, that the practitioner, if his attention is drawn to the matter, is able to put it in a fuller and clearer way to you?—Yes. Of course, our own Visitors have been long trained in doing the thing.

1019. One could hardly expect a medical practitioner, of course, to go through a course of legal training in order to be able to prepare a proof of evidence?—No, but I think my suggestion might very simply be carried out.

Sir CLAUD SCHUSTER, K.C.B., C.V.O., K.C.

1020. In regard to the matters to which our attention is specially directed, first of all as to certification, your department has nothing at all to do with it?—No.

1021. As regards detention, you have a certain tutelary power as the champion of the liberty of the subject?—Yes.

1022. And you have explained to us in what way you can intervene and be of public service in that matter. As regards the care of the lunatic, your department, I understand, has no jurisdiction, except possibly in this way—that through the Master the application of the moneys of a patient for his benefit can be secured?—Yes, and is very effectively secured.

1023. Have you anything to do in your department with the conduct of the establishment in which a lunatic may be detained?—Nothing whatever.

1024. Then really it is the liberty of the subject of which you are the exponent?—Yes, subject of course to the administrative arrangements of the Master's Office and the Visitors' Office.

1025. And the very important point that the Lord Chancellor appoints the legal members of the Board of Control?—Yes.

1026. Earl Russell: Who appoints the medical members?—The Minister of Health.

1027. Mr. Mackinnon: How many inquisitions do you think you held last year?—I really do not know.

1028. Would it be two, or 50?—It would be more than two, I should think, but I could let you have the figures at any time.*

1029. I only wondered whether it was a matter of fifty or more or less?—Well, I do not think it would be 50. If it were I do not think we could carry on.

1030. It comes to this, does it not, that really the powers of the Lord Chancellor are very similar to the powers exercised by the Board of Control, except as regards property?—Oh, no, because the Board of Control has any number of powers which we have not at all.

1031. But the powers you have got are similar powers to those of the Board of Control?—Yes.

1032. And the Lord Chancellor's Visitors discharge very much the same functions as the Board of Control Visitors discharge?—No.

1033. They do in the end?—No, I cannot assent to that. As I understand it, the Visitors of the Board of Control visit the institutions and the people in them, and I do not know how long they spend, but our Visitors visit each patient singly and spend some time with each patient. Sometimes they will be a long time interviewing particular persons, and they go into all sorts of details about the management of their money, and as to their clothing, with their relatives outside, as to whether they should go out for drives, as to whether they should have pocket-money—every conceivable sort of thing.

1034. Your Visitors visit the individual residents in the institutions?—Yes.

1035. Whereas the Board of Control Visitors visit the institutions and incidentally visit the patients?—I must not say yes to that, because I do not know.

1036. I suppose you are not influenced in your view with regard to the continuance of your duties in any way?—Well, my mind as regards that is that it would depend on what solution was thought of for the controlling body, and even then I do not know what I should think about it.

1037. At any rate you are clear that the controlling body should not become too exclusively medical?—Yes.

1038. Miss Symons: Are there many cases in which you have been asked to deal with the complaints of patients?—I cannot give you any figures with regard to that, but we should naturally do it in the case of frequent complaints from patients, and our practice would be to ask the Board of Control to pay a special visit.

1039. I suppose complaints really arise more out of correspondence?—Yes.

1040. Earl Russell: How many contested inquisitions have there been held with a jury in your experience?—If you would not mind, I think Master Hildyard could give you that information—I would not have the information, but the number is very small.

1041. Mr. Mackinnon: I think there is only one that I can remember?—I think there is more than one.

1042. Earl Russell: Supposing a Judge in Lunacy appoints an independent person to pay a visit, do the Lord Chancellor's Visitors remain to pay their visits under the terms of an order of the Master in Lunacy? If so, is there necessity left for retaining the authority of the Lord Chancellor?—I think the Lord Chancellor must always remain in control of the administrative arrangements with regard to the Visitors and also the Master. Really that is the only control we have now. We do not actually control the Visitors, but we appoint them.

1043. Are there any other powers of any consequence remaining in the Lord Chancellor?—There are, but they are of no advantage to us.

1044. Nor, I take it, to the public?—I would not quite say that, because I cannot make up my mind whether you might not want some outside body who represents the idea of personal liberty.

1045. Mrs. Mathew: What is the position of an alien in one of our institutions?—I do not know, but I should think that it would be exactly the same as the position of an ordinary British subject.

1046. Would that answer apply to a criminal alien?—We have nothing to do with criminals.

1047. That comes under the Home Office?—Yes. When I say we have nothing to do with them, I mean we do not exercise any functions. If there is any ground for taking out a summons under Section 116 in the case of an alien or for holding an inquisition it would be taken out, if they are within the jurisdiction. There are aliens who are Chancery lunatics, or, if not Chancery lunatics, are subject to Section 116.

1048. Sir David Drummond: In what proportion of the cases into which you have made inquiry have you found the certificates have been imperfect?—None.

1049. How do you decide whether the certificates have been perfect or not?—It causes me uneasiness if I find anything is done to any man by which he is deprived of his liberty, and if I find that anything has been faultily expressed I am entitled to know if there is any fault to be found with it.

1050. But you have never found any such case in fact?—Certainly not.

1051. Chairman: I am asked to put this question, which I think is quite a proper one. Do you know of any statutory or other right by the terms of which a person once deprived of his liberty as a certified lunatic can demand a public trial by an independent tribunal to determine his sanity or insanity?—Do you mean can demand an inquisition?

1052. If a person is certified as a lunatic already, can such a person demand an absolute right to a trial?—No.

1053. The suggestion of the question seems to me to go to the means by which a public tribunal can be invoked to determine the sanity or insanity of a particular person who is detained?—I hope not, but I do not know. There are two things I ought to have said. There have been from time to time suggestions made that the Lord Chancellor's Visitors and the Board of Control Visitors should be amalgamated. If the Commission at any future time should come to consider any such question as that, I may say we should be very glad to be allowed to tender evidence upon it, but I do not want to take up time now by saying anything about it.

1054. But you might guide us now with any suggestions you have to make. Do you consider there is an overlapping of these functions?—I think there is.

* See Appendix V.

8 October, 1924.]

SIR CLAUD SCHUSTER, K.C.B., C.V.O., K.C.

1055. And is it an undesirable overlapping?—That is what we often have difficulty in determining. I think we should be satisfied with such an amalgamation if the Commission recommend it, and subject, of course, to what the very learned Visitors might have to say on the subject themselves. If we had an assurance that we were in future able to get the same individual care given to our lunatics as has been given in the past; we could not stand anything which would put our lunatics in a less favourable position than they are in now; but subject to that we have no interest in maintaining two separate establishments, as it were, and the bias, I think, of the Lord Chancellor is, and would be of successive Lord Chancellors, that it is foolish to have two people doing the work instead of one.

1056. Unless such overlapping is desirable?—Yes, quite. I think the Master would require, and we should require, that our lunatics should have the same treatment. Then there is another matter, and that is that Master Hildyard is strongly of opinion that I should mention the cases which ought to be in Chancery, but are not. He thinks that a great effort should be made, and he has from time to time tried to devise plans whereby some machinery could be devised to draw the net closer.

1057. That is on the topic of the protection of a lunatic's property?—Yes. There are undoubtedly many cases where the relations manage to get on without coming to us at all, and that is, of course, a very good thing; but when we find in cases which do come to us that the relatives are not always friendly, it seems a fair inference to draw that there are many cases where they do not get on in a friendly way which do not come before us.

1058. You mean that the patients are not getting the full benefit of any property which they may have?—Yes.

1059. Earl Russell: Does that observation apply to non-pauper patients only?—It would apply to anybody who has property at all, and, as you know, it might well be that there might be some property even in a pauper.

1060. In these cases is it your suggestion that the relatives squander the property, or is it administered by the Board of Guardians?—I was not speaking specially about the Board of Guardians, nor would I make any general charge of squandering against relatives as a class, but I would say that a certain proportion of the relatives of Chancery lunatics are not always wise, and it seems reasonable to suppose that in a proportion of those cases which do not come to us the relatives are not wise—that is the whole point.

1061. But you recognise the public prejudice there is about anything getting into Chancery?—Yes, I quite agree that there are great objections to that, but there is the point.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Sir CLAUD SCHUSTER, K.C.B., C.V.O., K.C., recalled and further examined.

1062. Chairman: I think I should inform the Commission that after Sir Claud Schuster left the witness chair, he was good enough to address a letter to me in which he expressed a desire to amplify an answer which he gave to Q. 1053, just at the close of the proceedings on the last occasion. As his letter contained, in my view, important additions to his evidence, I have ventured to ask him to attend here this morning in order that he might fully place before us his additional views. Perhaps, Sir Claud, you will be good enough to expand the answer to that Question. The Question was directed, you will remember, to the desirability of a right to demand a public trial by an independent tribunal to determine the sanity or insanity of an inmate of an institution?—Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I might read my letter to you.

1063. I think that would be the most convenient way?—It is rather long, that is the only trouble.

1064. I think it is all of value, if I may say so?—“Towards the close of my examination on Wednesday, 8th October, you, upon the suggestion of a gentleman among the public, asked me whether a lunatic in confinement had a right to demand a public inquiry as to whether he had recovered. I replied, “I hope not.” As my reply conveyed, and was intended to convey, my opinion that such a right ought not to exist, I think that I ought in courtesy, both to the Commission and to the gentleman upon whose motion the question was put, to explain why I hold that opinion, and as I failed to do so at the time, I venture now to write to you upon the subject. I interpreted the question as suggesting that every lunatic who thought that he had recovered ought to have, as of right, access to some person or body sitting in public who would inquire whether he had recovered. I should regard the conferment of such a right as unfortunate for the following reasons: 1. A lunatic is detained, not because he has committed an offence, but because the State is conceived as having a duty, (a) to protect from himself a person who might injure himself if at large; (b) to protect the public from the acts of a person who might do injury to the public if at large; (c) to effect the cure of the disease of the mind from which the person is suffering, or at least to effect a partial cure if the disease is of such a nature as to be capable of being cured or alleviated.

Lunacy is a disease which may or may not be curable, and, like other diseases, its cure or alleviation is a gradual process. Pathologically, as I understand, its cause is obscure, and the progress of the patient—whether towards improvement or deterioration—is difficult to detect, and is frequently only ascertainable by the patient's overt acts and not by any examination of the patient's bodily condition, or at least only imperfectly by such an examination.

There is, therefore, nothing more difficult in many cases than to determine the point at which the patient may be said to have been cured or to have made such progress towards recovery that, in the discharge of the State's duty to protect the patient and to protect society, the patient may properly be released. This is, therefore, a matter peculiarly unsuited, in most cases, for public inquiry.

2. Again, as the function of those who have to determine whether the patient is to be released or further detained is not to investigate any charge made against the patient as if he were an alleged criminal, but to consider whether in all the circumstances of the disease certain action should be taken in the interests both of the patient and of the public,

Mr. L. G. Brock, C.B., called and examined.

1066. Chairman: Mr. Brock, you are an Assistant Secretary of the Ministry of Health?—That is so.

1067. And you are aware of the terms on which this Commission is conducting its inquiry?—I am.

1068. I think that you have prepared yourself to assist us on the matter of the functions of the Ministry of Health in relation to the administration of the Lunacy Laws?—That is so.

1069. And, in particular, at this stage of the inquiry, you have directed your attention to an exposition of the existing system rather than to suggestions for its improvement or answers to any possible criticisms?—Yes.

1070. Now will you tell us from what sources the existing powers of the Minister of Health in relation to lunacy administration are derived?—They are inherited powers which come from two sources. They are partly powers exercised previously by the Local Government Board, all the powers of the Local Government Board were transferred to the Minister; and they are partly powers previously exercised by the Home Secretary.

1071. By what statutory provisions were those powers transferred from the Local Government Board and the Home Office to your Ministry?—The powers of the Local Government Board were transferred under Section 3 (1) (a) of the Ministry of Health Act, 1919.

1072. Was that the statute which set up the Ministry of Health?—That was the statute which set up the Ministry of Health, and which endowed the the matter is peculiarly unsuitable for forensic treatment. There are no parties, for there is no one whose interest it is to detain the patient further except in the execution of public duty, and it would be most undesirable that the local authority, or the person in charge of the asylum in which the patient is detained, should be forced into an office analogous to that of prosecutor.

3. Lastly, but in my view most important, the experience of all those who have to do with lunatics is that a very large proportion of lunatics consider that they are wrongfully detained. Every one of these people, upon the hypothesis of the question, would have a right to demand an inquiry, and many of them would exercise it. The inquiry, upon the hypothesis, is to be in public. The discussion of a lunatic's condition is peculiarly unsuitable for discussion in public. The pathological condition of the patient and many of the patient's overt acts relevant to the consideration of the question are unpleasant, in many cases humiliating to the patient, and in many cases disgusting. I am not concerned to protect the public from themselves by prohibiting the discussion in public or the publication of such details. People can read them or not as they think fit. Their disclosure and discussion, however, in public must necessarily be detrimental to the patient's interests, and upon the assumption that many or some of the applicants for such an inquiry are still insane (which is, I think, a perfectly safe assumption), many of these unfortunate creatures and their relations would cause—without a full apprehension of the result—these matters to be made the subject of public knowledge.

Again, I should have thought that in the case of a patient of whose recovery there was any hope, and specially of any patient who was making progress towards recovery, nothing could be worse than the excitement induced by such a public inquiry and nothing would be more likely to retard or possibly to prevent the recovery or the alleviation.'

1065. We are much indebted to you for that reasoned statement of your views?—Thank you.

Minister with the powers previously exercised by the Local Government Board, among other powers, of course, transferred to him.

1073. He became the repository of a large number of powers collected from other sources in addition to new powers that were conferred upon him?—That is so.

1074. Now with regard to the powers transferred from the Local Government Board to the Minister of Health, to what topics did those powers relate?—The transferred powers under the Lunacy Acts related mainly to the administration of the Poor Law, but they also include certain powers in relation to Audit and Finance, analogous to the powers enjoyed by the Local Government Board in relation to the accounting and expenditure of other local authorities.

1075. Then as regards the powers transferred from the Home Office, what was the character of those powers?—There the position was rather more difficult. It would not have been possible to transfer the powers of the Secretary of State en bloc, because they related not only to lunacy questions, but they also involved other matters which remained within the administration of the Home Secretary.

1076. A conspicuous example of course, is his jurisdiction with regard to aliens?—Yes. After all, an insane alien might be regarded either as a person suffering from mental disease who happened to be of foreign nationality, or the important point might be the foreign nationality and the other issue might be secondary. If we had taken over the Secretary of State's powers en bloc, it would have meant that we should have been involved to some extent in the administration of the laws relating to aliens.

1077. Accordingly, a selection was made of the Home Secretary's powers for transfer to the Minister of Health?—Under an Order in Council made in 1920, entitled "The Ministry of Health (Lunacy and Mental Deficiency Transfer of Powers) Order."

1078. Now when one examines that Order, in regard to the powers which were transferred from the Home Office, what do we find to be the class of powers selected for transfer?—I think the most striking point about them is that the Secretary of State's powers, the transferred powers, are much more limited than they are commonly supposed to be. The powers that really occupy most of our time are very largely financial powers, mostly of a restrictive nature, somewhat similar to Treasury powers, of control over the expenditure of visiting committees.

1079. Such as sanctioning borrowing, I suppose?—Yes, sanctioning borrowing, approving plans, approving extensions, and approving purchase of real property.

1080. I think these topics are only very indirectly related to the subject of our remit, which is confined, as you know, to certification, detention and care. It is only in so far as the provision of suitable buildings is an element in care that that topic seems to relate itself to our inquiry. I do not think we shall pursue that to any great extent. Of course the Ministry of Health has the general charge of public health throughout the country?—That is so.

1081. And mental disorder is related necessarily to that subject?—Certainly.

1082. But the code dealing with the insane had already been brought to considerable elaboration in the statutes which were in existence before your Ministry came into being?—I think it is at least arguable that had the Ministry of Health been in existence before the Board of Control in its present form was created, the relation between the two might have been somewhat different.

1083. Yes; but when your Ministry came into existence, there was already functioning the Board of Control, set up under previous statutes?—It was a going concern.

1084. And it, in its turn, was the inheritor of an important code which had been the result of legislation in the past?—Yes.

1085. But your Minister, I understand, is the Minister who answers in Parliament for the Board of Control, does he not?—That is so; he defends their estimates, and he also answers Parliamentary Questions relating to the administration of the Lunacy Laws.

1086. In your day to day work are you in close touch with the Board of Control?—Oh, yes, we are in constant touch.

1087. Do you find that the distribution or division of functions between the Board of Control and the Ministry of Health leads to any overlapping or any awkwardness in administration?—I think it is bound to lead to a certain amount of overlapping, though I am not sure that that overlapping is necessarily harmful, but it must happen in the examination of plans relating to new buildings or extensions. There is a statutory obligation on the Board of Control to report on those plans to the Minister; they are examined by their technical officers. Sometimes when they come across to us they have to be examined by our technical officers, but, from another point of view. The Board of Control are concerned to see whether, from the point of view of treatment, the proposed buildings, for example, are entirely suitable. We may sometimes have to look at it from a different point of view. We may sometimes have to consider whether, in view of the shortage of building labour, it is absolutely necessary that labour in that area should be diverted from housing to additional accommodation in asylums. Of course, if it were a question of accommodation for additional patients, there is no option; patients have to be provided for. If it were a question of additional accommodation for staff or the erection of some building that was not absolutely necessary, then, if labour was very short in the area, the Minister might say: "Well, we think this should be postponed until the situation is easier."

1088. Of course, the view of the Board of Control is a specialised view, but you have a larger survey in your Ministry?—Exactly.

1089. Therefore, do you regard the fact that these plans come under your consideration as a useful check from the public point of view?—We sometimes have to take other considerations into account.

1090. Yes, I follow. Now, while certain powers were transferred from the Home Office to the Ministry of Health, certain powers were retained by the Home Office, were they not?—That is so.

1091. It might be convenient if you took first of all the powers which still reside in the Home Secretary and have not been transferred. To what subjects do they relate?—I think the most important of the powers retained by the Home Secretary was the power under Section 205 of the Act of 1890, under which, by an order directed to the Commissioners or any other person, he may require the person or persons to whom the order is directed to visit and examine a lunatic.

1092. Those are the visits which the Secretary of State may order. That power is still retained by the Home Secretary, is it not?—As the order was originally introduced, it was proposed to transfer that power from the Secretary of State to the Minister, but objection was taken to that in the House of Lords, and the Order was subsequently modified.

1093. So that the Home Secretary has still this independent power of ordering a visit to be made and enquiry to be taken into the case of a particular lunatic?—That is so.

1094. It is "a Secretary of State." The Home Secretary is a Secretary of State, but the Minister of Health is not a Secretary of State?—That is so.

1095. Exactly. Then the Secretary of State has powers, has he not, with regard to criminal lunatics?—Yes; they were not touched by the Transfer Order.

1096. They do not really come within the purview of our inquiry at all. Then as regards the powers and duties which were transferred to the Minister under the Order, perhaps you might just classify those powers for us and describe them to us?—I think first it might be convenient to take the personal powers. Those powers are very limited; the Minister has no power to order the discharge of a patient; but there is an important provision in Section 41 (1), which requires the manager of every institution to forward unopened all letters addressed to the Minister, and in fact we do receive a substantial amount of correspondence in that way.

1097. A little later I shall ask you how you deal with that correspondence; but your Department is one of the Departments to which an insane person may direct a letter unopened?—That is so.

1098. Then next with regard to local authorities and visiting committees have you certain powers?—Those are powers of sanctioning agreements, approving new buildings and extensions, purchase of land, raising of loans for the purpose of purchasing land. In all those cases our sanction is required, but of course it is a restrictive power. We have no power except in case of default to require or even to encourage local authorities to incur expenditure. If they of their own motion wish to incur expenditure, then before the expenditure can be incurred, they have to come to the Minister to obtain sanction; it is like Treasury sanction.

MR. L. G. BROCK, C.B.

1099. But these local authorities have a statutory duty to make provision for the cases in their area?—They have.

1100. Then when they select the means of performing their statutory duty, their proposals or plans have to come under the scrutiny of your Ministry?—Through the Board of Control.

1101. That is the machinery provided?—Yes.

1102. And when you consider these questions that come before you in that shape, I take it you do not criticise plans from the point of view of whether the proposed buildings are best adapted for the treatment of lunatics, but look at them from rather a different point of view?—In general, if the plans were reported to be satisfactory by the technical officers of the Board of Control, we should accept that without question.

1103. That is, in relation to the accommodation for the patients who are to be inmates of the institution?—That is so. There have been occasional exceptions, where for example there were proposals for accommodation for patients suffering from tuberculosis; those were in fact also examined by our experts; but in general the Board of Control report is accepted without question as to the suitability in relation to the needs of the patients.

1104. You do not have on your staff medical men who are skilled alienists?—No, we do not.

1105. You have the advantage, of course, as we know, of medical advice, but it is not specially alienist advice?—The medical staff does not at present include any expert alienists.

1106. Then the Minister has certain important powers, has he not, in relation to the Board of Control itself?—He appoints the medical members of the Board; he appoints the Chairman of the Board, and, subject to the sanction of the Treasury, he settles the staff and rates of remuneration—what one might call establishment questions.

1107. And he would, of course, have to answer in the House, would he not, any criticisms that might be made on the selection of the personnel of the Board?—Certainly.

1108. Or his selection of the Chairman?—So far as they were appointed by him, of course he is directly responsible; so far as there is any criticism of an appointment by the Lord Chancellor—I cannot imagine such a thing happening—questions in the House of Commons could only be addressed to him.

1109. Then I think there also resides in the Minister a special power to direct the Attorney General to prosecute any person alleged to have committed a misdemeanour under the Act?—That is so; but since the Ministry of Health came into existence I cannot recall any case in which that power has had to be exercised.

1110. Of course, there have been a number of prosecutions for misdemeanours, but they had not to be directed from your Department?—I do not remember any one by special direction of the Minister.

1111. Then, in succession to the Local Government Board, you have certain powers relating to audit, I think, have you not?—Yes; they are analogous to the powers of the Minister in relation to other branches of expenditure by local authorities. The consent of the Minister is required to borrowing; the Minister appoints the date up to which accounts have got to be made up; and he can require the abstract of accounts to contain such particulars and to be in such form as he directs; the object of that is to secure that statistical material is in a form which admits of comparison with expenditure of local authorities in other directions.

1112. Then, of course, the old Local Government Board was specially concerned with the administration of the Poor Law?—That is so.

1113. And you are the inheritors of its Poor Law jurisdiction?—We are.

1114. And, of course, incidentally, of such portions of the Poor Law as related to the insane?—Quite so.

1115. That we shall develop a little later. Then, I think, just to complete the enumeration of the statutory powers, the Minister has power to appoint an arbitrator under section 13 of the Act of 1891 with regard to the contribution to asylum expenses payable by a borough annexed to a county?—That is so.

1116. That is rather remote from our inquiry, and I do not propose to go into questions of that type. Now, apart from Poor Law, which we have reserved in the meantime, will you give us some idea of the day to day work in your Ministry, in this department of your activities. You have referred, first of all, to the letters which come to you unopened from patients?—We get a considerable number of those letters, and of course, in addition to the letters sent unopened under Section 41 of the Act, the Minister also receives a large correspondence through Members of Parliament, and those letters in fact are dealt with in the same way.

1117. And you receive letters also from relatives and others?—Yes.

1118. So that you have a miscellaneous correspondence relating to patients who are in institutions?—Yes, of course the number of letters fluctuates very considerably. Any incident that draws special attention to the administration of the Acts always results in a considerable increase of correspondence; the appointment of this Commission, for example, led to a sharp upward curve in the amount of our correspondence.

1119. I think all our individual post-bags have also been considerably increased?—I am glad to say that our post-bag is getting more normal.

1121. Do they all relate to complaints either of improper detention or of deficiencies in diet, or of ill-treatment, or are some of them just letters really of no particular point at all?—A certain number of them of course are almost undecipherable. Others are so incoherent that it is difficult to say what they are about; but a considerable number are quite lucid and quite clearly expressed.

1122. Now when those letters come into your Ministry how are they dealt with?—They go, in the first instance, to a comparatively junior clerk, whose business it is to see that any previous correspondence is attached, and to clear up any minor points; then they go to a Principal Clerk, and generally, not invariably, he brings them to me before any decision is reached as to what action, if any, should be taken.

1123. Then you yourself are brought closely into contact with this branch of your work?—For a good many months I think I have looked at very nearly all these letters, unless, I mean, they were so hopelessly incoherent that it was not worth while wasting time on them; I have looked at all readable letters. I do not mean to say I have read them right through, but I have looked at the case.

1124. But they have been, so to speak, sifted and classified, I suppose, before they reach you?—Oh, yes; and a report, where necessary, has been obtained from the Board of Control.

1125. Then, when they reach you, how do you deal with them?—In most cases, if it is clear from the medical report that the patient is properly detained, we should simply write a letter indicating that the Minister was not able to take any action.

21 October, 1924.]

MR. L. G. BROCK, C.B.

1126. You send a reply to the writer of the letter?—Generally.

1127. But what are the means which you take to satisfy yourself whether the statements in these letters are well-founded or ill-founded? Take a concrete case: A patient complains that he or she has been ill-treated in a particular institution: what steps do you take to verify that statement?—Really our only means of verification is to ask the Board of Control for the latest information about that case. If they do not appear to have any recent medical report, then we should ask for a special report to be obtained. If on the face of that report there still seemed room for doubt, then from time to time we have asked, either that a special visit should be paid by a Commissioner, or that the case should be noted for a special interview when the Commissioners were next visiting in the ordinary course.

1128. Then the vehicle of your information in all cases is the Board of Control?—That is so, in practically all cases. The one exception is that if a case arose in which there was any suggestion that the medical treatment, apart from such treatment as was necessitated by the patient's mental condition, had not been satisfactory, then we might ask a member of our medical staff to visit the asylum and enquire into the case; but I can only remember one instance in which it was necessary; and of course we have no power to do that; it is only done by consent, as a matter of courtesy.

1129. Let us be clear about that. That is to investigate the medical condition of the patient?—Yes. As I have explained, in regard to the mental condition of the patient we are entirely dependent upon the reports obtained for us by the Board of Control.

1130. And if you are not satisfied with the material which you receive from the Board of Control, what would you do? Suppose the report seemed to you not adequately to meet the allegations contained in the letter before you, what would you do then? What powers have you then?—We should ask that more specific information should be obtained on the particular points which we should indicate as requiring elucidation.

1131. You would still be dependent of course on the Board of Control for furnishing you with that?—Absolutely.

1132. Then you spoke of requesting a special report. Can you do that?—We have no power to do it. Of course, the Board of Control work most harmoniously with us, and if we asked for a special report I cannot imagine that they would refuse to obtain it. Certainly there has not been any such refusal.

1133. Now do you refer all the intelligible letters which contain complaints to the Board of Control for enquiry or not?—No, it is not necessary to refer them all, because we have always got a certain number of correspondents who write to us at such very frequent intervals that we are really acquainted with the facts of their cases; and there are in fact a good many cases in which the mental condition of the patient is apparent on the face of the letter. It is a frequent thing to get a statement that the patient is being poisoned by wireless. I can even recall one case of a man who said he was having Communism injected into him by psycho-analysis. In those cases it is not generally necessary to make any further enquiry, unless the letter contains an allegation of cruelty.

1134. Then you spoke of having before you what we may call the office file of this man. Your junior clerk has attached the previous letters: you are therefore in a position to see if this is merely a vain repetition of what you have previously considered; but when you receive a first complaint from a patient, it will have no history behind it in your office: what do you do then?—That would be referred to the Board of Control for the latest report.

1135. Then the cases which you do not refer to the Board of Control are either cases in which on the face of the letter it appears that the complaint is groundless, or cases in which you have on your file material relating to that case, which shows that it has been previously investigated, possibly more than once. Does that accurately represent the position?—Of course, in some of those recurrent cases we do not make any attempt to reply to every letter that we receive. We reach a point at which further correspondence is simply a waste of time.

1136. Then apparently the position is this, that you discharge your duty by examining the letters and, in all cases where there appears to be any ground for enquiry, referring to the Board of Control for information?—That is so.

1137. What proportion of cases do you think you refer to the Board of Control? Do you frequently refer complaints to them?—I have not got any statistics. I should think probably rather more than half.

1138. In any cases where you have received a report from the Board, have you been dissatisfied with the adequacy of the reply?—There have been cases where it appeared to us that the report by the Medical Superintendent was not adequate, and we have asked the Board to obtain further information.

1139. Have you ever had the case to consider where even upon those further enquiries the position still seemed unsatisfactory to you?—No, I could not say that I have. The correspondence does not suggest to my mind that in any case the patient has been detained any longer than was necessary to arrive at an accurate diagnosis. I have not found any evidence of patients being improperly detained.

1140. Have you not found any in your experience?—No.

1141. But, again, in forming that judgment in any particular case, you are dependent upon the Board of Control for information?—That is so; it is all paper information.

1142. How often in your experience have you sent down a medical officer from your own Ministry to see a person detained in an institution?—I can only recall one case.

1143. It would be interesting to know why you did it in that case, and did not rely merely upon the paper information that "you had with regard to the case?—Because in that case the patient at the time of her admission was pregnant and complaint was made that in fact she did not receive proper attention at the mental hospital.

1144. Did you receive a report from your medical adviser in that case?—We did.

1145. Will you tell us whether it was satisfactory or not?—No; I could not describe it as an entirely satisfactory report.

1146. The question which she was investigating was whether this woman had had proper treatment at the time of her confinement?—So far as I can remember it was a question of the treatment during pregnancy.

1147. And was the report unfavourable?—It was rather unfavourable.

1148. What kind of institution was she in? — A public mental hospital.

1149. Is that the only instance you have had?—Yes, I think that is the only instance.

1150. Had you previously asked from the Board of Control for a report on that case?—Yes; we had had a report through the Board of Control on the case.

1151. And had their report been satisfactory?—We did not think that the explanation offered by the asylum authorities was satisfactory, and it was for that reason that it was decided to ask for a report by one of our medical officers.

1152. I may take it that that is the only case where you have thought it necessary to resort to an independent medical enquiry?—That is so, and there of course we had no power to send our officer; it could only be done by consent.

1153. That is rather important. You would have of course to make arrangements for your medical officer to go down there?—Yes.

MR. L. G. BROCK, C.B.

1154. Was there any opposition to your sending her?—No, there was no objection; the asylum authorities were perfectly willing.

1155. And did she receive all the necessary facilities to make her enquiries?—Yes; no obstacle was put in the way.

1156. I think it might be interesting to examine this case a little further, because it is the only case we have had as yet of unsatisfactory treatment. Was the complaint that this woman had not had proper treatment appropriate to her condition, or was it the absence of facilities for treating a lying-in case?—I am speaking from memory, I have not had an opportunity of referring to the case recently, but as far as I can recall, the complaint was a complaint from the husband that his wife's condition had not been detected as early as it should have been.

1157. Did the complaint not relate to the actual attendance during the labour?—No, not the attendance during the labour.

1158. It was not that?—No.

1159. Was it rather the treatment of the patient before delivery that was in question?—Yes. The suggestion was that the patient's condition should have been discovered at an earlier stage, and that she should have been specially looked after in view of her condition.

1160. What I was concerned to know was whether it was a complaint that during the confinement she had not had proper medical attention—the want of sufficient medical attention during the actual confinement?—No, it was not that.

1161. Was the visit made by your medical adviser alone or in conjunction with anyone?—I cannot recall that. The report was made to the Minister by Dame Janet Campbell; it is very likely that she did in fact visit with a member of the Board of Control, but I cannot trust my memory on that.

1162. I suppose, if desired, you can make available to us the papers relating to that case—Certainly.

1163. Have you come across cases in which persons, though still remaining certifiable, might have been discharged to their relatives if there had been means of looking after their welfare?—I think there is no doubt that cases of that kind are fairly numerous. In many instances the home circumstances do not make it possible for the family to give the patient the care that he would need if he were to be safely discharged. In a certain number of instances no doubt the main difficulty is the fact of marriage. I can recall one case in particular which was raised in the House of Commons of a Service patient, who was therefore a private patient, in which the parents wanted to get the man home, but the right of discharge was vested in the wife, and the wife was not willing to apply. In a case like that, where there is a wife of child-bearing age and no means of preventing the husband returning to her in the event of his discharge, you can understand the wife's objection to apply.

1164. We are dealing with the cases for the moment which are not improperly detained?—There was no doubt in this case that the man was properly detained and the chance of recovery very small.

1165. It was merely a question of whether the lunatic should be detained in the institution or should be handed over to his family?—Quite so. Probably he would be better in the institution.

1166. That raises rather a question of policy; it does not raise any question of wrongful detention?—No; there was no suggestion of wrongful detention in that case. Of course, there is a certain class of patients who, after a considerable term in an asylum reach a condition of what is sometimes called "asylum sanity"; they are fairly stable; they are fairly normal, as long as they remain under sheltered conditions, but if they come out into the world they could not stand any stress. It is comparable to the condition of some tuberculosis patients who remain stable and do not get, at any rate, noticeably worse as long as they remain in a sanatorium, but if they return to ordinary working conditions they break down again.

1167. Of course, the institution gives shelter and protection?—It gives a shelter, yes.

1168. Do you find in your letters from relatives that they frequently state that they have themselves seen their unfortunate relative and have satisfied themselves that the patient has recovered?—Yes.

1169. Often?—Those cases are quite numerous, and the remarkable feature about them is that where the relatives are most confident that the patient is improperly detained, the prognosis is very often most unfavourable.

1170. How do you explain that?—I think it is probably due to the fact that some forms of insanity develop slowly, and that there are periods of remission. The relatives are only allowed to see the patient on a good day; if they went on a bad day, they would not see him.

1171. So that they have no real opportunity of forming a judgment as to his condition?—That is so. On the other hand, there are cases of insanity that develop very rapidly; the curve rises steeply and then falls again almost as steeply afterwards. Once the relatives have seen the man violent or raving, they do not feel any further doubt about his insanity. I believe it is the case that those forms of insanity where the curve undulates, and there are periods of excitement followed by periods of remission, are the cases which are very often the least hopeful.

1172. Now you tell us what you can do and what in practice you do do in relation to correspondence you receive, and you have told us of your relations with the Board of Control in this matter. You have, however, no powers yourselves, have you, to discharge a patient?—None.

1173. Do you regard the powers, however, which you do possess as forming an important safeguard?—I think they have a certain tonic effect; I think they are useful as a reminder to the mental hospitals that the cases are being watched.

1174. You have, however, in your experience not come across any case where you were satisfied that there had been improper certification or improper detention, have you?—No, I have not. I think it is possible that in an occasional case the fact of calling for a report has had the effect of drawing the attention of the superintendent to an improvement in a patient's condition. Of course, one of the difficulties in dealing with all these cases is that a man does not suddenly pass from a condition of insanity to a condition of sanity; there is a period of convalescence; and it is very difficult to determine the exact point in that progressive improvement at which it might be safe to discharge him.

1175. It is a question of degree, is it not?—It is a question of degree.

1176. And I suppose that some people may be more cautious than others?—They are bound to be; it is a matter of temperament. Some superintendents no doubt are a little more inclined to play for safety than others.

1177. Of course, one has to have regard to this, that in the interests of the patient and of the public premature discharge may be very dangerous.—It may; and, of course, it may result in suicide.

1178. Therefore, it is a difficult and responsible duty to perform?—Extremely responsible.

1179. There would appear to be a balancing of considerations which must be taken into account?—That is so.

1180. Do you think it would be of any advantage that your Ministry should have a power of discharge?—No, I do not; I do not see how in practice if we had such a power it could be exercised.

1181. Then the real value of your intervention seems to be as an authority which may be invoked by the public and by patients, and which has a certain authority in dealing with the Board of Control and the institutions?—I agree.

21 October, 1924.]

MR. L. G. BROCK, C.B.

1182. And the further advantage that you are answerable to Parliament?—That is so.

1183. I do not know—it is a mere matter of curiosity—but are questions frequently put down in the House on the position of individual lunatics?—Not very frequently. There are a certain number of cases which crop up at fairly frequent intervals, but as a rule, if a Member of Parliament wants information in regard to a particular case, he would write to the Minister rather than put down a question on the Order Paper.

1184. That one can see at once would be a more considerate course, as it would not involve publicity for a particular case?—That is so, although, of course, when questions are put down relating to specific individuals, the Speaker has always allowed them to be referred to by initials and not by the full name.

1185. I must say I have not seen many questions set down relating to your Department. One is more familiar with questions about prosecutions and so on. How often do you have questions to answer in the House?—Questions about specific cases?

1186. Yes, specific cases.—They come at fairly long intervals. I do not think I care to commit myself to any figure; they are infrequent.

1187. But Members of Parliament, on the other hand, I suppose communicate with you fairly frequently, do they not?—Yes; we get a great many letters from Members.

1188. Who have been stimulated to take action by their constituents, no doubt.—That is so, the common fate of Members.

1189. Now you have told us how you deal with the correspondence and all that follows upon it. In what other way are you brought into contact with the administration of the lunacy laws?—Through our power of appointment of the medical members of the Board of Control; and, of course, we have a certain financial responsibility for them, because the Minister has to approve the expenditure on staff and the scales of remuneration, subject always to Treasury sanction.

1190. That is the Board of Control. Then I think your other relationship is also with the local authorities?—That is so.

1191. And in relation to the local authorities, you are not concerned with the care of the patients, but are concerned rather with the provision of premises and financial arrangements?—And even there, although some local authorities do write direct to the Minister from time to time, we are not directly in relation with them, because under Section 272, I think it is, the plans have to come through the Board of Control, and we reply to the Board of Control. It is the Board of Control that is in direct personal touch with the authority, except in regard to the approval of loans.

1192. Then you are not really brought into contact with the local authorities in relation to the care of the patients under their charge?—No, we are not, although as a matter of courtesy if the Board of Control were issuing any circular of special importance, they would refer it in draft to the Ministry.

1193. What in practice have you found to be your relations with the Board of Control?—Entirely harmonious.

1194. Have you been able to get from them always the information you desire?—Always.

Chairman: I think that really covers all that you have to tell us. I am very much obliged to you.

1195. Earl Russell: There is only one subject that I want to follow a little more, and that is with regard to complaints of ill-treatment received in letters from patients. Assuming that you get a letter which is apparently coherent, from a case you have not heard of before, making a complaint of ill-treatment, do you send that to the Board of Control for a report?—Yes, we should.

1196. And what do the Board of Control then do? Do they ask the asylum authorities to report?—In the first instance they would get a report from the medical superintendent of the asylum.

1197. And he, I suppose, would have in turn to obtain that from one of his junior officers, would he not, the doctor in charge of that particular ward, probably?—He would certainly have to see the doctor in charge of that particular ward; but he would probably also see the nurses.

1198. But supposing the ill-treatment was such as to have left no permanent mark on the patient, no bruise and no broken ribs, the report that came back to you would not be more than the statement of the people who were accused of having ill-treated the patient, would it?—That, of course, is always one of the difficulties in arriving at a definite conclusion as to the truth of these allegations; that the patients are very often persons who are not credible witnesses, because they may not understand what they see. Suppose, for example, one patient sees another patient undergoing any sort of massage; to a disordered mind that may very easily look like an assault.

1199. I agree, too, that patients are not necessarily credible witnesses. If they were the task would be very much easier in these cases. But I want to know this: You are ultimately satisfied, I take it, that there is no ground for the accusation of ill-treatment, and I am trying to get what that satisfaction rests upon and whether it amounts to anything more than a statement by the person against whom the accusation is made?—I should say that probably in the majority of cases where cruelty is alleged, the acts stated to have been committed are such as would have left some mark on the patient; but of course if they were not I think it is impossible to arrive at a definite conclusion, especially if the complaint reached us some little time after the alleged ill-treatment had taken place.

1200. Have you ever had a case in which you have had a succession of complaints, either from the same asylum or from the same ward of the asylum?—No, I cannot recall any case of a succession of complaints against the same individual or set of individuals. You may, and we sometimes do, get a long series of letters making very vague general statements.

1201. From the same patients, or from different patients in the same institution?—From the same patients.

1202. I was rather speaking of a case where you had two or three patients making complaints. If you got a case of that sort, you would then feel that there was something to investigate, would you not?—Certainly, but I do not remember any case of a confirmatory series of letters of that sort.

1203. The people of course who are charged with the cruelty are the actual attendants, the nurses in the asylum, either the male or the female attendants, as the case may be?—Yes.

1204. And they are examined, as I understand, only by the superintendent of their own asylum—no outside authority questions them upon the allegations?—If it was considered that there was a prima facie case for a judicial enquiry, the Board of Control would hold one.

1205. If you found something definite, like a broken rib?—Yes, and of course if any case came to the notice of the Minister which seemed to call for investigation, he would suggest to the Board of Control the propriety of exercising their powers in holding an enquiry in proper form. There has been one such case within my recollection.

1206. I entirely agree with you—do not think I am differing from you at all—as to the extreme difficulty of getting at the truth of these allegations; I only want to know what are the steps that you take before you are satisfied, and if there are any steps you think you could take beyond those that are taken?—In the ordinary way the only steps that are taken are to ask the medical superintendent to investigate the matter to the best of his ability and to report to the Board of Control.

MR. L. G. BROCK, C.B.

1207. Mrs. Mathew: I want to get this quite clear, Mr. Brock. Has the Ministry of Health no alienists on the staff?—No. I believe we have on the medical staff one medical officer who has had some experience in a mental hospital, and for a time Sir Maurice Craig acted as a part-time adviser of the Ministry on mental questions, but at the moment we have no alienists on the medical staff.

1208. Does no doctor see these letters from the patients?—Not in the ordinary way at the Ministry.

1209. I wanted to know about that woman in the public mental hospital to whom you referred. How long before her baby was born did you have this complaint?—I could not say from memory; I have not the case here, but the file is at the disposal of the Commission; I will see that it is put in.

1210. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I have two rather different questions that I would like to ask. The first one is as to whether you will explain a little further as to the need for and the advantages which are derived from the existence of the Board of Control as a separate authority, rather than as being one special department of a single inclusive Government Department which would deal with the whole thing. I mean there may be advantages in having independent action, taking a broader view of it, or it may be that it would be much more advisable and economical and more rapidly effective if the whole thing were under one roof, so to speak?—Well, Sir Humphry, that is taking me into questions of policy on which I am not instructed at this stage, and it is a little difficult to answer it, but I might perhaps suggest that there is at any rate a case for bringing the questions relating to the medical treatment of patients within the purview of the Chief Medical Officer. At present so far as there are any relations between him and the medical members of the Board of Control, that is done as a matter of courtesy and of administrative convenience rather than as a matter of constitutional arrangement or of right.

1211. But with regard to the general broad question, you prefer to reserve your answer?—I prefer to reserve the reply.

1212. The other question I wanted to ask you is this: You have to do with the construction and financial position of any new asylums that are put up?—That is so.

1213. As bearing on that from a medical point of view, there is the important question as to whether you have any control over the transfer of patients from an old over-crowded and possibly infected asylum as regards asylum dysentery, to a new asylum. That is the point of importance. One sometimes hears that the dysentery which did exist in some of the old asylums has cropped up in a new asylum as a result apparently of the transfer of patients from the old asylum to the new. Now that being a medical rather than a mental disease, have you any say as to whether patients should be transferred from old hospitals to new hospitals?—None at all.

1214. Sir David Drummond: Do you not concern yourself with the mental health of the patients, that is to say, the treatment of the patients?—I am afraid I did not quite catch your question.

1215. Does the Ministry of Health not concern itself at all with what I call the mental health of the patients, the treatment of the patients, in an asylum?—No; I would not say that at all. What I have tried to indicate is that the Minister and his staff have no power in relation to the medical treatment of the patients. Of course our medical staff are in consultation with the medical members of the Board of Control; and important circulars, for example, the circular relating to the recruitment of asylum medical officers and the necessity of improving their general position, are issued after consultation with the Ministry.

1216. Do you hold direct communication with superintendents of asylums at all?—In particular cases where there have been epidemic outbreaks—asylum dysentery, for example—a Medical Officer from the Ministry has been associated with the member of the Board of Control in making enquiries on the spot.

1217. How do you regard your connection with the whole question of lunacy—that is to say, is it a large or a small part of the duties of the Ministry of Health?—As things stand at present a very small part.

1218. Do you think it is desirable that specialists and alienists should be on your staff?—I think there would be a considerable advantage in it, but perhaps it is not for me to say.

1219. Sir Ernest Hiley: I have only one question. In your answer to Sir Humphry I was not quite sure whether you were suggesting that the Chief Medical Officer of the Ministry should, as it were, be put in control of the alienists on the Board of Control?—I did not intend to convey that.

1220. I was not quite sure whether you did. As things stand at the present time the Board of Control are independent?—That is so.

1221. And it is only when cases of medical treatment come into question that you put your Medical Officer in communication with the Board of Control?—Yes.

1222. As regards the mental treatment in the hospitals, that is a function of the Board of Control with which you do not interfere?—Of course in the main it is the function of the local authority, because on the treatment side the Board of Control are, after all, only in a position to make suggestions.

Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Brock.

(The Witness withdrew.)

MR. H. W. S. FRANCIS, O.B.E., called and examined.

1223. Chairman: Mr. Francis, are you an Assistant Secretary of the Ministry of Health?—Yes.

1224. We have just heard from Mr. Brock that the Ministry of Health, as the successor of the Local Government Board, is the central authority dealing with the administration of the Poor Law in this country. Is the Poor Law, in one of its branches, concerned with the insane poor?—The Poor Law is concerned with the relief of everybody who is destitute, and an insane person is very frequently destitute, either because of his insanity, or apart from his insanity.

1225. Therefore the Poor Law is necessarily brought into contact with the destitute lunatic?—Yes.

1226. And has that department of the Poor Law been the subject of legislation and of administrative regulation?—Yes.

1227. Will you tell us in general, before we come to detail, what is the relation of your Minister to the destitute insane population of this country?—Perhaps the best way of answering is to say that the Minister's concern is with the Poor Law and with the relief of people who are destitute. If they happen to be insane, that does not greatly differentiate his duties with regard to them.

1228. But he will have, I suppose, to administer special statutory provisions and special administrative regulations, which have been framed to deal with that class of the destitute which happens also to be afflicted with mental disability?—Certainly.

1229. Once a lunatic in receipt of relief has been placed in an asylum, does your departmental responsibility cease?—Practically. The only point upon which we could come in might be on a visit being paid to that lunatic by a board of guardians who might complain to us. In that case we should refer the matter to the Board of Control.

1230. Now will you give us a sketch of your functions in exercising the general control of the provisions made for persons in receipt of relief who happen to be afflicted mentally?—I am sorry if I go back too far. The Poor Law was a new service formed in 1834, very largely formed by the energy of the men who made the central department, and it has always been very closely run from headquarters. The details and the management of the Poor Law are controlled by regulations in a way in which no other service that is carried on by local authorities is controlled as far as I know; and the individual pauper has the protection of the Minister of Health, somewhat in the same way as the individual lunatic is entitled to the protection of the Board of Control.

MR. H. W. S. FRANCIS, O.B.E.

1231. Then you regard a destitute and insane person as coming under the special charge of your department?—So long as they remain in a Poor Law institution.

1232. Quite, until they may be transferred to a public asylum?—Yes.

1233. Now do the Lunacy Act of 1890 and the subsequent Act of 1891 at various points deal with the functions of your department?—Yes.

1234. It might be useful if we were to group those statutory functions which you exercise?—As a matter of fact there is only one provision I think in the Lunacy Act which specially refers to the Local Government Board, as it then was.

1235. That is Section 26?—Yes.

1236. Let us just look at that for a moment?—The section enables the Local Government Board, now the Minister to approve arrangements for the reception of chronic lunatics in the workhouse if the lunatics are not dangerous. There are no such arrangements in existence at the present time.

1237. Let us consider what is the purpose of this?—To relieve the strain on the asylums by removing from them people who are probably not curable, and who do not require any special care.

1238. We have heard from preceding witnesses that the accommodation in this country for the insane is rapidly approaching its limit. Have you any view as to whether there are in the public asylums of this country any cases, or many cases, which are chronic and harmless, and which are occupying beds in those asylums but might quite well find a place in your workhouses?—That is a point upon which I could not have any knowledge, but I understand the Board of Control to take the view that there are.

1239. Under Section 26 of the Act which we are dealing with at the moment, provision is made for the visitors of any asylum arranging with the local Poor Law authority for the transfer of patients from the public asylum to the workhouse?—Yes.

1240. If it be the case that beds in public asylums are occupied by persons who might quite well be in workhouses without any detriment to themselves or to the public, would it not be an advantage to utilise that section?—I should say in a certain rather limited number of cases.

1241. I observe that the initiative does not lie with your department here, however?—No, not formally.

1242. You have merely to consent if you approve of such arrangements as may be made between visitors on the one hand and guardians on the other?—Of course, the formal position differs rather from the actual one. As a matter of form the initiative lies between the local authority and the board of guardians. As a matter of practice I have discussed with the Board of Control the possibility of making arrangements from time to time, but we have not been able to reach anything sufficiently clearly right to be pressed on the local authorities.

1243. One is familiar with the expedient resorted to in most of the departments, of issuing circulars from time to time to the local authorities under their jurisdiction. Have you issued any circular drawing the attention of the guardians to Section 26?—Not since 1890. On a point of that kind we should rather expect the Board of Control to tell us they would like us to do it. And it is doubtful whether it would be of very much use.

1244. Of course it would depend largely upon whether the numbers were great and whether relief could be obtained in this way to any appreciable extent?—Quite. The difficulty really is that to make a satisfactory arrangement of this kind you want to take a whole workhouse, and it is not easy to get hold of a whole workhouse that is a good one.

1245. I observe that if a lunatic is transferred from an asylum to a workhouse under this section, he still continues on the books of the asylum?—Yes.

1246. Then I think the only other place where we find the Local Government Board referred to is in the 1891 Act, a comparatively minor matter?—That is a purely minor matter of administration. It enables one relieving officer to do certain work instead of it being divided among the relieving officers of the union.

1247. That is a matter of machinery?—Yes.

1248. You have certain statutory duties in relation to the Mental Deficiency Act of 1913, have you not?—Yes.

1249. They do not fall within our purview. Has your Minister the duty of scrutinising the plans of Poor Law institutions?—Yes.

1250. And has he to approve of the expenditure made upon them?—He approves of the expenditure, whether it is borrowed or whether it is spent out of revenue.

1251. The plans of those institutions, I suppose, will contain accommodation for the insane poor as well as for the sane poor?—Not in all cases. That is to say, there would not be accommodation set apart for the insane poor cases.

1252. Is it one of the matters to which the Minister on advice attends, as to whether there should be separate accommodation?—Yes, and any question of building a new institution.

1253. And has he a certain power in relation to the removal of Poor Law officers from their positions?—He can dismiss any Poor Law officer.

1254. From what quarter and on whose initiative does the complaint come?—The complaint may be very often an audit matter, a question of misappropriation of money; it might be a question of ill treating inmates; it might be a question simply of incompatibility of temperament.

1255. I think the Minister can act on his own initiative?—Entirely. He would ordinarily hold an inquiry first.

1256. Naturally, in fairness. Has the Minister or any of his predecessors made regulations for the government of Poor Law institutions?—Yes.

1257. Under what authority are those regulations made?—I think it is Section 15 of the Poor Law Act, 1834.

1258. What do those regulations relate to?—You are concerned primarily with institutions, I think?

1259. Yes.—The regulations control the method of admission of a patient. They say he is to be bathed and to be seen by a doctor and so on; then they control his dietary; they say what records are to be kept; they make certain provisions for the discipline of the institution, and they say how the man may be discharged.

1260. I think it might be useful if we had a set of the current regulations. I suppose you can furnish us with a copy of the current regulations?—Certainly.

1261. Do these regulations relate specially to the insane, or are they general regulations?—They are general regulations, but they do include certain provisions which mention the mental wards. They practically take the mental ward out of the category of a general ward, and place it under the special charge of the doctor.

1262. How is your department in Whitehall kept in contact with the administration of the Poor Law throughout the country?—There is a body of General Inspectors each with his own district in England and Wales, and besides that there are Medical Officers also with districts spread over the country, and women Inspectors.

MR. H. W. S. FRANCIS, O.B.E.

1263. And do these Inspectors or Medical Officers report to you?—Yes.

1264. How often do they visit the institutions under your charge?—There is a minimum requirement that they shall visit each institution once a year. Actually an institution is visited probably more often. Of course the institutions are also visited on the point you are concerned with, by the Board of Control.

1265. Do they report to you specially with regard to the provision made for the insane patients?—The Medical Officers make a report on a form which draws special attention to that point.

1266. Do I gather that throughout the workhouses in this country there is not separate provision made in them for the accommodation of the insane poor?—No.

1267. On the other hand, in some institutions there is?—In the majority.

1268. May I take it that the more modern ones do make such provision?—I think it is more a question of size than of age.

1269. In the case of a poor person, a pauper, who is mentally afflicted, it is a question for consideration, is it not, whether such person should be separated from the other inmates or not?—Yes.

1270. Will one find in the workhouses of this country persons mentally disabled who are living along with the other inmates?—Yes; I will not say that they are necessarily certified persons.

1271. No; persons who might be described as mentally weak or afflicted will be found among the ordinary inmates of the workhouse?—Yes. I do not say in a very large number of cases.

1272. May I take it that the workhouses have no special facilities for dealing with mental cases?—I am not quite clear what you refer to. By facilities do you mean in the way of skilled staff?

1273. I had in mind first of all skilled staff; then I was thinking of facilities for treatment. Workhouses are not primarily designed for the detention of cases of insanity?—A large workhouse has probably wards designed for that purpose.

1274. A large workhouse?—Yes, and a staff. Of course, in no workhouse are the numbers so large as to get as skilled a staff as one would like to have.

1275. But it is the case, is it not, that the policy pursued is not to have in workhouses cases which are acute and which require special treatment?—Cases which are acute in the sense of being violent, certainly.

1276. I mean, is the workhouse utilised as a place of residence rather for chronic cases than for acute cases?—They fall into two classes. There are chronic cases such as might be transferred under Section 26, and people who come in on 3-day or 14-day orders on their way to an asylum. A large proportion of the latter do not get to the asylum.

1278. Then are the wards which you speak of, which we find in the larger workhouses, designed really for housing persons who have been brought in under the statutory provisions, pending observation and possible transfer?—That is one class, and the other class is the chronic case.

1279. So that what you may call the permanent inmate will be found generally to be a chronic case?—Yes, invariably a chronic case, I should say.

1280. With regard to those cases where there is a mental ward, what provision is made as regards staff?—They will have a special staff for the ward, according to its size, a head attendant and a certain number of men under him.

1281. Would the duties of those persons be confined to that department?—Yes, in any place of any size.

1282. And what about the medical staff?—They would be under the general charge of the medical officer of the workhouse, or the medical superintendent of the infirmary, as the case might be. The term "workhouse," of course, includes an infirmary and any other building provided at the cost of the poor rate.

1283. Does your central department receive complaints of wrongful detention?—Very seldom. Our correspondence is quite different from that which Mr. Brock has been speaking of.

1284. One would assume that to be so from the answer that the cases which are permanently resident in such institutions are chronic cases?—Yes.

1285. Do you receive complaints relating to the treatment of the cases in your workhouses?—Yes, but not a large number; they are much fewer than they were 15 years ago. I do not know why.

1286. Now you might tell us how the correspondence which you receive is dealt with?—It is read by a clerk of some experience in my division; it is then referred to the General Inspector, and a reply is usually sent on his advice. In a large number of cases the reply sent is to refer the complainant to the visiting committee of the guardians. He is not ordinarily insane. At the same time, the General Inspector makes a note of the case if he does not know the man already.

1287. And on his next visit would the General Inspector specially attend that case?—He would probably see him.

1288. Have you ever had complaints of detention?—I made inquiries the other day, and there has only been one case in the last three years.

1289. Did that complaint emanate from a person permanently in the workhouse mental department?—Yes, I think so; I am not quite sure.

1290. Will you tell us, just as an example, how you dealt with that case?—We referred it to the Board of Control.

1291. For report?—No, for action.

1292. Did you follow it up?—I think the Board of Control visited the case. I am not quite clear what happened. The Board of Control visited the case and made some inquiries about it, and informed us what had been done, and the matter dropped.

1293. You got a report from the Board of Control, of their investigation and were satisfied?—Yes; their report showing quite clearly that there was no ground for discharging.

1294. Would that case be particularly noted by your Inspector for his next visit?—No doubt.

1295. As regards complaints apart from illegal detention complaints, how are they dealt with?—The procedure would be the same.

1296. Do you refer them to the Board of Control?—No.

1297. In such a case you use your own staff, I suppose?—Yes.

1298. Do these complaints relate to diet, bedding, and things of that sort?—Yes, and very often to a question of classification; a person dislikes the ward he or she is put to sleep in.

1299. The associations are undesirable?—Yes.

1300. Then what action do you take upon that?—We treat them in the same way.

1301. An Inspector goes and inquires?—Yes.

1302. In the course of your inquiries, have you found in recent times instances where the complaint seemed to you well founded?—Yes, a small proportion of them were.

1303. And if the complaints seemed to you on investigation to be well founded, what power have you to put matters right?—I am afraid I cannot say exactly what powers we have, but I know we should get it put right.

1304. How would you get it put right?—We should expect the Inspector to settle it.

1305. If he found a recalcitrant authority to deal with, what then?—He never does practically, not on a point like that.

1306. Has your experience been that when you investigate anything that is complained of and your

Inspector goes down to see about it, he can put it right?—Yes.

1307. In short you have not found reluctance among the local bodies to act upon the recommendations of your central authority?—No. I do not know whether it would be quite the same if we made a formal recommendation in a letter.

1308. There are tactful and tactless ways of doing things, no doubt; but you have achieved the result in every case where you have found anything wrong?—I think I can say that quite safely.

1309. Have your Inspectors a power of holding inquiries on oath?—Yes.

1310. And can they call witnesses?—Yes, they can call witnesses within five or ten miles.

1311. And can they call for documents under a subpoena?—Yes.

1312. Have you held any such inquiries—have your General Inspectors held any such inquiries in recent times?—Oh yes, a number of inquiries are being held at the present time or are in process of being held.

1313. Do those inquiries relate to persons of unsound mind to any extent?—Not to a very large extent. There have been two inquiries, I think, in the last two or three years, one in 1920 and one in 1923, on the subject.

1314. Just tell us what was the occasion of those sworn inquiries being set on foot?—The first inquiry was a complaint of unnecessary, i.e., brutal force used in the restraint of a mental patient.

1315. Who complained of that. I want to know how it started?—If I may speak subject to verification, the patient was admitted eventually to the asylum and was found to be badly bruised.

1316. So that I take it the complaint must have started as the result of the examination of the patient on reception in the asylum?—Yes, that was so.

1317. What was done?—An inquiry was held by the General Inspector with an Assessor, representative of the Board of Control. The Minister was not satisfied with the explanations offered by the attendants concerned, and required them to be dismissed.

1318. One may take it, then, that in that case the allegations were found proved?—I remember that part of the case fairly clearly. I cannot say they were found proved; it was very nearly a not proven verdict, but it was quite unsatisfactory.

1319. But the step was taken, was it, of dismissing the attendants implicated?—Yes.

1320. Who dismissed them?—The Minister required the guardians to dismiss them.

1321. And these people were therefore eliminated from the service?—Yes.

1322. That is the 1920 case, is it?—Yes.

1323. What was the 1923 case?—The 1923 case was part of an inquiry held mainly on another charge.

1324. What was the charge this time?—We were holding an inquiry on another charge, nothing to do with a lunatic, and a separate case was brought up, a complaint that a lunatic had been ill treated by the man already under suspicion. The Board of Control were not represented at that inquiry, but the charge was not proved. It was less than not proved.

1325. It was investigated, was it, by your Inspector at a sworn inquiry?—Yes.

1326. It was an additional charge brought up, additional to the matter which he had been sent down to investigate?—Yes.

1327. And was it looked into by him at that time?—Yes.

1328. And did he report that the charges on this matter were without foundation?—Yes. On the other matter the man was dismissed.

1329. So that it did not much matter—he was dismissed anyhow?—Not very much.

1330. On the matter of the treatment of an insane person, the charge was not brought home?—It was not well founded.

1331. But on the other matter it was found that he had been neglectful, and was accordingly dismissed?—Yes.

1332. These are the only two cases you can recall in recent times in which an insane pauper was concerned?—The only two cases in which we have held a formal inquiry; but I have notes of two other cases, in 1921 and 1924, of lunatic patients when admitted to an asylum being found to suffer from broken ribs or bruises. In those cases no sworn inquiry was held because it was thought that nothing possibly could be added to the guardians' inquiry.

1333. And what action was taken in those cases?—No satisfactory result really emerged.

1334. I am a little puzzled. A patient is found on admission to the asylum to show evidences of violence?—Yes.

1335. Do you mean that the persons who had committed that violence were not ascertained?—No. It might quite well not have been in the Poor Law institution at all, you see.

1336. Do you mean the violence may not have been suffered in the Poor Law institution?—Yes.

1337. Were they persons who had passed through the Poor Law institution on their way to an asylum?—Yes, in both cases.

1338. Why was an inquiry not held in that case?—Only on the ground that the guardians' inquiry was as exhaustive as anything that could be thought of.

1339. What I want to get at is this: I do not quite understand the inquiry that was held in this instance?—The guardians, as owners and managers of the institution, held their own inquiry.

1340. With what result?—With no satisfactory result, I am afraid. A satisfactory result is either to show that something did happen, or that something did not happen.

1341. I should have thought that the subject matter of the investigation was how did this particular person come by the injuries which were found upon him?—The subject matter is, did that particular person come by these injuries in the Poor Law institution?

1342. Was that the issue tried?—Yes.

1343. What was the result—they could not say?—It could not be established either way.

1344. And was nothing done in that case?—No further action was taken.

1345. It does not seem very satisfactory, does it?—I do not quite see what more could have been done.

1346. Would it not have been possible to have ascertained by inquiry when and where this particular person came by those injuries?—You cannot always.

1347. This was one of those cases which perhaps we are familiar with in the Law Courts also, where the investigation resulted in no ascertained facts?—Exactly.

1348. Have you had other cases like that?—There are no other cases in the last four years except those which I have mentioned, but I believe it is notorious that it is very difficult to say where a lunatic broke a bone.

1349. We are concerned, of course, with the machinery of the investigation, to know whether adequate means exist at the present moment for investigating any such cases. So far as your department is concerned, your only powers of investigation are through the medium of your Inspectors or through the Board of Control?—Yes. We should not ordinarily hand a case over to the Board of Control.

1350. Are there cases where your Inspector reports an unsatisfactory state of affairs which is remedied without resort to a sworn inquiry?—Yes.

1351. How many institutions are we dealing with, how many are subject to your inspection throughout the country?—There are 643 boards of guardians, I think; say about 700 institutions, the bulk of which would not come in, probably.

1352. Then through whose hands do these Inspectors' reports pass?—The reports are addressed to the Minister.

1353. Then they are dealt with departmentally?—They come through the Chief Inspector and through me.

MR. H. W. S. FRANCIS, O.B.E.

1354. Do you yourself handle all the reports from all these 600 or 700 institutions?—I thought you were referring to reports of inquiries.

1355. I just want to get the general routine work?—They come to the Poor Law Division.

1357. What other means have you?—If there is a serious matter the Inspector would probably write to the Chief Inspector, or come and see him.

1358. If there is anything serious, is that made the subject of a special report by the Inspector and dealt with by you?—Certainly.

1359. On the other hand, are the routine reports of the annual visit subjected to scrutiny in your department?—Yes.

1360. And from them can you gather the state of efficiency in those institutions throughout the country?—Fairly well.

1361. Do those reports contain recommendations, for example?—Yes.

1362. How are they dealt with?—The routine reports are read in the department and referred, if necessary, to me or to the Chief Inspector. The course recommended by the Inspecting Officer is generally taken.

1363. Are they communicated to the local authority concerned?—Yes, so far as is material.

1364. If there is any matter amiss is the local authority asked to explain it or to state what steps they are taking?—Probably the Inspector would have dealt with it informally before he makes the report.

1365. He would report to you sometimes that he found so and so existing, drew the attention of the guardians to it and succeeded in having it put right. In other cases he has noticed a state of matters which is not satisfactory, but is not able to get it put right. In such a case would you take action?—Yes, we should write.

1366. Of course, a large number of these matters do not have relation to the insane at all, I suppose?—I am afraid that is one of the difficulties of the position. The insane are a small portion of the things the Poor Law Division has to deal with.

1367. The relieving officer, of course, is related to your department, is he not?—He is appointed by the guardians with our approval: our approval is now only required when an increase of salary is proposed.

1368. And he has statutory duties?—Yes.

1369. We are going to see a relieving officer shortly. He has certain more or less independent functions?—His functions under the Lunacy Act are regarded as being independent entirely.

1370. But has the Minister certain powers with regard to relieving officers?—The Minister, through the General Inspector, would hold an inquiry as to the conduct of a relieving officer or any other officer, and he has held such inquiries into their conduct.

1371. I think that he has a statutory power over the relieving officers, has he not?—Yes.

1372. I understand that the last formal inquiry into the conduct of a relieving officer that you had in your department was in 1901?—Yes, on the conduct of relieving officers under the Lunacy Acts.

1373. In that case it was merely relating to certain fees they had received. It was not their conduct towards patients?—No.

1374. Now I would like to get from you some figures. How many persons in all were in receipt of poor relief at the 1st January, 1924?—1,372,000.

1375. That is about a million and a third?—Yes.

1376. How many of those were receiving relief on account of lunacy or other mental infirmity?—126,000—125,972 to be exact.

1377. That looks something like 1 in 10, does it not, roughly?—Yes. Of course, the total number of persons in receipt of relief has been very high lately owing to unemployment. The ordinary proportion would be higher than 1 in 10.

1378. Then the cases where mental disability is either the cause or the consequence of poverty, seem to be at the present moment somewhere in that ratio of 1 in 10?—At the present moment 1 in 10.

1379. Now of the 126,000, whom we may class in receipt of relief on account of mental disability, how many were inmates of lunatic asylums at that date?—93,783.

1380. That is far the greater proportion.—Three quarters of them.

1381. And had the responsibility, therefore, for the care and well-being of those persons passed from you to the Board of Control?—Yes.

1382. Subject, of course, as we know, to the guardians' right of visit?—Yes.

1383. I think there have been no pauper lunatics either in registered hospitals or licensed houses for some time?—No.

1384. We shall find them, therefore, all in the public asylums, in the workhouses, and in some instances, boarded out?—Yes, or in charitable institutions or on out-door relief.

1385. That exhausts the various categories?—Yes.

1386. Now of the residue how many were in receipt of out-door relief?—4,757.

1387. Are these persons residing with their relatives or other private persons?—Yes.

1388. Are these cases of persons who are certifiable?—I should not like to say. The word "certifiable" is one that is very difficult to interpret.

1389. Are they all certified persons?—No, they are not certified at all; except in asylum cases placed in the care of relatives under Section 57 of the Lunacy Act.

1390. Then this does not cover the case of a person who has been sent from an asylum to the care of relatives, although a certified person all the time?—It includes 1167 such cases.

1391. Then that leaves I think a balance of 27,432 inmates in Poor Law institutions provided by Poor Law authorities?—Or institutions not provided by Poor Law authorities—institutions not asylums.

1392. But institutions, either provided or not provided by the Poor Law authorities?—Yes.

1394. Now these are all cases in which the burden of maintenance of the pauper is upon the rates, I take it?—Yes, primarily.

1395. Again, analysing the figures still further; of the 27,432 which you have just mentioned, how many were inmates of Poor Law institutions provided solely for mental cases?—8,763.

1396. And how many were inmates of institutions provided otherwise than by the Lunacy or Poor Law authorities for persons suffering from mental disease?—Just under 2,000—1979.

1397. Then further to exhaust the figures: were some accommodated in other institutions provided by charitable and other bodies?—Yes, 246, a small number.

1398. And where will we find the rest?—The rest are in Poor Law institutions.

1399. And are they all to be found either as inmates of sick wards or other wards of the Poor Law institutions?—Yes.

1400. I think you have already told us that some workhouses have wards specially set aside for mental cases?—The majority of the larger institutions—practically all the larger institutions.

1401. In some instances, in the case of the smaller institutions, would we find the mental cases mingled with the others?—The chronic cases, yes.

1402. Now you spoke of quite a large number, 8,763, being inmates of Poor Law institutions provided solely for mental cases. What sort of institutions are those?—They are institutions provided by the Metropolitan Asylums Board for harmless imbeciles, feeble minded children. There are a certain number of institutions provided for mental defectives, places like Monyhull, which belongs to the Birmingham Guardians, or the Great Barr Colony, which belongs to another Poor Law authority. Of course they are mental defectives.

1403. So that going back to your leading figure of 126,000 mentally afflicted paupers, I take it that a large proportion of those are cases which have not been certified at all?—Under the Lunacy Acts. They may have been certified under the Mental Deficiency Act, or they may again, be mentally defective or lunatics and not certified at all. The number given is the number given by the boards of guardians as being relieved on account of mental infirmity.

1404. And of course there may be many cases of persons the cause of whose coming on the rates is mental incapacity, who yet may not be persons whom you would describe in the legal sense as lunatics at all?—Certainly.

1405. They may exhibit varying degrees of mental incapacity or disability?—Yes.

1406. Therefore we must not derive the impression that this large number represents actual certified lunatics on the rates?—Certainly not.

1407. I wonder whether it would be possible to know how many are certified and maintained out of the rates?—You begin with 94,000 in lunatic asylums; they are all certified. You have got 30,000 doubtful ones.

1408. The bulk of them are certified cases, then?—I thought you were speaking of the number in the Poor Law institutions.

1409. I was thinking of all—to what extent certified lunatics in this country are maintained out of the rates?—The vast bulk are.

1410. The institutions provided solely for mental cases under the Poor Law are to be found, are they, only in London, under the Metropolitan Asylums Board?—No, not only in London. The Metropolitan Asylums Board is the principal authority; it has 8,000 beds nearly. The other principal authorities are Bristol, Birmingham, Manchester, and West Derby (Liverpool). Bristol, Birmingham and Manchester all have more than 500 beds for persons of unsound mind of one kind or another.

1411. I suppose the question whether they are to be dealt with in a separate institution or not is a matter of administrative discretion on the part of the Poor Law authority; it may not be worth while providing a special institution unless you have sufficient numbers?—It rests with the discretion of the Poor Law authority and the Ministry, which can either refuse to allow them to build or can put great pressure upon them to make them build.

1412. But one can imagine that economically and administratively it would not be desirable to have a specialised institution except in large centres?—It would be quite absurd to have one in most unions.

1413. And the problem is solved in many unions by having under the same roof a ward for such cases. Is that how it is done?—Yes, or several wards.

1414. When you speak of the number in the Metropolitan Asylum Board's institutions, they are not all chargeable, are they, to the guardians?—No; there are nearly 2,000 cases of mental deficiency sent by the authorities under the Act of 1913. These are not chargeable to the guardians.

1415. These are not private cases, are they?—No.

1416. Who defrays their maintenance?—The local authority under the Mental Deficiency Act by whom they are sent.

1417. Of course many specialised institutions are provided and are in course of being provided, are they not, under the Mental Deficiency Act?—Yes.

1418. Now have you told us all that your department has to do in relation to persons of unsound mind?—Yes, I think so. The only other function of the department in connection with lunacy relates to the superannuation of asylum officers. I take it you are not interested in that question.

1419. No, that is a department we are not concerned with. What we are concerned with is the question of the detention and care of persons in Poor Law institutions. It is not a matter you have dealt with in the précis you have been good enough to give us, but I think both I and my colleagues have been rather concerned with an aspect of the lunacy administration whereby a person who becomes mentally afflicted seems to be classified as a pauper on becoming afflicted. I want to put this point to you and to ascertain your view upon it. A person who is perfectly respectable and a self-supporting man, in no way chargeable to the rates, suddenly becomes mentally afflicted and gets the benefit of medical attendance and so on, and then may be removed temporarily to one of your institutions, and ultimately to an asylum—apparently all in the guise of a pauper. Why is that regarded as appropriate?—The word "Pauper" is used throughout the older statutes simply as a shorthand expression for a person in receipt of relief. A pauper lunatic, who, by the way, may dislike the stigma of being a lunatic even more than he dislikes the stigma of being a pauper, is a pauper in exactly the same way as he would be if he had an attack of appendicitis and was removed to an infirmary to have his appendix cut out.

1420. A person who has his leg broken and is taken to the hospital is no doubt for the time being unable to earn his livelihood, but you would never relegate him to the category of a pauper?—I do not know why he should not be called a pauper, if he is one.

1421. Of course, there is a certain dislike to harsh words which have unhappy associations, but it does strike one as being rather unnecessary that a person, merely because of his affliction, should be described by a term which seems quite inappropriate to his state.—But as a matter of fact "pauper" is a statutory term; that is the only reason it is used. In all our publications we never speak about a pauper; we talk of a person in receipt of relief. It means exactly the same thing.

1422. You think it is more a matter of sentiment than objection to the expression?—I do not think you are ever going to find a word that will not acquire the same objectionable meaning as the word "pauper" is held to have now. It is a question of association, but as I say, we never use the word ourselves.

1423. One knows that circumlocutions much commend themselves to draftsmen of the present day, but in this instance it has rather struck us that it is a little unfortunate to stigmatise (if one may use that expression) a person who is a perfectly self-supporting person, as a pauper, merely because of the affliction that has overtaken him?—Personally I have very considerable sympathy with that view, and, as I say, we do not use the word; but you cannot help the word being in the statute.

1424. We can recommend a different formula.—Yes, but I think myself if you called it "rate aided" or anything else, the word will sooner or later have exactly the same flavour.

1425. We are told that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. The real distinction is between the case which is dealt with at his own charge and the case which is dealt with out of public moneys?—That is a slightly different point. You may have a case dealt with on its own charges, as some of these Poor Law cases are. There ought to be some way of removing it from the pauper category.

1426. That is the most odd case of all, that a person who may ultimately be found to have adequate means for his own treatment is temporarily placed under treatment in the guise of a pauper?—It is the only thing the guardians can do.

1427. Because there is temporary resort to rate aid, and for the time being the person is a rate-aided case; then it is found afterwards that the expense of treatment can be defrayed out of that person's own means; but you have to pass through a stage of being a pauper, putting it in the blunt language of the statute?—I must not ask a question, but do you think the man feels a bit the worse for having been a pauper in the intervening period?

MR. H. W. S. FRANCIS, O.B.E.

1428. We are assured that sentiment has some effect in these matters, and it is more a question of classification of the patient at the different stages; but this seems a kind of chrysalis stage through which the patient must pass with the character of poverty attached to it.—If you were to get run over as you left here you would be taken to Lambeth Infirmary and you would be a pauper.

1429. So I am informed, and you know I rather resent the idea. That is a very good illustration of it. Suppose I became mentally afflicted just now I would at once become a pauper, would I?—Not at once. You would be removed to the institution first.

1430. I would be taken to Lambeth and there I would receive the attention of the Medical Officer, would I not?

Sir Ernest Hiley: If you were a mild case

1431. Chairman: Let us assume the worst! Let us assume I am a violent case: I would be removed to Lambeth, where I would be dealt with by the Medical Officer there?—Yes.

1432. He is a person whose salary is paid out of public moneys, and I would then be receiving treatment at the public expense. I would then be detained until my case is dealt with, and during that time I am treated as a rate-aided case?—You are treated as a case. The only kind of case they have got is a rate-aided case.

1433. But the statute says that any person who receives medical treatment from a public authority is to be regarded statutorily as a pauper?—Yes.

1434. It seems rather a matter of machinery. The question is whether it is possible to rearrange the terminology?—Is it not possible simply to remove that section from the Act?

1435. That sounds attractive, if that would achieve the object?—It is only the question of a name.

1436. It does appear essential, of course, in emergency cases, that there should be public machinery, and therefore rate-aided machinery, to deal with such cases from whatever source they come. The whole point seems to be that once resort is made to the rates for any purpose, the person who benefits by that expenditure is regarded statutorily as a pauper?—He is statutorily a pauper, but I do not think anybody regards him as one.

1437. I should have said rather, that he is defined as a pauper by the statute.

1438. Earl Russell: And has been a pauper even if he repays the costs?—Yes, certainly. It is merely a question of draftsmanship.

1439. Chairman: It is a question of nomenclature, is it not?—Yes.

1440. Mrs. Mathew: How many women Inspectors have you got, Mr. Francis?—Six, I think, at present.

1441. And what sort of class are they?—They have been nurses and assistant matrons.

1442. Another thing I wanted to ask you about was the reception of lunatics. Are these two classes mixed? I mean the Section 26 cases and Section 24 cases?—There are no cases under Section 26 at the present time.

1443. But I understood that there were a lot at the workhouses?—They have chronic cases in them.

1444. That is what I mean?—I am sorry, they are not technically Section 26 cases.

1445. I beg your pardon. Are they mixed together—those two classes of lunatics?—They may be; it depends upon what accommodation there is and what numbers there are.

1446. Does that often happen?—I should not say so.

1447. When there is an inquiry or a need for an inquiry as to ill-treatment, do we understand that it starts with the guardians, goes on to the Board of Control, and can go up to the Minister of Health?—No. As far as the Poor Law is concerned the Board of Control, with no disrespect to them at all, come in if we ask them to.

1448. It is just you and the guardians, and lastly the Board of Control. I just wanted to know what the procedure was?—Yes.

1449. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I have two questions, Mr. Francis. The first one is with regard to the reception of lunatics in the workhouse infirmary, some of which are most admirable buildings now. I understand that the policy is to retain permanently there only a certain class of chronic lunatics, but is it not the fact that in practice it is a great advantage, and that that advantage is considerably employed, to take in acute cases for the time being?—There are two advantages, I think, alleged for that. One is that you can go to an infirmary for a number of different reasons. There is only one reason for going to an asylum. The second is that a considerable proportion of these cases on their way to the asylum will recover in the infirmary and never get on to the asylum.

1450. And that is taken very considerable advantage of, is it not?—Yes.

1451. The point I was leading up to was this: I think you rather gave us the impression that there were no special arrangements for such acute cases. Is it not true that there are rooms which are protected or padded?—Certainly.

1452. So that in a way they are very well provided for?—I think so.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: I am not sure whether the Chairman would rule out of order the other question I wanted to ask, but I should like to know whether I could bring it in as bearing on the care of the lunatic. That is with regard to the superannuation under certain circumstances of superintendents and medical officers of asylums and workhouse infirmaries—whether the power exists in the Ministry of Health to initiate the premature superannuation of an officer who, perhaps from illness or from premature age, is no longer so capable as he was when he was appointed. Does that question bear on the care of the patient?

Chairman: I think myself that we should not be pedantic in construing our Terms of Reference. Your question does seem to have a bearing upon them because it relates to the efficiency of the staff. Personally I should welcome your putting the question, Sir Humphry.

1453. Sir Humphry Rolleston: If I might do so, the question I wanted to ask was as to whether circumstances do arise in which a most capable medical officer or superintendent does become, before the time that he should be superannuated, not quite up to his work? I am speaking of both asylums and of Poor Law institutions?—Asylums would not concern us at all; that is a matter for the Board of Control. Perhaps I might say that you ought to put that question to the Board of Control.

1454. As far as Poor Law institutions are concerned, of course there are cases of that kind in which the Ministry could initiate the movement for a man receiving his pension prematurely?—Yes, I think you might say that the Minister might initiate the movement. It would rest with the guardians and the officer, but it sometimes happens when it is wanted to happen.

1455. But the Minister could set the ball rolling?—It might happen and does happen.

1456. Is it within his power to do so?—It is in his power to dismiss any officer of a Poor Law authority.

1457. I do not mean dismissal?—I meant that is the ultimate sanction under which he might possibly act. If it is in your power to dismiss a man, it is in your power to suggest that he might usefully and wisely go.

1458. Sir David Drummond: Do you concern yourself with the qualification of the medical officer to look after patients in Poor Law institutions? Have you anything to do with the appointment of medical officers?—No, there is no formal requirement as to what his qualifications should be, but our Medical Officers do advise the guardians on questions of that kind very largely.

1459. But you do not interest yourself in the appointment of him? You have nothing to do with the appointment of a medical officer?—The appointment of a medical officer requires our sanction if the guardians propose to pay him a salary higher than his predecessor had received.

1460. Only to that extent?—Yes.

1461. Sir Ernest Hiley: He is not subject to your approval, then?—Except in so far as we can in the last resort dismiss him.

1462. Suppose the guardians want to appoint a new medical officer; does their appointment require your approval?—Not now, unless the salary is higher than the previous salary.

1463. Then really the qualifications and attainments of the man appointed are not known to you until you have had experience of his work?—Not officially, but our Medical Officers would very often be consulted by the guardians before they proceeded to an appointment.

1464. If he proves unsatisfactory then you have power to dismiss him, although you have no power to sanction the first appointment?—We had power to sanction all appointments, but we modified our regulations recently.

1465. You did that; it was not done by Parliament?—No.

1466. Just one question about the inquiry by the guardians which turned out to be an abortive inquiry: Was the inquiry initiated by the guardians?—I am afraid I have not the actual papers here. I could give the Secretary a note of the case.

(After an adjournment.)

MR. ERNEST JAMES LIDBETTER, called and examined.

1474. Chairman: Are you President of the National Association of Relieving Officers?—Yes.

1475. And are you General Relieving Officer of the Parish of Bethnal Green?—Yes.

1476. You are good enough to attend here to-day to give evidence on behalf of the Association?—That is so.

1477. Your Association, I take it, is representative of the relieving officers of England and Wales?—Yes; we represent about 60 per cent. of the eligible members, many of the others being in remote districts where no association could survive.

1478. We may, therefore, take your evidence as representative of the views generally of the relieving officers of this country?—Yes; and supplementing that I may say that we have eleven branch associations, and, as far as possible, their suggestions are embodied in the memorandum now before you.

1479. It is desirable that the Commission should know the part you play in the administration of the Lunacy laws of this country, and perhaps you will be good enough to devote your evidence to that aspect. You have, have you not, as a relieving officer, certain duties to perform under the Lunacy Act?—Yes.

1480. Will you tell the Commission how you are appointed?—We are appointed by the boards of guardians, who recommend the appointments to the Ministry of Health, and the latter body sanctions the appointments.

1481. Are the appointments made on competition, or how?—Generally an advertisement is issued, and the candidates appear before the board; a certain number of candidates apply for the appointment, a smaller number is required to attend the board, and a vote declares who is the successful applicant.

1482. What sort of qualification is required in a candidate?—None at all, unfortunately. In recent years we are doing what we can to establish a certificate of efficiency, which is now being given by the 1467. Do you know whether it was an inquiry with evidence on oath?—It would not have evidence taken on oath.

1468. After the result had been so unsatisfactory, did the Ministry allow the matter to drop, or did they go on with an inquiry of their own?—We did not hold any further inquiry, on the ground that we could not see any possible advantage to be got from it.

1469. Then really the cause of the patient's injury remained undiscovered?—Yes.

1470. Earl Russell: And you considered that, although inconclusive, the guardians' inquiry had been properly conducted?—Yes, or we should certainly have held one.

1471. Chairman: Just one other question: There is no requirement, is there, that the medical officers of workhouses who have in their charge mental wards should have any special qualifications?—No. An attempt is being made in a few cases to secure a consultant alienist.

1472. Take the case of the institutions under the Metropolitan Asylums Board, which are devoted exclusively to mental cases: are they under the charge of specialists?—I do not know what their qualifications are, but they are certainly specialists.

1473. You have been good enough to append to your précis a very useful little summary of the powers that were transferred to the Minister. I propose, if you agree, that we should print that as an appendix?—If you please.*

Chairman: It is a very useful reference to the sections of the Acts of Parliament. Thank you, Mr. Francis.

Poor Law Examinations Board, a voluntary organisation which has been in existence for about 25 years; but, with the exception of the possession of that certificate, there are no qualifications.

1483. The guardians consider the suitability of the applicant after an interview, and the reading of testimonials as to character, and so on?—Yes, and past experience, as shown in the application.

1484. Being established as a relieving officer, a person has at once to acquaint himself with the statutory duties, I take it, and he has certain functions to perform at different stages in connection with the administration of the Lunacy laws?—That is so.

1486. The initiation of any step appears there to be left with the relieving officer in the cases you have mentioned?—The initiation is, subject to what takes place, to bring the matter to his knowledge.

1487. But he is the first functionary, so to speak?—Yes, he is the first functionary.

1488. We have heard a good deal already with regard to the operation of Section 13—is that a section under which in your experience many cases are dealt with?—No; nearly all the cases with which a relieving officer deals come under Section 14—Section 14 for process, and under Section 16 for certification. If I may say so, Section 13 is a rather misunderstood section in many respects; Sections 4 to 8 have already described the processes by which a non-pauper person may become a lunatic, and under these sections process must be taken by the relative, a step which ultimately results in the alleged lunatic being taken to an asylum. That is a duty which would be repugnant to a large number of people, and I think Section 13 contemplates three classes of case; one, where the relatives feel that the duty is so repugnant that they would defer taking action until the point of danger has been reached; secondly, where they flatly refuse to perform the duty; and a third class of case is where the lunatic has been left in the care of friends as a patient and is cruelly treated or neglected, so that it is necessary for someone to interpose. It is necessary for an official to act in all those cases, and the machinery is provided for that purpose generally.

1489. It is rather a remarkable section, for it expressly deals with persons not paupers, and the relieving officer is brought in to deal with them?—It is remarkable in that respect, and also in that you commence with a non-pauper and finish by sending him to an asylum as a pauper lunatic.

1490. We have had evidence that Section 13 in some places is taken advantage of quite largely?—Yes, but that, I think, is due to the misunderstanding I have referred to, in this—that the expanded definition of “pauper” which you get in Section 18 is not generally accepted. If you refer to Section 18, it provides that “A justice shall not sign an order for the reception of a person as a pauper lunatic into an institution for lunatics, or workhouse, unless he is satisfied that the alleged pauper is either in receipt of relief, or in such circumstances as to require relief for his proper care.”

1491. Yes, that is prospective?—Yes. The definition section defines a pauper as a person in receipt of relief, and here you have an expansion of that term which enables you, where a case is brought under Section 13, to look into the future to see if it is a pauper case, and to act in that sense.

1492. I think you put it very strikingly when you point out that though you begin with a person who is not a pauper, the result is that under the section he is converted into a pauper?—Quite. While he is earning he supports himself; directly his liberty is restricted he becomes a pauper.

1493. Because he is a person who requires a relieving officer's care?—Yes.

1494. And then by the definition it dubs him a pauper?—Yes, and automatically the section lifts him out of those three categories I have indicated.

1495. In your experience, then, resort has not been frequently had to Section 13?—No.

1496. It has been put to us that it provides an intermediate procedure between the case of a private person and a pauper case?—I think it is so used a good deal in certain areas, but that has not been my experience. I think restriction to the three classes I have referred to is its proper sense. If the relieving officer is called to a case where there are sufficient means to make the case a private case, if he talks the matter over with the relatives he generally persuades them to present a petition, so that action under Section 13 is not necessary at all.

1497. One is struck on reading this section with the phrase “the relieving officer has knowledge.” He will have knowledge (a) in respect of a pauper actually in receipt of relief outside the workhouse by notice from the medical officer under Section 14, Sub-section (1), or otherwise under Section 14, Sub-section (2). The first sub-section contemplates a case which is already under the care of the medical officer, and he will give the relieving officer notice, but that case very seldom arises; under Sub-section (2) to Section 14, the relieving officer is to act, whether he has had notice “or otherwise,” and then within those last two words the relieving officer gets intimation of cases.

1498. But we are dealing here under Section 14 with paupers—Sub-sections (1) and (2) both deal with pauper cases?—Yes, I think in the wider sense of Section 18, to which I have already called your attention.

1499. One would naturally assume that under Section 14, if a person is a pauper, he is already, so to speak, under the supervision of an authority, and that his condition would necessarily come to the knowledge of the medical officer?—Quite.

1500. But you say that is not so necessarily?—No. A very large number of the cases are brought under the second sub-section; that is, cases brought to notice by relatives or other persons.

1501. How does the case of a person who has the misfortune to be so afflicted come to your notice—how is it done in practice?—In practice, in the great majority of cases the nearest relatives have consulted a medical man, who sends them to the relieving officer with either a written intimation or a verbal statement that observation is necessary. In that way the majority of cases come to notice, but there are a fair number of cases which come without reference to any medical man at all.

1502. You have an office, I suppose?—Yes, every relieving officer has an office, and the place would be well known in the district, and where he is to be found.

1503. You have said your notice may be served under Section 14, and then you might also get notification of cases from the medical officer of an institution?—Yes, that would be under Section 24, Sub-section (6).

1504. Where people are already in an institution?—Yes. It may be that he is a permanent inmate of a workhouse in the normal sense, or it may be with regard to people who have been admitted to the hospital where the relieving officer has been doubtful whether it was a mental case which it was proper for him to handle.

1506. Then your services as executive officer are invoked by the medical officer of the institution?—Quite, and that notice from the medical officer throws us back at once to Section 14, Sub-Sections (2) and (3).

1507. Then you have occasions on which relatives directly bring a case to your notice, which you have already told us about?—Quite.

1508. When you are made aware of a case, what is your procedure?—The usual procedure is for the relieving officer at once to visit the alleged lunatic.

1509. You have ascertained from the person who has given you the information about the case where the alleged lunatic is?—Yes, and we take such statement as the person bringing the information is prepared to give. If it is a husband or a wife, they will tell you of things which have happened as between the parties, which enables the relieving officer to form some opinion.

1510. Then having got such information as your informant can give you, is your first step to go and see the person concerned?—The first step is to go and see the person concerned.

1511. And you may find him either in his own home or possibly in an institution?—Yes.

1512. Then when you see the alleged lunatic, what do you do?—The rule is for the relieving officer to talk to the lunatic and satisfy himself that he is a case to deal with. On that point I ought to say that the relieving officer regards himself as having a certain amount of discretion. The sections of the Act may perhaps read in an imperative sense, but the relieving officer does not always hold himself bound by that. For instance, the information that is brought may be brought by some prejudiced person. Many of them are the result of family quarrels, little drinking bouts, and so on, and the officer must exercise some discretion with regard to that. For instance, in two cases in my own experience wives have come to the office and given notice that their husbands are mentally affected, but the relieving officer who has investigated the case has come to the conclusion that the person who has given the information is really the person afflicted, and in two cases the person giving the information has been sent to the asylum, and the other parties have not. In one case both parties were sent. So that a relieving officer has discretion.

1513. He may find out that the complaint is a bogus complaint?—Quite so; or he may find out that there has been a family quarrel, and more particularly must he exercise his discretion in those circumstances if one of the parties has been in an asylum before.

1514. If, on the other hand, you find the case is an appropriate one for further investigation and procedure, what do you do next?—The relieving officer almost invariably removes the case to the workhouse under Section 20. In all urban areas that is the practice. It is not a rule which is absolute, but in nearly every case it is so.

1515. The Statute contemplates that removal to the workhouse shall take place if it is a matter of urgency, but do you generally do so?—It is generally done, and it has been ever since the Act of 1890 was passed.

1516. That is a physical act—you remove the person, if there is a prima facie case, to the workhouse?—Yes.

1517. Earl Russell: Do you remove them by ambulance?—It is always done by ambulance, or if you cannot get an ambulance you use anything that comes along—a cab; and in the case of females there is always a female attendant.

1518. Chairman: Then the person is received into the workhouse, and I suppose up to this time you have no warrant of any kind?—No, no warrant of any kind.

1519. And the patient is handed over to whom—the master of the workhouse?—Yes, or his staff; in most cases he is taken direct to the mental ward, and a notice is served on the master that the case is brought under Section 20, which, of course, binds the master to retain him.

1520. What would be done in a case where there is no mental ward?—In nearly all urban areas there is some sort of accommodation in the workhouse, though it is not always the best accommodation. In rural areas it may be there is not, and in those areas the case is generally certified and taken straight off to the asylum.

1521. You have disposed of the person of the lunatic; now what legal steps do you take to legalise the position?—We notify the justice.

1522. And I think for this purpose your notification must be to a judicial authority, must it not?—If the case is one under section 13, then it will be to a judicial authority. Shall I take section 13 first? In that case notice is given to a judicial authority; the judicial authority will then appoint two medical men to examine the lunatic. The judicial authority is to proceed in the same way as if a petition had been presented; that is Section 13, sub-section (2).

1523. We have on our notes already a pretty accurate description of what happens on a petition, so we will not deal with that. But the difference arises here, I think, that it does not require the judicial authority to visit the patient?—No, he is not bound to, but he may.

1524. On making the order, assuming him to be satisfied with the result of the certificates of the two medical men, I do not think he is required, to state whether he has himself seen the patient or not?—I think he need not say that in the order.

1525. He gets on the lines of the normal procedure?—Yes, quite. The only other point where we differ from the petition process is that, if he makes a reception order, the lunatic is to be sent to any asylum to which, if a pauper, he could be sent.

1526. In contradistinction to the case of a private patient who may be sent to a private house?—Quite, and then finally the relieving officer is to remove the lunatic to the institution named in the order. There is one point there I should like to mention with regard to the order made on petition, which is the parallel to this case, which does not require the removal of the patient to the asylum. It is a mere authority to remove the patient; but the order made under Section 13 or under Section 16 or under Section 23 provides that the patient is to be removed by the relieving officer. Under those three sections there is a directory order, but under the process on petition it is mere authority to do a thing.

1527. Under the process on petition, who actually does remove?—I take it the relatives would; I think as a rule those arrangements are made by the institution about to receive.

1528. If the patient in question is in a workhouse, which seems to be the normal case, pending these proceedings, do you then take the person from the workhouse to the asylum which is mentioned in the order?—Yes.

1529. And on handing over the person to the custody of the asylum your functions are at an end, are they?—So far as the person of the lunatic is concerned, but we may still have to manage part of his affairs; so far as he is personally concerned we have finished with him.

1530. You know we are especially interested here in safeguarding that persons shall not be taken to and confined in asylums without proper precautions. This procedure you have been describing would appear to exhibit these points at which the person is protected—there is first of all the fact that the relieving officer at once sees the person alleged to be insane?—Yes.

1531. Do I gather from you that a certain number of cases are eliminated at that point as being cases of no importance?—Yes.

1532. The next safeguard appears to be the medical examination by two medical men?—Quite.

1533. Coupled with the judicial authority's right to see the patient if he pleases?—Quite.

1535. One wants to see at how many points in the course of the proceedings the unfortunate person may be examined by independent persons?—There are two other points beyond those you name—the first is that the relieving officer very seldom acts on merely seeing the lunatic; he is taking the statements of near relatives and friends as well at all stages; and further than that, the judicial authority is empowered to make such further inquiries as he thinks proper if he is not satisfied, and in many cases he does that.

1536. Are you, so to speak, a participator in those proceedings before the judicial authority?—Yes, the relieving officer is in attendance always.

1537. In fact you are very much in the place of a petitioner?—Yes. The only difference between this process and the petition is that instead of the petition you have a sworn statement of the relieving officer, because under the section the statement of the relieving officer must be a sworn statement.

1538. That is Section 13, which you say in your experience is not very frequently used?—It is not very frequently used.

1539. But Section 14 is your normal procedure, I take it?—Section 14 is our normal procedure.

1540. Will you tell us what you do there?—Under Section 14 we give notice to a justice of the peace within three days; that is under Sub-section (2).

21 October, 1924.]

Mr. ERNEST JAMES LIDBETTER.

1541. That need not be a judicial authority?—No, it may be any justice. The judicial authority is a person without limits to his area of jurisdiction; a justice of the peace must have authority in the place where the pauper resides.

1542. You give notice to him within three days of the facts coming to your knowledge?—Yes.

1543. And in the meantime the patient may well be in the workhouse?—Yes.

1544. What happens next?—We bring the justice to him—the justice of the peace has to appoint a medical man to examine the lunatic, and to fix a time within three days to so examine him.

1545. One is struck at once here with the fact that one medical man alone is required, but, on the other hand, the justice of the peace must actually see the person in question—can you suggest any reason for this difference of procedure in the two cases?—No, I cannot, and I have never been able to understand the difference, and may I point out that under the head of recommendations we are suggesting that there should be no difference in the two processes.

1546. Simplification of procedure, you think, in these matters is very desirable, provided proper safeguards are maintained?—Yes. There are other differences between private and pauper cases of considerable importance. May I enumerate those differences? The non-pauper will be certified by a judicial authority; the pauper by a justice of the peace—any justice of the peace having jurisdiction. The non-pauper will have two medical men to examine him, that is to say, two medical certificates, each signed by a different man, and the pauper only one. The non-pauper need not be seen by the judicial authority signing the certificate, but the pauper must. The relieving officer in the case of the non-pauper proceeds by information on oath; in the case of the ordinary pauper he simply tells the justice he has a case. Then finally in a non-pauper case if a reception order is not made, the documents must be sent to the Board of Control, and the justice must state his reasons for not making an order in writing, but in the case of a pauper he simply takes no action, and the matter ends there.

1547. Earl Russell: If the justice makes no order?—If the justice makes no order, the matter ends.

1548. Chairman: Do you then go back to the workhouse where the man is temporarily detained and tell him to go?—Yes, on the justice intimating that he will make no order there is no further power to detain the man any longer, and he is discharged.

1549. If, on the other hand, the justice is satisfied on the one medical certificate, plus his own visit, he will then pronounce an order?—Yes.

1550. Are you then armed with this order, and do you carry out your executive function of conveying the person from his home or from the workhouse to the asylum?—Yes.

1551. And there your functions are at an end?—As far as the person of the lunatic is concerned.

1552. In working the Act have you discovered any reason for this differentiation of procedure you have mentioned?—No, and we are unanimous there should not be this distinction, bearing in mind the very thin line which in many cases divides the pauper from non-pauper cases.

1553. Of course, unnecessary elaboration of procedure makes mistakes more likely?—Quite; and you will observe, too, if the case is one for the detention of the lunatic in the workhouse he has to have the benefit of two medical certificates.

1554. I think we have not dealt with the case of the lunatic wandering at large?—Yes. There, under Section 15, if the relieving officer has any knowledge that a person wandering at large is deemed to be a lunatic he can apprehend him and take him before a justice.

1555. In this case you do not take him to the workhouse?—We do, as a matter of fact; we put Section 20 into operation and so bring him into line with the other cases.

1556. Then, again, in your experience there is no need for a specialised code applicable to the lunatic wandering at large?—No. Section 15 is redundant in practice, because cases arising under it are invariably dealt with under Section 20.

1557. The classification of the persons you have to deal with according to their circumstances does seem a little arbitrary. The lines of demarcation among the various classes—a person who is to be deemed a lunatic and wandering at large, and a person who is not a pauper and not wandering at large, but is not under proper control, or who is being ill-treated, and a pauper who is brought to the knowledge of the relieving officer as being a lunatic—are not very clearly drawn, are they?—No, and the relieving officer gets over that difficulty in two ways, first by the application of Section 20, and second by the words to which I have referred in Section 18. He draws a distinction between the man who has means for his maintenance as a private patient and the man who must be, if he becomes a lunatic, maintained at the public charge.

1558. In practice would there be any difficulty in all the cases being dealt with by the relieving officer, followed by two medical certificates; in short, a uniform process applicable to all reception orders?—None at all; that, in fact, is what we recommend a little later.

1559. Simplification, of course, is one thing, but would that simplification in your view reduce the safeguards in any way?—It would not, subject to some clear understanding as to what is to happen when you have two medical men not in agreement.

1560. But would it lessen the safeguards or not?—No, I do not think it would lessen the safeguards.

1561. We are concerned to maintain all the safeguards, and when one finds a statutory provision in an Act one assumes it to be of some value; but do you find in practice that there is no special virtue to be found from the point of view of protection of the public in the differentiation of the procedure?—No, I see nothing in that.

1562. I should have thought in a case where you have two medical certificates, you have probably more protection than you would have in a case where there is one medical certificate only, plus the compulsory visit of the justice?—No, I should not think that; I think one medical man plus the justice would be as good as the certificates of two medical men and no justice.

1563. Then you attach importance, do you, to the lay magistrate seeing the patient?—Generally I do, and bearing in mind the possibility that the medical men will not be in agreement; and I ought to mention that that is one of the practical difficulties under Section 13, where two medical men are called in and do not agree. Now what procedure is to be adopted? The section, to my mind, limits the powers of the justice of the peace to two medical men, but in several places I know it to be the practice that if the two medical men do not agree they call in another one—they may call in another medical man and take the opinion of the majority of the three; or if the justice of the peace feels the man is a lunatic—it may be a matter of mere observation, or it may be a matter of prejudice—but if he feels the man is a lunatic and if he may employ more than two, he may bring in all the doctors he can, until he finds one who will be in agreement with his views. That is one of the difficulties which practical men have under this Act—does the section limit the justice of the peace's action to the certificates of two medical men?

1564. I should have thought if two medical men called in by the justice found themselves in disagreement, he might well think it a border-line case, and that the case would necessarily collapse because the requisites for the order did not exist?—I should have thought so, too, but I know it to be the practice in many cases to call in extra medical men and to take the opinion of the majority.

MR. ERNEST JAMES LIDBETTER.

1565. I do not see any justification for that in the Statute?—No, I see nothing at all in the Statute to justify that. It seems to me the intention of the Statute is this, that if two medical men cannot agree then the case is not so bad as to be sent to an asylum.

1566. I should have drawn the same inference myself.

1567. Sir David Drummond: Why do you put the justice's opinion before the opinion of the doctor?—Only because he is the deciding authority.

1568. But his knowledge of the subject will not be equal to that of the doctors?—Quite; I agree; but a justice refusing to make an order when the doctor says the case is one for an order would be taking risks.

1569. Chairman: Of course, in a private case you may have the two doctors and the magistrate visiting the case also, but not necessarily?—Quite.

1570. But as a safeguard you rather express a preference for the one doctor plus the justice seeing the patient rather than the provision of the two medical certificates and no visit?—I should prefer to see two doctors and the justice.

1571. That is the ordinary procedure?—That is the ordinary procedure. I think I might put it in this way: I think no reception order should be made without the justice who signs that order seeing the case.

1572. That is your view?—That is my view, and I would add to that that I think two medical certificates are better than one.

1573. But I can quite understand you think from the public point of view the actual seeing of the patient by the committing magistrate is very important?—I do.

1574. Sir David Drummond: At present, supposing there are two doctors seeing the patient and one does not agree with the opinion of the other, and the justice gives an opinion which agrees with that of the one doctor who is prepared to certify, would you therefore conclude that the justice has a right to sign the order?—No, not without the two certificates.

1575. Chairman: The two certificates must be concurrent?—Yes. In my submission, if he calls in two doctors and they are not in agreement the patient is entitled to his discharge.

1576. I think what you were anxious to bring out was that you would rather have a justice make an order regarding the patient he is dealing with, with the assistance of one doctor, than have a justice relying on the opinion of two doctors as to the condition of a person he may not have seen?—That is so.

1577. But you regard the most perfect method as being to have a justice with two doctors' opinions?—Yes, especially if that could be developed in association with a system by which the justice of the peace should be an experienced person.

1578. Sir David Drummond: But supposing the doctors disagreed?—Then if the doctors disagreed the patient should have his discharge.

1579. Earl Russell: By Section 13 the justice is not bound by the medical certificate?—There is no section of the Lunacy Act which requires a justice to make an order.

1580. Sir Ernest Hiley: Have you ever known of a case in your experience where the justice has dealt with a man wandering at large?—No, not in my experience, but I know at least of one place in London where it is the practice to call in another medical man.

1581. Chairman: But you gave us a picture just now of a justice perambulating the country in order to find a medical man who would agree with one of the two medical men, because the justice himself was of a certain way of thinking?—Yes, I was rather attacking the system which permits a justice of the peace to wander beyond what I regard as the proper conditions of the Statute.

1582. But I understand you do not suggest such a thing has happened?—No, I do not know that it has ever occurred.

1583. You merely point out what might occur?—Yes. If he may call more than two doctors, why not any number? I know it occurs that they sometimes call in a third doctor.

1584. But even for that there appears to be no statutory warrant?—No authority at all.

1585. And your view is, and I think it is a correct view, if I may say so, that if there are not two concurrent certificates as to the case in hand, the justice, although he has power to deal with the case, would not, or ought not in practice to pronounce an order?—I agree.

Earl Russell: There is an important point in this, namely, whether if there are three certificates the whole of them are brought before the Board of Control?

1586. Chairman: Yes. (To the Witness): Supposing there is a third certificate, would the Board of Control be provided with all three opinions, or with only the two opinions which prevailed?—I cannot tell you. Of course, it is provided by the Lunacy Act that the medical certificate shall be exhibited to the order in every case. In the case we are referring to, the order only provides that the positive certificates should be put in. I do not know, but possibly the medical man who does not agree would not sign a certificate at all, because the form requires a statement that the person is a certified lunatic. If the case is under Section 13 and no order is made, all the papers must go to the Board of Control, and there must be a statement that a certificate has not been given.

1587. There cannot be a negative certificate, can there, but there may be a refusal to give a certificate?—There is, and in that case no document is signed at all—the medical man simply says, "I will not certify," and nothing is done.

1588. Earl Russell: Is it merely because no document is signed that the fact has to be reported to the Board of Control?—No; Section 13 requires the reasons for the refusal of the order to be sent to the Board of Control.

1589. I am assuming the case where an order has been made on the opinion of a third doctor?—I cannot tell you what happens there—I have no information.

1590. Chairman: Of course you can conceive three doctors investigating a case and two of them being of opinion that the case was certifiable, and that they could sign a certificate, while a third might say, "I do not agree with the views of my colleagues." In that case there would be in existence two certificates which would be utilised as the basis of an application to a justice, and he would proceed on them, but he would not know that a third medical man had been called in?—He would under Section 13, because he appoints them.

1591. And you rather suggested that he would know the views of the people he had invoked. But if he had only called in two medical men and one said he could certify and the other that he could not, in that case he would dismiss the application?—Yes.

1592. But there is the other case—if he said, "I shall go further, and see a third person"—has that ever happened in your experience?—Never in my experience.

1593. To what extent has such a practice obtained, do you think?—I know of one place in London and I know of one place in a large city in the North where it happens, and I have asked in the last few months, in discussing the matter with my colleagues, and been surprised to find in many cases that it is considered a proper practice.

1594. Sir David Drummond: Supposing the justice sees a patient and that there are two certificates, but only one is effective, what happens?—Then in my submission he cannot make the order.

1595. But is it not strange that in the other case only one certificate is necessary, because it seems to me it all turns on the discretion of the doctors?—Quite so.

1596. Chairman: I take it the main trend of your argument is in favour of a simpler and more uniform method of dealing with all the cases?—Quite, and we are unanimous as an Association in recommending that there should be one method.

1597. And the adoption of one method would not in your view lessen the safeguards of the public?—No, I do not think it would do that.

1598. There are one or two small matters of detail which I want to deal with. There is provision made, is there not, for one relieving officer being specially designated to perform the duties under the Lunacy Acts?—Yes, that is contained in Sub-section (2) of Section 2 of the Act of 1891.

1599. As regards the actual conveyance of a lunatic to an asylum, that would be after an order has been pronounced?—Yes.

1600. And you may employ someone to do that?—Yes, and it is the common practice to do that now. That section, I think, has no virtue from the certification point of view; it is simply a provision to enable the relieving officer to remain in his district. Formerly the relieving officer had to leave his district, and that was held to be undesirable, and so this provision was made.

1601. You have been dealing with the person of the lunatic up to this point—have you also some responsibility with regard to the property of the lunatic?—Yes, there are duties as regards property, and then there are duties as regards settlement and legal chargeability and such like matters.

1602. I do not think we need go into that at length, because we are really not concerned with it.—I was just putting that in to complete my statement. Again, if the patient is discharged from the asylum the relieving officer may be required to bring him home, or if during the period of his detention he is transferred from one institution to another, the relieving officer is the proper person to make that transfer.

1603. Your aid seems to be invoked whenever anything executive has to be done?—Yes.

1604. As regards the lunatic's property, which may have some bearing on our inquiry, I think under Section 132 you have certain powers and you may take possession of the property of the lunatic?—Yes, that is so.

1605. I suppose in such cases you would see to the application of the moneys of the person for his benefit?—No, we should only seize so much of the property as might be necessary to recoup the guardians for the cost of maintenance, or to meet expenses—we have no power with regard to the management of the estate of a lunatic—it is simply a power to recoup the rates the amount of the necessary expenditure.

1606. You do not administer the estate in any way? No, we have no power to do that.

1607. I see under Section 66 of the Act of 1890 where the visitors make an order for the removal of a pauper lunatic they may require the relieving officer to execute it?—Yes, that is so.

1608. Having given us this account of the existing law and procedure, we should be glad if you would draw our attention to any difficulties which you find in carrying out your work.—I should first like to call your attention to the ambiguity of the language of Section 20.

1609. That is with regard to the detention for three days?—Yes. That is the section which is now generally put into operation for removing a lunatic to the workhouse, and his detention. The Act provides that: "No person shall be so detained for more than three days, and before the expiration of that time, the constable, relieving officer, or overseer shall take such proceedings with regard to the alleged lunatic as are required by this Act." Now what is really meant by that section, and what will satisfy those words, "No person shall be so detained for more than three days"? Then the relieving officer, having put Section 20 into operation, is thrown back to Section 14, under which he is to give notice to the justice within three days. Now the justice is to appoint a time within three days from the time he receives the notice from the relieving officer.

1610. It comes to this, of course, that you cannot complete the proceedings which you take within the three days of detention?—Quite.

1611. But may I suggest that "No person shall be so detained for more than three days" means before the expiry of the three days you must set in motion the procedure?—If that satisfies the requirements of the Statute we should not feel a difficulty.

1612. You have a right of detention for three days. Within that period you will have set in motion a certain procedure contained in an earlier section. These proceedings would take more than three days, no doubt, and what authority have you for any detention after the three days have expired—do you get some further authority?—We only get further authority by resorting to Section 24.

1613. There the medical officer of the workhouse comes in?—Yes, we go to the medical officer of the workhouse and say, "We have not been able to deal with this case within three days. Will you therefore give a certificate under Sub-section (1) of Section 24?"—But there the practical difficulty is this, that the medical officer for the purposes of Sub-section (1) of Section 24 has got to say that the person is a proper person to be allowed to remain in the workhouse.

1614. And he has also to certify that he is a lunatic?—He has also to certify that he is a lunatic, and then he has to say that he is a proper person to be allowed to remain.

1615. Earl Russell: He has to say a lot of things which might not be true?—Yes.

1616. Chairman: And he has, as it were, to pre-judge the issue?—Quite. May I say at once that the general view of Section 20 in regard to certificates is that it gives a maximum of three days which you have to get the justice in, and that, of course, deprives the justice of the three days which Section 14 gives him. Section 14 says that the justice is to have three days in which to appoint a time.

1617. Earl Russell: What do you actually do in practice?—In practice we run round to the justice and beg him to come within the prescribed time; but here is the difficulty—the Act is based on the assumption that he can call in any medical man who can look at any patient whom he has never seen before and decide out of hand whether he is a lunatic or not; but experience has shown that considerable periods of observation are necessary, which Section 20 will not permit. Therefore we have to resort to Section 24, Sub-section (1).

1618. Chairman: We shall no doubt hear a great deal with regard to the desirability of having an intermediate stage in dealing with an insane or an alleged insane person before an absolute detention order is pronounced, whereby there may be a period of observation. I suppose some of your difficulty would be removed if there was a provision made for all cases to be detained for a time provisionally for observation?—Yes.

1619. Because, of course, if that provisional order ran for a month or three months or whatever period, during that time of investigation or observation the necessary steps could be taken and permanent orders obtained if necessary?—Yes.

1620. It does appear, however, that you are confronted with a very sudden determination under these sections—you must act very quickly in a matter of very grave importance.—Yes. In practice it resolves itself into this, that the three days limit imposed by Section 20 is often extended to something over 20 days or more. Under Sub-section (1) of Section 24 we get 14 days, and then at the end of that time the medical officer gives us notice under Sub-section (6) of Section 24, which sends us back once more to Section 14, Sub-section (2), under which we get three days to notify the justice. Then the justice gets three more days to come and see the patient; so that you get three days, plus 14 days, plus three days, plus three days.

MR. ERNEST JAMES LIDBETTER.

1621. Before you get a final formal order of detention?—Yes.

1622. But during all that accumulation of periods is the person in lawful detention?—Yes, that is, if that reading of the Act is correct. My personal view is it was never intended that Section 24 should be used to fortify Section 20—in other words, I think Section 24 is an entirely separate provision.

1623. It is obvious that there must be means of dealing immediately with emergency cases?—Quite.

1624. So that you must have very strong powers to enable you to deal with emergency cases, which powers may be quite inappropriate to cases which require more deliberate treatment?—Yes. You will notice, too, that the opening words of Section 24 deprive us of the common law power of detention in the workhouse. It is not only that no person shall be detained, but that no person shall be allowed to remain, so that we are deprived of the common law power.

1625. Even if a person wanted to remain in a workhouse you could not have them?—We could not have them.

1626. May I say you have done us a service in pointing out the anomalies of the position which will be a matter for us to consider?—The position of course is a very difficult one. There is one other point on Section 20 to which I should like to call your attention. The section may not be employed if, in the view of the master, he has not sufficient accommodation—no proper accommodation. It says: "The master of a workhouse shall unless there is no proper accommodation"—and the word "proper," I take it, means sufficient or appropriate, having regard to the condition of the patient.

1627. What difficulty do you find there in practice?—In practice we have no difficulty in the larger workhouses, especially in London, but difficulties have arisen in other parts of the country. For instance, there was one case at a place just outside London where the guardians passed a resolution that under no circumstances was the relieving officer to bring in a case under Section 20. Now that particular relieving officer had only a few days before had notice from the county asylum that there was no accommodation there, and he found, in other words, that both the workhouse and the asylum were closed against him.

1628. Earl Russell: But that general resolution closing the house was ultra vires, was it not?—Yes, it was, but the relieving officer is not in an independent position in these matters. Then there was another case, which I might mention while on the point. At one of the West of England ports it was not an unusual thing for a ship to call in with a lunatic on board. Then as soon as the lunatic is on shore the relieving officer has a duty to perform; and Section 20 is his only instrument, because the patient is not only dangerous but homeless too, and must therefore be lodged at the workhouse. In this case the master required the relieving officer to supply nurses to look after such patients.

1629. But surely in a small rural workhouse it might be reasonable for the master of such a workhouse to say: "I have no staff and I have no room to give accommodation to a dangerous lunatic in the workhouse"?—But however poor the workhouse may be, I submit it is much better than the man's home in those circumstances.

1630. Chairman: You mean that he must be disposed of somehow?—Yes. I am not thinking of the authority of the relieving officer or the duties of the master, or anything of that sort. What I am thinking of is the safety of the patient.

1631. Earl Russell: So am I, and of the other inmates of the workhouse. Unless the master has accommodation it might be dangerous to the other patients?—Yes; but a master is bound to have some staff there who would be available in a case of extreme emergency, whereas in a man's own house there would be no one. There is the position to be dealt with. Assuming that the master is entitled and justified in refusing to take in a case, it seems to me the Commission have something to consider. The relieving officer cannot carry the man round with him or stay and look after him, and something must be done for him.

1632. Will it be illegal to take him to another and larger workhouse if they were willing to receive him?—Yes. The relieving officer can only take him to the workhouse of the union in which he is; he has no jurisdiction outside his own union.

Sir Ernest Hiley: Could he not be transferred by agreement to another union?

Earl Russell: I think not under Section 20.

Chairman: Section 20 refers to urgent cases. Then Mr. Lidbetter says the man cannot be kept at home or he may not have a home, and also that there is no proper accommodation in the workhouse of the locality, and the relieving officer cannot be expected to take him to his own home, so that there is a deadlock there.

(Witness): Yes.

1633. (Earl Russell): Could you not get an immediate order under Section 20?—Yes, but the practical difficulty there is that there are no vacancies in the asylum.

1634. (Chairman): Does this difficulty arise in practice?—Really it does arise and did arise in the case I have spoken of.

1635. What was ultimately done with the unhappy patient then?—I do not know. The relieving officer made arrangements subsequently, I think, for the removal of cases direct to the asylum as far as possible. In this case I have been referring to the relieving officer wrote to us for advice and so we became cognisant of the facts, and we gave him some advice and since then we have heard nothing about it.

1636. You see you are recommending us to provide some remedy for a difficulty which you suggest exists under the Act, and one would like to know how it has been met in practice, and you say it has not been encountered by yourself?—We can inquire and communicate with the Secretary, if we may, and tell him what was done in the case.

1637. Certainly. One would like to know what was done because we want to know if it is a practical difficulty before applying our minds to its solution?—Quite. Whilst we are on the point of providing accommodation under Section 20, I might refer to Section 21 which seems to me to give a justice of the peace power to review the decision of the master in that respect. Supposing the master says he has no proper accommodation, then Section 21 provides the justice with power to go into the matter and decide the point.

1638. He is made the judge as to whether there is proper accommodation or not?—Yes.

1639. But supposing he and the workhouse authority are in agreement that there is no accommodation, what happens?—Then the relieving officer's only remedy is immediately to get a reception order and remove the patient to any place in the county where there is a vacancy, and it may result in the patient being taken hundreds of miles away to an asylum.

1640. But he cannot be taken to an asylum until a justice's order has been obtained?—Quite. This is only likely to happen in a rural area where the justices are fairly accessible, and it is possible that an order might be immediately made and the patient got off.

1641. Earl Russell: Still, the result would be that the patient would get a different kind of treatment merely because there was no accommodation?—Yes, and it is not fair to suggest his examination and certification has been properly conducted in those circumstances, but it is the only way the relieving officer has of meeting the emergency.

1642. Chairman: It would only be in acute cases that the difficulty would arise, would it not?—Yes.

1643. Because in other cases you could go through the procedure of getting a patient taken to the asylum.—Yes, it would be possible in those cases for a relieving officer to get a nurse to look after the patient—he is not barred from that.

MR. ERNEST JAMES LIDBETTER.

1644. While pointing out these difficulties in what one may call the legal code, I should like to know whether you think in practice, apart from the legal aspect of the matter, any people have suffered through the form of existing legislation?—Do you mean as to Section 20?

1645. On any section. Have you any practice which would tend to surmount the difficulties you have pointed out?—Yes, by evasions and so on we have always in the interests of the patients succeeded in getting round the difficulties.

1646. I want to know if you know of any patient who has suffered hardship because of those defects which you allege?—No, except possibly in a way we know nothing about, that is, in the improper discharge of a patient who ought to be certified. When you have exhausted your powers, you must let the patient go, and in that you have a real difficulty.

1647. But you have been able to surmount the legal or technical difficulties in the interests of patients in your own experience?—Quite.

1648. But you do not like to have to administer a code which requires you to do so?—That is so.

1649. You would like the code brought into consonance with the interests which you are enabled to serve by disregarding sometimes the strict letter of the law?—Quite; we should like to feel that we are doing what we are doing under proper authority, instead of under a system of evasion such as I have disclosed.

1650. Are there any other observations you wish to make?—With regard to Section 21, this section can only be put into operation after proceedings have been taken. If proceedings are commenced then only the justice can send the alleged lunatic to the workhouse. That is Section 21. We think Section 21 should be amended so that the relieving officer should be able to exercise these powers at any stage of the proceedings, and we think that is necessary in the interests of the patient.

1651. It may be suggested that once the matter is in the hands of the justices?—Yes, Section 21 gives the justices those powers.

1652. Your duty is to bring the matter to the cognisance of the justice?—Yes, but in the meantime if the patient gets suddenly bad, you cannot remove him until you have the authority of the justice, which may take some time. In London, for instance, where many of the justices live outside the county, at some distance, and often do not come to town during the week-end, and are away from Friday late in the day until Monday, you get that delay before you can see any justice at all.

1653. I thought Section 21 said “any justice”—cannot you call in another justice?—Yes, apparently you can. Supposing you have given one justice notice under Section 14, in case of emergency you can go to another justice, if you can get one.

1654. That involves some inquiry into the supply of justices, I am afraid.—Yes; I deal with that later on. The point is the whole process would be greatly facilitated if the relieving officer could remove his patient to the workhouse at any time.

1655. Is there anything else to which you wish to draw our attention?—Then on the question of classification, the Act makes provision for paupers and for non-paupers, but it makes no provision for the most numerous class of all, those who, not being paupers, must become so as soon as their liberty is curtailed. We have explored that and we have also explored the next point, that is, the absence of provisions in the Act of periods of observation. You see how we do it. The period of observation is secured by passing from one section of the Act to another.

1656. You mean you can accumulate a period of 23 days altogether by that process?—Yes, and even that may be extended where the patient will consent either by himself or by his friends to remain. The absence of provision for observation in the Act has led to a system of evasion more or less. I do not know whether you would like to hear more about that. For instance, at one place I know of where they have a lunatic and the justice is not satisfied that he ought to certify, they resort to the expedient of taking a reception order and suspending its operation under Section 21 and then allowing it to lapse if it is thought that the person should not be sent to an asylum.

1657. That is designed, of course, in the interests of the patient so that he shall not be subject to a permanent detention order when it does not prove necessary?—Yes.

1658. And all that might be obviated if provision were made for what I might call a transitional period?—Yes. On the statistical statement to which I think you referred a moment ago you will see that out of about 180 cases—because you must supplement the 133 total by a matter of 34 appearing lower down—only 51 were certified within the three days.

1659. With regard to the others, I see the cases are apparently kept under observation even up to the sixtieth day?—Yes.

1660. Is that the sixtieth day after they have reached the workhouse?—That is the sixtieth day after admission.

1661. But how can they be kept there so long?—May I call your attention to the note at the head: “These persons are not detained in the legal sense after the period authorised by law. They remain as patients for treatment or observation with their consent or that of their relatives.”

1662. For what period could you detain them whether they wished it or not?—That depends on the construction of Section 20; if Section 20 is to be strictly interpreted, three days is the maximum, but if the system of passing from one section to the other is adopted, 23 days.

1663. Sir Ernest Hiley: Does that include the 14 days mentioned in the third sub-section of Section 21?—That is after the reception order is made. I am speaking of the period without the reception order.

1664. Chairman: After the order is made that is an irrevocable step—that is the effective order?—Yes.

1665. But you are concerned if you can to avoid the making of an order?—But it is not detention or continuing to keep the patient in a strictly legal sense.

1666. But it is in the hope that you will not have to make the order at all?—Yes, and may I point out that the great majority of those who are kept over the three days get their discharge.

1667. There is an ambiguity in your headnote. It suggests that persons may be kept there with the consent of their relatives but not with their own consent?—The consent would be generally that of the head of the family; where the head of the family is in, his consent would be taken; if it was any other member of the family, his consent would be taken. After the period of detention legally authorised, if the patient said: “I insist on going out” he would go, and no one would be kept who demanded his discharge after the legal period expires—you may take that as an absolute rule.

1668. Of course we may have to consider the legalising of a system to which you apparently have been trying to approximate in practice?—Yes, which has resolved itself very largely into a system which has automatically grown up out of sheer necessity.

1669. Your table, which I think we will append* to your evidence, is interesting as showing that this period of observation up to 60 days after the first three days, which is the time when the acute cases are dealt with, is valuable. You have a certain number of cases after the three days, and one finds as time goes on you are able to discharge from the workhouse a considerable number of cases without any order being pronounced at all?—Yes, that is the case.

MR. ERNEST JAMES LIDBETTER.

1670. And these are persons who would never be characterised as lunatics at all—they have been simply in the workhouse for a period of observation and have been found to be uncertifiable and have been passed back into ordinary life?—Yes, and out of 62 dealt with in that way no less than 54 after the first three days.

1671. Showing the value of a prolonged period of observation?—Quite, and the value to the patient in particular.

1672. Of course, it is entirely for the patient, although at the same time it has the incidental benefit of not burdening the asylum with costs in the case of a patient who might recover very shortly and be discharged?—Yes.

1673. Should not one complete this matter by looking at the instances you have given us of recurrence?—Yes. I think the chief value of this table is to show that the examining officials, at any rate, are not prejudiced by the fact that there has been previous observation of the cases. Here is a man discharged on the second day, having been three times in the asylum. Then another is discharged on the second day, having been four times in the asylum, and here is one discharged on the ninth day, having been once before under observation and twice before in the asylum.

1674. Earl Russell: Are those drink cases?—No, they are general cases—there are very few drink cases in this list.

1675. Chairman: Does that mean that prima facie the case seemed to be one requiring to be dealt with, but under this observation it recovers, or is found not to be so serious as apprehended?—It is found not to be so serious as apprehended. There is this point which should be mentioned—these cases are generally brought in for observation, and, usually speaking, it is observation they receive, and not treatment. The workhouse wards are unsuitable for treatment, in my opinion, and you may take it that, while these cases are there for observation, they may get such treatment as the medical officer can afford, but it would not be comparable to what they would get in a proper institution. The probability is if these cases were treated at the first indication of insanity some of them might be found not to be insane cases at all.

1676. If you had observation coupled with treatment you mean you might further extend the usefulness of the section?—Yes, that is the point.

1677. You have shown us by your previous table that a considerable number of persons are discharged after the third day?—Yes.

1678. In virtue of what circumstances do the great majority of those kept for more than three days succeed in recovering their liberty—is it on the ground of improvement of health or on the ground that they are found not to be cases requiring treatment?—It is on the ground that the medical man has failed to find any condition to satisfy the requirements of Form 8. The medical man has to certify facts observed by himself and facts communicated by others. He can certify on the former alone, but not on the latter alone. He must himself observe facts to satisfy the requirements of the certificate. Now we may have a communication from some other person of a really serious kind against the patient which is not substantiated by observation, and prolonged observation and treatment fail to confirm. In that case, however bad the statement of the third person, it cannot be regarded as of any value for the purpose of certification.

1679. There are two ways of looking at the matter, one of prima facie investigation of the grounds, and, on the other hand, there is the point that the person who is admitted on all hands to be appropriate to be taken to the workhouse might in a short period improve. It might be a case where the malady was sharp and sudden, and equally quick in disappearing. Do you have cases for observation of that kind, that recover?—Yes; and there is no doubt that there is a certain percentage which ought not to be taken in at all.

1680. This is a precautionary step, and therefore you may well have a prima facie case which turns out not to be a real case at all on further investigation; but would not the chances of the patient be greatly improved if you had not only observation but also treatment?—Yes.

1681. Sir David Drummond: Within your knowledge in how many of these cases discharged after a few days has there been an error in diagnosis?—In some, but that, of course, depends on whether you dignify the opinion arrived at by the relieving officer by the word "diagnosis."

1682. But there is someone who makes a diagnosis? No, the relieving officer removes under Section 20 without any medical advice. The relieving officer is called in and on the statements of the relatives and on his own observation removes the case under Section 20.

1683. And it is not on a medical opinion?—Not on a medical opinion, and it has been held that a medical certificate given in those cases is only an opinion though signed as a medical certificate.

1684. Chairman: It is not a statutory certificate?—It is not a statutory certificate.

1685. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Of course, it is highly desirable that a relieving officer should have the discretion of putting a person in a place where he is safe, but does the man or woman then remain there for three days?—Yes.

1686. Is there any machinery by which a man can get out?—Within the three days?

1687. Yes?—Yes, directly a justice has intimated that he will make no order, the man is at liberty to go. The three days suggested by Section 20 does not mean that you must keep him three days. As soon as a justice says "I am satisfied, I shall make no order"—the man is given his liberty forthwith.

1688. Is that so in practice?—Yes.

1689. And does that often happen?—No, because if you look at my table you will see that there are only seven men and one woman who got their liberty within the three days.

1690. So that if a medical man in a workhouse saw a case was obviously fit to go out he has no power to order it?—He has no power to order it—the justice must come as well. It means of course that a justice is sometimes called unnecessarily, but once the relieving officer has put the section into operation and brought the man in, all the doctors will not grant a release—you must have a justice to do that. The relieving officer is compelled to act quite without advice.

1691. Chairman: No doubt the short period of three days is named for the reason that up to that time there is no medical intervention, but even a three days' detention may be serious?—I quite agree.

1692. The only protection there seems to be is that the relieving officer has a discretion to let the person go, if he thinks the case is one of mere frivolous complaint or a mere piece of spite?—That is so.

1693. Sir Humphry Rolleston: On the other hand, if it is a question of doubt the relieving officer is almost driven to send a man into the workhouse?—The relieving officer has on the one side the protection afforded by Section 330—there is suitable protection there. It has been held indeed that under Section 20 he need not exercise reasonable care, but, on the other hand, he has always the fear of the result of a Coroner's Inquest as a consequence of his refusing to act.

1694. Chairman: Of course you have to deal with certain conditions in this phase of human life—on the one hand you have to infringe liberty, and, on the other hand, you have to protect the individual against himself and the public; and you may find, if you do not err on the safe side, that the unhappy case you decide not to remove has committed suicide or homicide possibly that very night; so that you are in a responsible position under Section 20?—Quite, a responsibility which is fully appreciated by the relieving officer.

1695. Sir David Drummond: Which points to the desirability of having an expert who can be called in?—Yes.

1696. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Does the difficulty about detention for three days really exist, because as I look at Section 20 it does not say he shall be detained three days, but for not more than three days; and assuming the medical officer of the workhouse said to the master in 12 hours, "This man is perfectly sane," would the master commit any offence in letting him go?—Yes, he would. You see there, there is an overlapping between the master and the relieving officer.

1697. The Act does not say he shall detain the person; it says no person shall be detained for more than three days.—But Section 20 is to be put into operation by the relieving officer in any case in which he has a duty to perform.

1698. Earl Russell: What the section says is that he must not stay more than three days.—There is nothing by inference to suggest that the relieving officer can put Section 20 into operation and then not act under Section 14.

1699. I agree, but even while supporting your action under Section 14, it seems to me if the master chooses to discharge the man he has not committed any offence against the Act?—No, I do not think he has.

1700. So that in a case where he was satisfied the man might be injured by further detention, he might discharge him without breaking the law.—He might discharge him without breaking the law, but I do not think he would take the risk.

1701. That depends on the medical officer, does it not?—It does to an extent, but neither of them is in the position to discharge the patient.

1702. Sir Thomas Hutchison: Under Section 81 could not the matter go to the guardians?—No, because Section 81 in my view only applies to persons detained under Section 24.

1703. Chairman: It does not necessarily mean that, because it says a lunatic may be discharged by the guardians, but I understand a person once lodged is presumed to be a lunatic.—In Section 81 there are the words, "detained in the workhouse," and Section 81 enables the guardians to discharge a person detained in the workhouse. Now undoubtedly that must have reference to a person who has been regularly detained under Section 24, it does not mean any lunatic who is there in a sort of interregnum as in Section 20.

Earl Russell: I think that is arguable.

1704. Chairman: We do not mean to solve that at the moment; one is concerned now with the period of three days during which any person may be lodged in the workhouse, pending proceedings being taken and without apparently any skilled intervention on his behalf—I mean no doctor may see him. Now suppose this person is taken as a precautionary measure—because it may be a case which is very doubtful, and suppose he is removed by you rather than run the risk of his doing himself harm, during his three days' detention in the workhouse he seems to me to be rather outside the community of ordinary citizens and to have no rights at all. During the three days are not his civil rights more or less in suspension?—As I see it, what is in suspension is his liberty, but beyond that I am afraid we cannot go here, can we?

1705. No. It comes to this then, that the responsibility which is reposed in the relieving officer is in acting on matters coming to his knowledge—matters requiring him to act?—It is a very responsible position altogether. Nothing that is said here would tend to impress that fact on relieving officers more than they already appreciate it.

1706. It is only right I think to say that there has been no public complaint that I know of regarding this, and up to this stage of the proceedings I have not heard—I do not know whether others have heard —any complaint, so that it must be a testimonial to the efficiency of your service. However, the position is as you have disclosed it to us.—Yes, and I am obliged to you for the statement you have made with regard to there being no complaints.

1707. Of course, your proposals as to reform would obviate a good deal of the difficulties you have been pointing out, and if there is a period of observation under the provisional system, then the problem would disappear?—Yes.

1708. And you advocate, I understand, that a period of provisional observation is the real remedy?—We do. Will you go on now to the next point, Sir? I think the guardians' failure to provide proper accommodation we have already dealt with.

1709. Yes.—Then there is the difficulty we all have in the absence of sufficient accommodation in the public asylums, a position which I might say has become a very acute and very difficult one in London.

1710. That would be relieved, would it not, to some extent if the chronic cases could be taken from public asylums to workhouses?—Quite.

1711. If an arrangement were made, so to speak, for a consideration of cases from time to time as between the public asylum on the one hand and the workhouses on the other, the chronic cases, as to which there was no hope, might well be dealt with in the workhouses?—That is so, but we, as relieving officers, are not so much concerned with how the difficulty can be met as in showing how acute the difficulty is, and how harmful it is to patients and the difficulty it imposes on us as relieving officers. That is the side we are concerned with rather than the method of providing the accommodation.

1712. What do you do if you find that there is no public asylum available to which a patient may be sent?—The common practice is to keep the patient until there is accommodation, and that very often means that you first get your reception order and then hold the case over until you finally get a vacancy, which very often means that you keep it illegally, and ultimately you may have to get it re-certified because the certificate has lapsed by time.

1713. But there is a provision, is there not, under the Act for keeping certified mental cases permanently in workhouses?—Not after a reception order; the only power is in Section 24. Where a reception order is made under Section 13 or Section 16, a relieving officer has to remove the case forthwith, and then under Section 36 the lifetime of the order is limited in ordinary circumstances to seven days. Now it is not always possible, especially in London, to get a vacancy within the three days allowed by Section 20, and the only alternative therefore is to keep your patient on a reception order and ultimately get it re-certified, if necessary.

1714. What rather impressed me was your observation that this was illegal but you could detain under Section 24 such a person in the workhouse indefinitely?—No, because that would be inconsistent with the reception order.

1716. It is only a technical difficulty, is it not?—It is a mere technical difficulty from our point of view as relieving officers but not from the patient's point of view. The primary difficulty we have in London is that we cannot proceed as required by Statute. We have to go to the asylums committee and ask where the patient can be received. That must be done before the justice sees the case, because he must direct the order to a particular asylum. Now as the duty of adjudication is upon the justice, we cannot tell until he sees the alleged lunatic that a vacancy will be required, and, strictly, unless we know where the patient is going at that time, he cannot make his order. Now that is inconsistent with the Act, which presumes that a vacancy will always be available and leaves the justice to make his order on that assumption. We have to resort to various methods to avoid this difficulty; for instance, we may guess to what asylum the patient may be allocated. If it is a Jewish patient I should take the order on Colney Hatch; if the patient had been away before, on the same asylum as before—or the order must be drawn, contrary to Statute, without the name of the asylum being put in. If the vacancy duly comes along we can get the patient away, but if the vacancy is different from the asylum named in the order, a fresh certificate must be taken.

1717. Of course one serious difficulty may arise here because the asylum may have no accommodation?—That is so, and that leads to urgent difficulty sometimes. For instance, I remember a case not so long ago of a woman who was brought in suffering from depressional insanity, who had refused her food, who was under the impression that it was tampered with; the woman had been fasting some time before we received her and she continued to fast in the workhouse. Now we could not get a vacancy for her and we had to resort to forcible feeding. She resisted and a gradual decline set in. Then you get your vacancy when the patient's condition is greatly reduced, and upon that you remove the patient.

1718. Chairman: To the obvious prejudice of the health of the patient?—Yes, that is my point.

1719. On the other hand, you cannot create the accommodation if it is not there, and what do you suggest? Do you suggest any means of increasing the accommodation in the different asylums?—Yes. The Lunacy Act is passed on the assumption that there will be the accommodation. The justice is called in and he says "Where is the nearest asylum?" and directs his order. That is the assumption of the Lunacy Act.

1720. The accommodation, in short, has not kept pace with the growth of insanity, unfortunately?—The accommodation has not kept pace with the growth of insanity, and of course the effect of Section 207 was directed to the elimination of private accommodation; but in proportion as the private accommodation was reduced there should have been a corresponding increase in the public accommodation.

1721. We have heard from other witnesses about the shortage of accommodation and I see how it bears on your functions.—Then we have had complaints from various parts of the country of the difficulty of getting justices. They say that there are not sufficient justices, that the justices act reluctantly, and in some cases both methods hamper their movements, but we have not that difficulty to such an extent in London. In London our great difficulty is that we cannot get hold of justices at the week ends.

1722. Quite. It seems important from the duties which these justices have to discharge that they should be responsible people?—Yes. There are times when we feel the want of a justice.

1723. Earl Russell: I suppose there are times when the Stipendiary can act?—Yes, but it is undesirable to take people into Court to a Stipendiary.

1724. Of course, but at a real pinch you could do so?—Yes, we could at a real pinch, but I doubt whether you could get a Stipendiary to come and visit.

1725. Chairman: As a matter of fact a County Court Judge and a Police Court Magistrate in London can function as a judicial authority?—Yes.

1726. But you do not resort to that, do you?—No, we never do. In London, as a matter of fact, there is also a very high proportion of the justices who are also judicial authorities and we have no difficulty. Then, Sir, the main general recommendations we want to put before you are these: First, that there should be no difference in the process of certification between the pauper and the non-pauper. Secondly, except in very rare cases juveniles should not be certified as insane nor should cases of senile dementia. The provisions of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, Section 30, Sub-sections 1 and 2, should be amended to enable juvenile pauper cases to be dealt with under that Act.

1727. Earl Russell: What do you mean by juveniles—at what age?—Anyone below the age of 16 years. One may separate the two classes of cases. Taking the case of a juvenile, the Mental Deficiency Act, Section 30, provides that the local authorities shall have no responsibility under that Act in any case where the person can be dealt with under the Lunacy Act, and then it further proceeds to say they shall have no duty to perform with regard to any person who is chargeable to the Poor Law except in such cases where a certificate is given by the Board of Control with the sanction of the Ministry of Health. The effect of those provisions is that the guardians certify these young imbeciles and idiots under the Lunacy Act, and the relieving officers feel that is a duty they would rather not have to do, and it should be done under the Mental Deficiency Act.

1728. Chairman: Are these cases not really cases of dementia?—No; more cases of congenital idiots.

1729. Arrested development cases, I suppose?—Yes. It is much easier for the Board of Guardians to secure the certification of these cases under the Lunacy Act than it is to approach the Ministry and pass them through under the Mental Deficiency Act, and therefore the Lunacy Act is resorted to.

1730. Earl Russell: But surely the Mental Deficiency Act was one which provides a means as far as possible of alleviating these conditions?—Are you speaking from the patients' point of view?

1731. Yes.—I think the general impression one gets from the Mental Deficiency Act is that it deals more with a permanent class of case than with the lunatic, because in some cases the lunatic may recover.

1732. Chairman: Personally I have felt great difficulty in following the classification as between the two Acts. It seems to me that many persons might fall under both Acts, and they might be certifiable as lunatics, or equally they might be placed for proper treatment under the Mental Deficiency Act. Who is to determine whether a person is to be dealt with as a lunatic under one Act or is to be dealt with as a mental defective under the other Act? It is a problem of great difficulty?—It is a problem of great difficulty, and it might be got over by the proposal we suggest of a reception house for all cases.

1733. You mean the period of observation might be utilised; and, without any determining order, the case so watched might ultimately be certified or not; and also classified in regard to the kind of institution and category of mental defect?—Quite.

1734. All these things would be considered during the period of observation, with the result that you might very materially improve the system?—Quite.

1735. It would all be incidental to the period of observation?—Yes. You will notice that these lunacy cases are dealt with under Section 20 as they are brought to us voluntarily by the parents, and very often they go into the institutions for considerable periods before they are certified.

1736. Of course, in a workhouse there must be a number of people of more or less degenerate intellect?—Yes; they gravitate there.

1737. And the time at which they step from a state of sanity to insanity is indeterminate, I should think?—Yes.

As regards the senile cases mentioned, this proof was prepared before the Metropolitan Asylums Board had power to receive them without certificates, so that the problem does not arise now. It was necessary, before that arrangement was made, to certify these cases, and that was a duty which the relieving officers performed very reluctantly.

1738. These are voluntary cases you are speaking of?—No; they are cases where the condition is such that they are neither voluntary nor compulsory.

1739. They are not certified?—Not now, but when this evidence was being prepared they were certified—it is under an Order of the Ministry of Health. The Metropolitan Asylums Board may now receive these cases without certificate, but in the country outside London where the M.A.B. is not in operation such cases may arise.

21 October, 1924.]

MR. ERNEST JAMES LIDBETTER.

1740. Is there anything else you wish to say?—Then we respectfully submit that the Board of Control or some other authority or Commission should be endowed with powers to determine under proper safeguards ambiguities under the Statutes and points of law involved.

1741. I think you are there taking us a little beyond the scope of our inquiry?—Except that I have already called your attention to some of the ambiguities under the Lunacy Acts.

1742. But this is a question of how they are to be solved if the Statutes remain unaltered, and I do not think we need be detained over that?—Then comes the major proposal we have to make, that the workhouse should no longer be regarded as the place of safety for alleged lunatics; that asylum committees should be required to provide sufficient reception houses in all urban areas.

1743. This is for the person who is ultimately going to find his way to the asylum, and your suggestion is that the workhouse is not a suitable intermediate place for him to be housed?—Yes; but may I say we are more impressed by the possibilities of his case under a properly organised system than we are by the disadvantages of the workhouse. It is not a question of the place or the kind of institution so much as of organisation. What we want to see, in other words, is a wider system through which a patient will pass in all his stages, until he finally gets to the place for prolonged detention.

1744. He might from the reception house go either to the public asylum or to the workhouse?—Yes.

1745. There again this proposal of the reception house is connected with your proposal as to observation?—Yes.

1746. And you suggest that that should not be done in the workhouse?—Yes; because there is no Poor Law area at present which has a workhouse which would provide a sufficient number of cases to do it in the systematic way in which it should be done.

1747. All that of course would involve considerable expense?—It may, but it depends on the extent to which you are prepared to utilise existing organisations. For instance, there are two large institutions in East London at present unoccupied, and I am quite sure by a re-arrangement of patients in other parts you could get possession in London of four or five or six Poor Law institutions.

1748. The point is that such premises should be specially applicable for such purposes?—We want to specialise the justice, we want to specialise the doctors and the institution, not merely by the provision of special accommodation but by the building up, if possible, of a system of information. We think, for instance, if you could cross-index all the lunatics passing through the London asylums and all the alleged lunatics passing through our institutions you would have a great family history that would be enormously helpful in certifications. At present that is not possible, because the parochial boundaries intervene and make it impossible.

1749. Again that would be an improved system of records?—It would be an improved system of records, but then again there is this question—in a great number of workhouses at present where the patient is received, you have no resident medical officer; he is only a visiting officer. Then every justice can call in any doctor he pleases, who may never have seen a lunatic pauper before, and we conceive that medical service should be immediately and constantly available, and that there should be a specialised service in that respect.

1750. Of course, to some extent even in these matters, however anxious we may be to provide all that is best, we have to cut our coat to suit our cloth?—Let me be frank on this point. Some of our branches have said that they would not recommend these things on the ground of the expense involved.

1751. Quite, but we see the importance of your suggestions.—In the first place we say in a centre such as is suggested there would be a sufficient number of cases to justify and require a rota of justices visiting daily, holding a daily session for the disposal of cases. The effect of that would be that the preliminary period of detention at the relieving officer's instance need be only until the next meeting of the justices—probably twenty-four hours, except at weekends. The preliminary detention on the authority of the relieving officer would be until the next meeting of the justices only, and thereafter as the justices might direct. Such daily centres would be more formal and would conduct the investigations of cases in a more judicial atmosphere than is possible in the wards of the workhouse. The witnesses would appear in less casual conditions than is now possible, their evidence would be more strictly taken—on oath where necessary. There would be a resident medical officer for purposes of both treatment and observation. As time goes on these men would tend to become specialised in this class of work and better able to advise and decide than is at present the case. The justice of the peace would also tend to become specialised. For the purpose of these enquiries the reception houses would maintain a system of case papers with suitable index, and in the course of time family and personal history would be available in a way which is not possible at the present time. It should be possible to arrange a system of observation under detention for shorter and more graduated periods, possible without an actual certificate of insanity, until the patient is discharged or finally certified. During this period of probation a system of observation and classification would be going on, and the patient would finally pass out of the reception home to a place of more prolonged detention on the basis of this system, and would not be allocated to an institution as at present on the casual circumstance that a vacancy has occurred. The reception house should also serve the purposes of a clinic providing advice and treatment to out-patients in proper circumstances. On the recommendation for the discharge of a patient from an institution for lunatics, the staff of the reception homes should enquire and report as to the conditions into which it is proposed to release the patient, and on release make some provision for after care. The reasons for recommending such a system are that it would lead to a much more exact and satisfactory administration. It would be in the best interest of all suffering from mental disorders of any kind. It would do much to prevent the large number of recurrent allegations of insanity, by bringing under control and treatment at the first or second attack many persons who are at present under observation at intervals not always in the same area,—and often not certified, or, as often is the case, not until after many periods of arrest and preliminary detention. It would tend to reduce the number of suicides and other domestic tragedies that sometimes occur in these lucid intervals.

1752. I want to draw attention under Section 13, Sub-section (3), to a point which has been brought to my notice, which is rather important. You have told us about the case where one medical man of two called in by the justice might see his way to certify and the other one might not, and that the justice then might resort to calling in another medical man, and the question arose as to the position then. Apparently the justice who is dealing with the matter may make such other and further inquiry as he thinks necessary apart from the certificates of the medical practitioners, so that he may satisfy himself either upon the certificates of the medical men called in or upon such other and further inquiry?—Yes.

1753. So that he is not apparently tied down to the medical certificates as being the conclusive factor in making up his mind?—That turns, Sir, on the interpretation, does it not?

1754. Yes, it does, no doubt, but my attention was drawn to it. The justice need not proceed on the medical certificates, or a medical certificate only, but on further or other inquiry?—Yes, but the Act requires, for the purpose of this Section, that he must have two positive medical certificates.

21 October 1924.]

Mr. ERNEST JAMES LIDBETTER.

1755. Yes, I think he must have them before him.

1756. Earl Russell: In Sections 13 and 14 you have the words "person deemed to be a lunatic" which seems to convey some doubt. Do you satisfy yourself in that case?—No, the relieving officer does not. It is rather an elastic term.

1757. Have you affirmed or sworn information under Section 14?—No, it need not be in writing.

1758. Section 14, Sub-section (3) says that the justice shall require the relieving officer to bring the alleged lunatic before him, and in your evidence you said you brought the justice to the lunatic?—Yes.

1759. Which is the most common thing to do?—To bring the justice to the lunatic. But may I remind you that I said it was not an absolute rule. In the rural areas the outdoor practice is the common rule and Section 20 is not employed.

1760. Do you mean that the lunatic is brought before the justice?—Yes, it may be loosely done but it is done.

1761. And not the justice brought to the lunatic?—No. I think in the rural districts the lunatic is brought before the justice.

1762. You will find that out?—Yes. I shall be able to find that out.

1763. In Section 15 the words "wandering at large" I suppose would apply to a person who had a home and did not go there?—Yes, that is so.

1764. That is to say, you would apply it to anybody wandering at large in fact?—But I think it has been held that a person who is not under proper care and control is wandering at large—wandering aimlessly.

1765. Sir David Drummond: What assistance do you get, say, in the removal of a suicidal case or a very difficult case?—The relieving officer has powers to call to his aid anybody he thinks can help him, and each man is allocated to a district.

1766. You said that a relieving officer deals with a case on the three days system independent of the medical opinion?—Yes.

1767. Do you think that people all over this country or out of this country would not be under a panel doctor?—I have no knowledge of what happens abroad.

1768. My impression is that it is generally the panel doctor who receives the patient first?—You see it has been held that a medical certificate given, while a valuable expression of opinion is not in law a certificate.

1769. The point is that the doctor does not see the patient before removal to a workhouse?—That is so.

1770. And I think that obtains throughout the country?—The relieving officer is not entitled as a matter of right to a medical opinion first. The district medical officer is only employed by the guardians under contract for other purposes, and he is not available to help the relieving officer to make up his mind under the Lunacy Act.

1771. But he is a panel doctor probably?—Yes, but if the relieving officer took the panel doctor's certificate and acted on it, it would not relieve him of the consequences either way.

1772. Chairman: You have advocated the desirability of a system of observation in the shape of a reception-house, an intermediate position between the original detention of the patient and his ultimate reception. Have you any views as to the desirability of placing such reception-houses under the Board of Control or keeping them independent?—We have not gone into that matter at all. What we feel is that the system of control is not so large or so extended as it ought to be.

1773. Relieving officers do not seem to me to be brought into direct contact with the Board of Control?—No. The only way in which we are if our certificates are incorrect they are sent back.

1774. I mean you do not offer any views as to the efficiency of the Board of Control?—No. Of course, Sir, you will understand there is nothing in what we suggest which we expect will have the effect of reducing the number of certifiable persons—in fact it will be the other way.

1775. I desire to thank you on behalf of the Commission for the very clear evidence you have given us.

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Brigadier-General Sir JOHN BARNSLEY, D.L., V.D., J.P., called and examined.

1776. Chairman: Sir John, you are a Deputy-Lieutenant, a Justice of the Peace, and Deputy-Chairman of the Birmingham Justices?—Yes.

1777. I think you reside at Earlsfield, Westfield Road, Edgbaston, in the City of Birmingham?—Yes.

22 October, 1924.]

Brigadier-General Sir JOHN BARNESLEY, D.L., V.D., J.P.

1778. I think that your Justices, yourself and your colleagues, on observing the appointment of this Royal Commission, convened a meeting on the 24th July of the Judicial Authority and the Visitors under the Lunacy and Mental Deficiency Acts for your City?—Yes.

1779. You had a good attendance, I believe, and after consideration of the terms of reference of the Royal Commission, you and your colleagues decided to bring to the notice of the Commission a number of suggestions and recommendations which you thought might be useful to us?—Yes.

1780. Now perhaps before we address ourselves to those suggestions, Sir John, you might give us, from your large experience, some information as to the duties which the judicial authority performs in connection with the administration of the Lunacy Laws. We are very anxious to understand the practical work that is done by justices in this sphere of their activities; and it would certainly help us if you could give us some idea of the role that is played by the justices in this very important department of administration. Have you yourself personally acted as judicial authority?—Not as judicial authority.

1781. Then probably we shall hear from some other witness of the actual functions discharged?—My colleague, Mr. Lord, will deal with that aspect of it.

1782. But have you acted as a justice of the peace under the provisions of the statutes where a justice of the peace other than a judicial authority intervenes?—Yes.

1783. You have frequently done that, I suppose?—Yes.

1784. How are you, as a justice of the peace, first brought in contact with a case?—The Judicial Authority of Birmingham is composed of 28 selected members from our whole Bench of 150, having regard largely to their places of residence, so that the convenience of the City generally in the various districts may be met as far as possible, and that there shall be a member of the Judicial Authority living within each area, in order that when a case does arise, whether it comes from the relieving officer or whether it comes from private sources, the judicial authority for that particular neighbourhood should be available quite easily.

1785. Of course, the judicial authority being himself a justice of the peace can act in the other capacity of a justice of the peace, if necessary?—Yes.

1786. In your own experience, acting as a justice of the peace, how do cases actually come under your cognisance—how do they reach you?—As a member who is not a judicial authority, they are brought to me by the relieving officer of the guardians. It is pauper cases that we take very largely. We who do not act as a judicial authority; and they are brought to us by the relieving officer. We are asked sometimes to call, or at times the patients are brought to us at our houses or places of business, whichever is more convenient.

1787. Then the relieving officer probably rings you up on the telephone or makes an appointment, and arrives with the patient?—Yes, with the patient, with all the documents, and the doctor's report. Then, of course, under the statutes, we are obliged to see the patient.

1788. I was just coming to that. In the exercise of your jurisdiction you must actually see the patient?—Yes.

1789. Is the patient generally brought to you, or do you go to some place where the patient is?—He is generally brought to me.

1790. What do you do when a patient is brought before you?—We have the report of the doctor, which tells us any particular direction in which mental weakness has appeared, and then we ask questions of the patient. We ask him what his trouble is and go into all the details we can. Of course, we have a clue. Before we see the patient we have an idea as to what evidences of insanity he has evinced.

1791. You will have read the medical certificate by this time?—Yes, exactly.

1792. And I suppose that some of the cases that come before you are really cases of persons incapable of answering you rationally?—In some cases quite hopeless.

1793. But you do your best to elicit from them their trouble?—Yes.

1794. Do you find in some cases that they are able to talk to you about their difficulties?—Yes; and in some cases at intervals the patients are apparently quite rational, and then they go off at a tangent on their particular weakness.

1795. Do you think they realise that you are a judicial person investigating their case?—I should think it is very doubtful in many cases.

1796. Do you find difficulty in making up your mind in particular instances?—Not as a rule. Personally, I have never met a case where I have had any doubt, but at our meeting it was suggested by some of the justices, members of the Judicial Authority and others, that they had occasionally found difficulty in making up their minds. Of course, in the case of the pauper lunatics we can remand them if we wish; we can make a 14-day order and send them to the workhouse to be put under observation, but that cannot be done with private patients.

1797. But it occurs to one that in border-line cases you must find it difficult to determine from your interview with the patient whether the case is on one side or the other. Have you not experienced that difficulty?—Yes; but I think that the pauper cases do not show quite as many instances of that kind as the other type of cases—the private cases.

1798. You mean that a case is probably not brought before you by the relieving officer until the symptoms are pretty well manifest?—Yes.

1799. And in your own experience you have not had difficulty in making up your mind?—No, not very much. I have never had a case in which I have had to make a 14-day order and send the patient to the workhouse to be put under observation.

1800. Of course you realise that it is a very important and responsible duty that is confided to you?—Quite.

1801. On the one hand, you have the interest of the patient to consider, and, on the other hand, you have, of course, the protection of the public to consider?—Quite.

1802. Do you think the provision that you can send the patient on what you have described as a remand—a period of delay of 14 days—is a useful provision?—I do.

1803. I think you said that you had not yourself had occasion to resort to that expedient?—No, I have never had to do it.

1804. In this case, as we know, you proceed upon the certificate of a single medical practitioner?—In the pauper cases, yes.

1805. Is the medical practitioner present when you are interviewing the patient?—Not as a rule.

1806. Do you ever find occasion to send for him?—No, I think not; his report is generally very full.

1807. Do you think it would be desirable to have the single medical opinion which is before you fortified by a second certificate, as in the case of a private patient?—I do, yes.

1808. We have been rather struck in the course of our Inquiry with the difference in the procedure adopted in the two classes of cases, and have been rather at a loss to understand why the procedure should be different in the one case from the other, the topic of investigation being the same, namely, the state of mind of a particular citizen?—Yes.

1809. Two certificates are required in the case of an application relating to a private patient, but in that case there is no obligation to see the patient on the part of the person making the order?—That is so.

1810. But in your case it is one certificate and an obligatory interview?—Yes.

Brigadier-General Sir JOHN BARNESLEY, D.L., V.D., J.P.

1811. Would you regard it as satisfactory from your point of view that a second doctor should deal with the case?—I think it would be an advantage.

1812. Would it give you more confidence in exercising your jurisdiction?—Yes.

1813. In addition to this power to place the alleged lunatic in a workhouse for fourteen days for a period of observation, I think you have also power to direct the permanent detention of a lunatic in a workhouse under Section 24 of the Act of 1890?—Yes, I think we have.

1814. Section 24, you will remember, is the one which is expressed negatively—"no person shall be allowed to remain in a workhouse as a lunatic unless the medical officer of the workhouse certifies in writing" certain things; and then a certificate under that section is to be sufficient authority for detaining a lunatic for fourteen days; then "No lunatic shall be detained against his will or allowed to remain in a workhouse for more than fourteen days from the date of a certificate under this section without an order under the hand of a justice having jurisdiction in the place where the workhouse is situate." So that you have power to pronounce an order which will enable a lunatic to be detained in a workhouse on a permanent basis?—Yes.

1815. Have you had to exercise that power at all?—No, I have never done it.

1816. Of course, under Section 24 it is necessary to have two medical certificates in the case of a permanent detention order in a workhouse?—I have never had to do that.

1817. You have never personally had to deal with that?—No.

1818. In addition to the functions discharged by the justices of the peace at what I may call the initial stages, that is to say, the stage at which the desirability of detention is considered and orders are made, there are also provisions for the visitation of institutions by justices, are there not?—Yes, under the Mental Deficiency Act we have a body of visitors appointed.

1819. Yes; but we are rather concerned with the Lunacy Laws as distinct from the Mental Deficiency Act. Under Section 177 of the Lunacy Act of 1890 there is provision made, you will remember, for the justices annually appointing three or more justices and a medical practitioner to act as visitors of licensed houses?—Yes.

1820. Have you any licensed houses in Birmingham?—No, we have no licensed houses in our area at all.

1821. I think you have to appoint such visitors whether there is a licensed house within the area or not?—Yes.

1822. Do you make such appointments in Birmingham?—Yes, we appoint eight.

1823. Have you yourself been one of those visitors?—No, I have not been a visitor.

1824. Then may I take it that you have not had experience of visiting?—No, I have had no experience at all.

1825. Then in the matters which you desire to bring before us you are really voicing the general feeling of the justices rather than speaking from personal experience in certain of the matters?—Yes; I felt responsible for calling them together, and my evidence is really the opinion of the meeting.

1826. On some of the matters you have had personal experience, and on others you are voicing the feelings of those who have had the experience?—Yes.

1827. Now, in the first place, I think that you and your colleagues regard it as important that the justice or the judicial authority, as the case may be, before pronouncing any order or warrant for detention, should actually see the patient personally?—Yes, we feel that very strongly.

1828. There you are speaking from your personal experience, too?—Yes.

1829. Do you find that it is satisfactory both from the point of view of the justice who has this duty to perform and also from the point of view of the person who is about to be detained?—Yes.

1830. Is full opportunity given to the person who is brought before you by a relieving officer to say anything he or she may want to say?—Yes.

1831. And you therefore attach importance to this?—Yes.

1832. The next matter is one upon which we have heard something in this room: the desirability of what one may call a provisional detention; a period of detention during which the patient, before certification, is under observation?—Yes, in cases where there is any doubt.

1833. Yes. At present the only provision apparently for this transitional or provisional observation is a workhouse?—Exactly.

1834. Now have you any views as to the place where the patient should be under observation?—I think it should not be a workhouse and it should not be an asylum; it should be a separate institution of some kind; and preferably, I think we generally felt, it should not only be used for this purpose, but that there should be some sort of institution at which there should be treatment for people before it comes to a question of certification—a sort of mental hospital.

1835. A clinic?—Yes, a clinic that should be available for anybody who required treatment.

1836. Then you contemplate a reception house to which persons might be sent for a period of observation and treatment?—Exactly.

1837. The result of which might be that the treatment might effect a cure, in which case no order would be pronounced?—Exactly.

1838. On the other hand, the symptoms could be studied there and further information obtained for the judicial authority or justice of the peace to proceed upon?—Yes.

1839. Earl Russell: Or to which they might resort voluntarily?—Yes; that is a very important point; we wanted rather to emphasise that.

1840. Chairman: That would involve the provision of separate premises?—I think it would, and I think the local authority would have to do it, because this is not a thing that we could put on the same basis as a voluntary hospital.

1841. It would be a place to which you would have a right to send persons of any social position, whether they could pay or not pay?—Exactly.

1842. Of course, that would involve additional expenditure, obviously.—Yes.

1843. Do you think that the expenditure might be remunerative in this way, that it might obviate the necessity to send a number of cases on to asylums?—I think it would, in all probability; and I think charges might be made for treatment by people who could afford to pay for it. There are lots of patients who could afford to pay for a fortnight or three weeks' treatment.

1844. And what they paid might, on the principle we are familiar with in asylum administration, be made available towards making up the loss on the other cases?—Yes.

1845. At present there is no power to provide such places?—No, none.

1846. Would it be for yourselves as justices a comfort to feel that in cases upon which it was difficult to come to a conclusive judgment, there was this opportunity for experiment or trial?—It would, very distinctly.

1847. At the moment there is statutory power for allowing patients out on trial after they have been in an asylum, as we know?—Yes.

1848. Do you favour the view that there should be also a period of trial or experiment before certification?—Yes.

1849. Would you contemplate that all the cases would go there, or only those as to which there was some doubt?—I think only those about which there was doubt.

1850. Would you leave it discretionary to the justice to direct the patient to be sent to such a place or not?—I would leave it to his discretion. I quote in my précis one particular instance, you will notice, in which a very serious thing happened through the present procedure.

1851. I was struck with that. I wish you would give us that instance, because it is very striking. That was a case, I think, in which a justice who had difficulty with regard to a case thought he ought not to sign?—Yes, and did not sign.

1852. What was the consequence?—The consequence was that within 48 hours the patient had killed his wife and two children.

1853. Sir David Drummond: Was there a doctor's certificate in that case?—Yes, certainly.

1854. That is to say, the magistrate and the doctor differed?—Yes.

1855. Chairman: The magistrate had interviewed the patient, with the medical certificate stating that the man ought to be detained, and, after the interview, thought the case was not made out, so to speak?—Yes. May I hand you particulars of that case? I do not want to mention the name of the justice, but if you knew what it was and why it was, you would see at once that it was rather important.

1856. You can hand it in afterwards. I am rather anxious to have this case brought out, for this reason; it seems to me to illustrate very painfully the difficulty which a justice has; on the one hand, he is the representative of the law who is bound to protect the liberty of the subject; on the other hand, if favouring the liberty of the subject, shall we say, he does not pronounce an order in a particular case, then he has to take the risk of allowing such a person to be at large, the consequences of which may be very serious?—Yes.

1857. Therefore, one can see how onerous is the responsibility on the justice?—Yes.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Would you, if you think fit, ask Sir John whether a distinction ought not to be drawn between the outdoor clinics, which it is proposed should be held for people who are in an early stage of mental instability, and those cases which are sufficiently marked to draw the attention of the relieving officer to them? It seems to me that the two conditions are rather different. If a person is sufficiently deranged to draw the attention of the relieving officer to him and is brought with a medical certificate to a justice, those are cases which may very likely require to be put under control in these reception homes; and a distinction ought to be drawn between an outdoor clinic and a reception house, in the case in which probably some detention corresponding to the fourteen days' remand in the workhouse infirmary would become necessary.

1858. Chairman (to the Witness): You follow what Sir Humphry has said?—Yes.

1859. Of course, people who were attending a clinic for the purpose of getting assistance and advice there, are in rather a different position from those whose condition is so manifest that the relieving officer has had to bring them before the justice. That is Sir Humphry's point?—Yes.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: We are only dealing with the latter class for the moment.

1860. Chairman: Yes. (To the Witness): You say that in your own large experience you have never had a case which gave you any difficulty?—That is so.

1861. Would your experience lead you to this, that in the cases brought before you by the relieving officer the insanity was so obvious that the period of observation would be superfluous?—Well, I think the fact that it was brought to our notice at the meeting we held by several justices rather proved probably that my experience was not the experience of others—that they had had doubtful cases; and what we want to do is to obviate the possibility of a single case not being properly dealt with.

1862. Earl Russell: You have been fortunate in not having doubtful cases?—Yes.

1863. Chairman: The experience probably of your colleagues would have embraced cases of private patients where you say there may be less obvious evidences of insanity?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: In evidence yesterday we heard of some eight patients admitted to the workhouse and discharged in three days.

1864. Chairman: Yes. Just following up that point, there might be cases brought before you by the relieving officer in which at the moment the symptoms were very marked, obviously justifying immediate detention?—Yes.

1865. But that case might be one of merely transitory insanity and the recovery might take place in a few days, even although at the moment the mental disturbance was obvious; but possibly detention for a short time in such a clinic as you figure might produce a complete cure, so that there would be no necessity at all for certification?—Yes.

1866. That is another advantage that the observation house might afford, not merely to deal with border-line cases where the justice was in doubt, but where a case was one of insanity of probably short duration?—Yes.

1867. Merely some upsetting of the balance for the time being?—Yes. I am quite free to say this: that this matter was really specially urged by one of the justices who himself, in his own family, had had a case in which he thought it would have been a great advantage if a clinic of this kind had been in existence; he spoke from personal experience.

1868. Of course, it does seem desirable that if there is to be such an institution it should not be either the workhouse or the asylum because of the association of such places?—Exactly.

1869. Persons, I suppose, who are mentally upset or deranged may be very sensitive to the associations of the place to which they are conveyed?—Yes.

1870. You would contemplate, would you not, that such persons under observation must be under some order of detention?—Yes, I think so.

1871. Otherwise, the purpose which you have just explained would not be served—the protection of the public. In the tragic case to which you have alluded the patient was simply discharged to the public, whereas under such a régime as you contemplate that person, although possibly ultimately found to be on the right side of the border-line, would be compulsorily detained, but for a limited period?—Yes.

1872. At the end of the period of observation would you recommend that the patient be brought back before the justice who had originally pronounced the temporary order?—Yes.

1873. Suppose during the period of observation the patient recovers in the opinion of the medical officer in charge of this reception house or place of observation, would you suggest that the patient be brought at once before the justice?—During the period, certainly, yes.

1874. Obviously it would not do to enforce an order for detention for a month in the case of a patient who after two or three days made a complete recovery; such a person would be set free at once?—Yes.

1875. Then you would contemplate that the patient would be under observation during the limited period, but if during that period the medical officer in charge was satisfied that recovery had been effected, he would come to the justice of the peace with his patient and obtain an order of discharge?—Yes.

1876. Then as to the voluntary aspect to which you alluded a moment ago, do you think that this place might serve also the purpose of a place for giving advice and assistance to what we may call outdoor cases?—Yes.

1877. A person might be brought there by a relative and get good advice?—Yes.

1878. Would you contemplate that persons might also enter this institution voluntarily for a period?—For treatment, yes.

1879. Without any detention order?—Yes.

22 October, 1924.]

Brigadier-General Sir JOHN BARNESLEY, D.L., V.D., J.P.

1880. Of course, if these voluntary cases were cases where there might be dangerous tendencies, you would almost be bound to have some form of compulsory detention, would you not?—Yes; of course, if there were dangerous tendencies, they might have been manifest before they went in, and such patients would have to be treated as compulsory cases.

1881. Yes, that is clear. The third topic to which you refer, I see, is the question of visitation of persons who are detained. Would you be good enough to give us your views on that—the views of yourself and of your colleagues?—With regard to the annual visitation, we rather felt, though we realised that it was a very big undertaking, that something was wanted in the nature of what exists under the Mental Deficiency Act: that all persons should be visited, first of all, after one year, then after the second year, and subsequently every five years; that is what we do in the case of mental deficiency cases. We felt that it would be a great advantage if the inmates of ordinary asylums were visited in the same way, because we so arrange our rota of visitation for our mental deficiency cases that one magistrate sees the same patients each year, and he can therefore tell the progress that is being made. I have got an interesting report here which was presented at our Quarterly Meeting of the Justices last week, the year's report of the visitations under the Mental Deficiency Act; that embodies about 713 cases. (Handing in a document.) If we did the same kind of work with the ordinary asylums, it would mean in Birmingham we should have about 2,000 cases. It would be a big job, but we do feel the importance of it; we should have to enlarge our Judicial Authority and increase the number of visitors to enable us to cope with the work; but I think we should be willing to undertake it.

1882. Of course, you are aware of the existing law with regard to the visits paid by the Commissioners and the visiting committees and the guardians of the poor?—But the guardians of the poor, as I understand, do not examine patients so much as look after the administration of these places.

1883. Probably the emphasis is rather on that aspect of it, but they do go to the places where their paupers are being detained and satisfy themselves that the conditions are satisfactory, and so on?—Yes.

1884. But the visitation you contemplate is an individual visitation of each case?—Yes, that each patient should be seen by somebody once a year.

1885. And that person a justice of the peace?—And that person a justice of the peace.

1886. Do you think that justices of the peace would be able to undertake and overtake that duty?—I think so. We should have to enlarge the number of our visitors; we can make it as large as we like.

1887. Do you find any reluctance on the part of the justices of the peace to undertake this duty?—No; it is done quite cheerfully.

1888. Of course, there would necessarily be many cases in which the visit would really be more or less a formality, would it not? I am taking the case of a chronic pauper lunatic?—Yes, quite. There are lots of cases where the thing is obvious on the face of it, and you need waste no time over it.

1889. You seem rather to contemplate the allocation of so many patients possibly by name to particular justices, so that the same justice would see the same people at recurrent intervals?—Yes, under that Mental Deficiency scheme we keep a very close record of every case; they mostly come under the Stipendiary, because he happens to be at the Victoria Courts all the time; most of those sort of cases come before him, and we keep a very accurate record of cases; they are traced from year to year by the visitors, and the same people see the same cases by arrangement of the rota, and they are quite able to follow the rota.

1890. There would need, of course, to be some elasticity about that, because you could not get the same justice year after year and so on; but what do you consider would be the value of that visit—what purpose would it serve?—Obviously, that nobody was detained in a place of detention who ought not to be there.

1891. Then it would be in order to ascertain whether a person was or was not being properly detained?—Yes.

1892. But you would also consider that it should have regard to the care the patient was receiving?—Yes.

1893. That an opportunity should be afforded of making complaints about the conditions under which the patient was living or the treatment, or possibly the ill-treatment, the patient was undergoing?—Yes.

1894. Now, on the question of detention, that involves, of course, consideration of the medical aspect of the case, does it not?—Yes.

1895. When you first consider the case brought before you, you have the advantage of the doctor's certificate to aid your mind?—Yes.

1896. On the occasion of a visit of this sort by a justice to the patient, suppose the patient complains, "I am being unlawfully detained here; I am quite sane," and discusses his case with you in an apparently rational fashion, do you think the visitor could really make up his mind whether the case was one of improper detention or not, without medical assistance?—I think so; I think I could; personally I have been over a good many lunatic asylums, and I have no great difficulty in picking out such cases. Where the visitor found a doubtful case, he could order another medical examination; of course there is a medical officer at the institution itself.

1897. Yes, but I want to follow this a little closely, because I see its implications. The visit is for the purpose of interviewing the patient, who, presumably, thinks that he is being unlawfully detained. I have some difficulty in seeing how the visitor could decide, unaided, that the case was one that ought to be liberated, because the layman, without medical assistance, might not be able to detect the pathological condition of the patient. I think you will agree with that?—Yes, I quite see that.

1898. You do not suggest, do you, that the visitor should have the power to do anything more than to report?—Quite.

1899. That is a different thing. The visitor, applying his knowledge as a man of the world and experience, would report to whom?—I should think he would report to the Commissioners.

1900. That he had visited the case and, in his opinion, for what it was worth as a layman's opinion, the case appeared to be one where the patient might be safely discharged?—Yes.

1901. But you would not contemplate such a person being discharged directly by that visitor?—No.

1902. That, of course, would afford a safeguard, but it would be of great value, would it, from this point of view, that it would be an independent person interested in the case who had formed an instructed layman's view upon the case and thought fit to draw the attention of the appropriate authority to it, who would then, with medical assistance, investigate it?—Yes.

1903. And, just to complete the picture, you would contemplate that you would then get a report from the Commissioners disposing of your suggestions?—Yes.

1904. That is to say, either accepting your view, or giving reasons why your view could not be given effect to?—Yes.

1905. Do you think that by this means the aspirations of certain sections of the public for some form of independent inquiry might be satisfied?—I do.

1906. Of course, one has to recognise that the justices of the peace are a very large body of men?—Yes.

1907. And I suppose, like large bodies of men everywhere, they include people of varying competence and varying wisdom?—Yes.

22 October, 1924.]

Brigadier-General Sir JOHN BARNESLEY, D.L., V.D., J.P.

1908. Would you contemplate that these special visitors would be selected from among your justices?—Oh, yes; we do carefully select the judicial authority and also the visitors under the Mental Deficiency Act.

1909. And they might, in course of time, acquire a considerable amount of experience?—Yes.

1910. At what intervals would you suggest that such visits might be made?—I should follow the procedure that we now have under the Mental Deficiency Act—once a year; after 12 months; then after another 12 months; then subsequently, where a case looks like being chronic, every five years.

1911. Putting it broadly, your suggestion is that the scheme of the Mental Deficiency Act might well be applied to Lunacy administration in the matter of visitation?—Yes, quite.

1912. I notice that you use the services of the Stipendiary Magistrate in Birmingham.—Yes, for certain cases; for the Mental Deficiency cases chiefly; he is always there, that is the reason; he is there every day, and he hears them in his private room.

1913. But you do not use his services in the case of the certification of lunatics?—No, not very much.

1914. You do occasionally, do you?—I should think not, because he does not live in the area, and frequently they have to be dealt with on the spot quickly; he lives a considerable distance away from Birmingham; he only comes in the morning, and goes away in the afternoon.

1915. Now, I think you have just two general observations with which to favour us. First, regarding the place where the pauper cases are seen, some question has been raised as to their being interviewed by the justice in the police premises. Is that the case at Birmingham?—Sometimes we see them in a private room at the Victoria Courts; never in the Police Court itself.

1916. Where are most of the cases seen?—I think most of them are brought to us by the relieving officer, to our private residences; mine are chiefly, either to my private residence or to my place of business; they are frequently brought to my place of business.

1917. I should have thought that must be rather a painful aspect of your duty, to have persons suffering in this way brought to your private house?—It is, but it does not very often happen; I mean, I do not get more than one case a month, or something of that sort, brought to me.

1918. Would these cases, in the event of a reception house or observation place being established, not be more appropriately taken there?—Yes, I think they might be.

1919. And would you not have a rota of justices to attend there, who would deal with the cases at what we could call a hospital as distinguished from an asylum or workhouse?—Yes.

1920. Would not that have the advantage of the place being known; some central place known to the relieving officer and to the public as the place where mental cases were dealt with?—Yes.

1921. It does seem rather an objectionable feature that a relieving officer should have to bring patients to private residences, possibly cases of a distressing character, or to business premises?—Yes.

1921a. But, under the present practice, patients must be taken either to the private residence or the business premises of the justice?—Yes, or the justice must go to his house.

1922. Or, in some instances, as you have said, the justice's room; I suppose it would be at the Victoria Courts?—Yes.

1923. It occurs to one that this reception house might be made a place where the justice saw the patient under the best circumstances?—Yes.

1924. That is another use to which these premises might be put, is it not?—Yes.

1925. Then I think your other observation is one that we have anticipated, that you have very little experience in Birmingham of the fourteen day order?—Yes, very little.

1926. Earl Russell: On the last point about the place where the patient is seen, we had evidence from a relieving officer yesterday which related to Bethnal Green, and he told us that there his practice was to take these patients at once on his own responsibility to the workhouse which, as you know, he may do, for three days, and that the justice then generally saw them at the workhouse. That would obviate the inconvenience of taking them to a private house or a place of business?—It would, but that is not done with us; our relieving officer does not do that as a rule.

1927. Is the reason for that that you desire to avoid bringing the workhouse into it, if possible?—Yes, I think so. Of course, if a case is violent and dangerous, it has to be treated in that way, because they cannot get them about very well.

1928. But it is a method by which they can be detained in a safe place for a day or two, until a justice can be brought to see them?—Yes.

1929. But in Birmingham you do not use either that method, or the fourteen day order?—No, very little.

1930. You said something just now on this question of visiting the patients that rather startled me. I do not know whether you wish it to go on the note as your considered opinion, but I understand you to say that, having visited an asylum and having had a conversation with the patient there, you could make up your mind as to whether the patient was sane and fit to be discharged?—Not fit to be discharged; only fit to be reported upon.

1931. But to be reported upon in the sense of reporting that in your opinion he was a safe and proper subject for discharge?—Yes.

1932. Do you really wish to tell us that you could make up your own mind on that, without any medical assistance?—I think I could make it up sufficiently to say that it was a case which ought to be investigated.

1933. And without looking at the case books or asking the asylum doctor?—But you would have all the case books before you; you would have the whole of the patient's record.

1934. You did not say that. You would of course have gone into the record and you would have spoken to the superintendent or medical officer of the asylum?—Yes.

1935. So that you have that much assistance before you come to your conclusion?—Quite.

1936. Then, on the question of extra visits, I want to call your attention again to the number of visits that are made already. You know that the friends and relatives of the patient can visit him?—Yes.

1937. You know what the provisions are as to the visiting committee. Section 188: "At least two members of the visiting committee shall together, once at least in every two months" (that is six times a year) "inspect every part of the asylum, and see every patient therein, so as to give everyone, as far as possible, full opportunity of complaint"?—Yes.

1938. Then, in addition to that, I think I am right in saying that the Lunacy Commissioners visit at least once a year and see every patient?—Yes.

1939. In view of that number of visits and by those public people, do you really think that these extra visits by the justices would serve any useful purpose?—I think they would be very useful.

1940. As an additional safeguard?—Yes; it is only once a year.

1941. Was that the general opinion of your meeting?—That was the opinion of the meeting, yes.

1942. Then I want to go back to the question you were first asked about—certification. You said that in your opinion the certificate of a second doctor would always be desirable?—Yes.

1943. Can you tell us, roughly, what is the cost of certifying a pauper lunatic?—No, I am afraid I cannot.

1944. Of course, a second doctor would cost more, would it not?—Of course it would.

22 October, 1924.]

Brigadier-General Sir JOHN BARNESLEY, D.L., V.D., J.P.

1945. And in all the cases that have come before you, you have had no difficulty in making up your mind on seeing the patient and on the opinion of one doctor?—No.

1946. Having regard to the fact that this cost has to come out of the rates, do you think that in actual practice any real additional safeguard would be obtained by having a second doctor?—It would be an additional safeguard, undoubtedly.

1947. But how many cases have there been in which you or your colleagues have had so much doubt that you have remanded the case for fourteen days' observation—very few, I understand?—Very few.

1948. Where you have remanded for observation you can then, if you think fit, order a second doctor's report to be obtained?—Yes.

1949. In view of all that, do you really think it necessary in the cases where there is no doubt, which, I gather are the largest number, to incur the expense of a second doctor's certificate?—No, I should think perhaps not.

1950. Because we must have regard, of course, to the expense?—Of course you must.

1951. You are acquainted no doubt with the Mental Treatment Bill which Lord Onslow introduced and which dealt with the subject of voluntary boarders?—Yes.

1952. You may know that I introduced a similar Bill about 10 years ago?—Yes.

1953. And I think I am right in saying that it passed the House of Lords twice, but it got no further. That provided what you were suggesting this clinic should do: give an opportunity to a person to enter an institution of this sort, in the hope that certification might not become necessary, and to avoid the penalties which a doctor or anybody else would now concur, who kept a certifiable lunatic for profit without having him certified. Your view is that an institution of that sort would go a long way to deal with cases that would actually have in the end to be certified?—Yes.

1954. And in the case of short, violent insanity, say alcoholic insanity, the patient might probably recover without ever having to be certified at all?—Yes.

1955. Were all your colleagues also of opinion that this would serve a useful purpose?—Yes.

1956. And in the same establishment you would have some persons under restraint under a justice's order for observation when necessary?—Yes.

1957. And if you had such an institution, I suppose you would exercise much more freely your power of remanding a case where you felt the slightest doubt?—Yes, I think so.

1958. You do not yourself apprehend what it is known the public rather apprehends, namely, that this would be an undue infringement of their liberty—the voluntary boarder, I mean?—No, I do not think so.

1959. You are aware, no doubt, that there is a feeling that this Mental Treatment Bill is a fresh infringement of the public liberty?—Yes.

1960. But you regard it really as being entirely in the interest of the patient himself?—Quite.

1961. Mrs. Mathew: I was rather anxious to know about this further enquiry. If in the discretion of the justice he thought a case ought to be looked at again by a doctor, would he refer it to the same doctor who had perhaps certified him?—No; I think it should be another doctor, the second time.

1962. Do the visitors see all the patients privately?—You mean the visitors under the Mental Deficiency Act?

1963. Yes?—I do not quite know. I am not a visitor myself; but I imagine they do; I mean they have the same opportunities as when you visit a prisoner; every prisoner has the opportunity of seeing a visiting justice privately if he wishes, and surely the patients must have the same opportunities as prisoners have.

1964. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to the question of two medical certificates: suppose that they do not agree, what action would you take?—Well, I do not know; the justice would have to get a third certificate, I think.

1965. What is the practice in Birmingham? That is not in your own experience, because you say you have not much to do with private patients. What would happen supposing two certificates did not agree; is the case discharged?—I certainly think the justice would not make an order. My colleague, Mr. Lord, may know more about it, because he has had cases of that kind.

1966. There is one matter I should like to return to. You thought it might be advantageous to combine the reception house, where people would either be sent by you for observation for a period of fourteen days, or where they would go in voluntarily for residence, giving up their liberty for a time, on the one hand with the outdoor clinic on the other, which I should have thought would have been very much better separated from it and attached to a general hospital; so that people who felt that they were becoming unsettled in their mind could go to a general hospital, and would not attract the same attention as they would if they were seen going to a place where it was known that people of the other type were being taken. Why do you think it would be advantageous to combine them?—I rather think that it points in the direction of the establishment of a mental hospital. I do not think we could undertake either with the Queen's or the General in Birmingham to deal to any large extent with mental cases.

1967. They do not have an out-patient department?—We have an out-patient department, but if a person is suspected of being insane, he is not dealt with there.

1968. These are people who suspect themselves of being insane, feel that they are not all right; and there are a certain number of hospitals, like St. Thomas's, where persons would go very much more readily than they would to a place where they knew other people had been taken, would they not?—They might.

1969. Sir David Drummond: You have no licensed houses in Birmingham, have you?—No, none.

1970. What provision have you for private patients—acute cases?—We have two very large asylums.

1971. Private asylums?—No; public asylums.

1972. That is to say, your private patient is brought to the public asylum?—Yes; there is no alternative; we have no private asylums in the city.

1973. Does the relieving officer never bring a patient to you without a medical certificate?—No; he always has the report with him.

1974. The doctor has always seen the patient before you see him?—Yes.

1975. Sir Ernest Hiley: Could you tell me how many cases are certified by the justices in a year?—No; I cannot tell you the exact number; but we have about 2,000 lunatics.

1976. Every year? Have you any idea—does it run into hundreds?—Yes, I should think so; I cannot give you any idea really.

1977. Could you tell me this then: what proportion would you say of the cases are such that you would send to this reception home for further observation?—I could not say.

1978. Have you formed any idea, or have the Birmingham Justices formed any idea as to the size of this suggested institution?—No, I do not think we have.

1979. Then just one other question. Have you in your own experience, or have you heard from any of the justices, of a case where they have had to send for a third doctor on account of a disagreement of the two?—No, I have never had a case.

1980. Sir David Drummond: May I ask if there is special accommodation for private patients in the public asylums, or are the patients treated just on the lines of the paupers?—There are private rooms, and that kind of thing.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL SIR JOHN BARNSELEY, D.L., V.D., J.P.

1981. Special arrangements?—Yes.

1982. Chairman: I was just going to bring that point out. You have in your jurisdiction two public asylums?—Yes.

1983. And in those public asylums you have accommodation for private paying patients?—Yes; they do pay.

1984. Can you tell me this? Is the accommodation in those asylums over-taxed at present?—Yes, very much; we are overflowing to the adjoining county.

1985. Where you have to pronounce an order, the order must designate the institution to which the patient is to be sent?—Yes.

1986. Do you find any embarrassment arising from the fact that the asylums are overcrowded, or, at any rate, that their capacity is fully taxed, in designating the place to which the patient is to be sent?—No; it is generally ascertained before they come to us where they can be taken in.

1987. Does the relieving officer inform himself of that?—Yes.

1988. But what happens, suppose both the public asylums in your area are full?—Well, we have three, as a matter of fact; we have one in the City at Winson Green, where all urgent cases go to at once; then we have two in the country—Rubery and Hollymoor. When those three institutions are full, which happens to be the case at the present time, I think, as a matter of fact, we have an arrangement with the Worcester County Council, and the cases are treated at the Barnsley Hall Asylum, which is a county asylum, on payment, of course, from the Birmingham authority.

1989. Then the Birmingham authority has a contract with the County authority for the reception of Birmingham cases?—Yes. I do not know the details of it, but I know it exists.

1990. So that you have not had a case before you for which you could designate no asylum?—No, never.

1991. You spoke of the medical certificate being brought to you by the relieving officer along with the case?—Yes.

1992. I was rather struck with the language of Section 16 of the Act, which seems to contemplate that the justice should himself call in a medical practitioner. May I just remind you of the language of that section? "The justice before whom a pauper alleged to be a lunatic or an alleged lunatic wandering at large"—it is that case—"is brought under this Act shall call in a medical practitioner, and shall examine the alleged lunatic." Have you ever had occasion yourself to call in a medical practitioner or have you always proceeded upon the certificate already furnished?—I have always proceeded upon the certificate already furnished.

1993. In the case of reception orders applicable to private patients, I notice that in the proceedings the alleged lunatic is, of course, a person who may be present, and also any one person appointed by the alleged lunatic for that purpose, that is to say, a friend or a relative may be asked by the lunatic to be present during the proceedings. There is no comparable provision, is there, in the case of the pauper patient, whereby he might have with him some friend or person whom he desires to assist him?—No, I do not think there is such a provision, but as a matter of fact they always do; they usually have a friend with them.

1994. Do you think it is desirable that a person coming before you should have the assistance, if desired, of a friend or a relative, or representative of some sort?—I think it is an advantage.

1995. I suppose the proceedings are informal; they are not conducted with forensic procedure?—No; they are quite informal.

1996. You say that in practice there is generally somebody else present as well?—Usually.

1997. For example, who?—I mean a relative—husband, wife, father or mother.

1998. Comes with the relieving officer?—Comes with the relieving officer and the patient.

1999. Do you discuss the case with the relative?—Frequently, yes.

2000. Are the proceedings in private?—Yes.

2001. Would you think it desirable that the person whose case you are considering should be legally represented before you; that is to say, should be represented by a solicitor?—No, I do not think so.

2002. Have you ever had a case in which the relative has protested against the relieving officer's conduct in bringing his relation before you?—The patient himself?

2003. No; the relative?—No, never.

2004. Have you ever had a case in which the person alleged to be insane has himself protested against an order being pronounced?—No, I have never had that.

2005. Do you tell the person who is before you what are the grounds upon which the medical certificate proceeds—I mean what are said to be his mental defects?—No, I do not think I do.

2006. Do you direct your questions to what is before you?—Yes.

2007. You have the facts upon which the medical certificate has proceeded?—I have the report of the doctor, and I know exactly what the patient's weakness is and the evidence of insanity, and my questions are usually directed to bring that out.

2008. But do you think it would be expedient as a step in the proceedings to read to the person the report upon his case?—No, I do not; I think it might be very detrimental.

2009. The report, I suppose, might say that the case was a hopeless one, or other words to that effect?—Yes.

2010. It might be undesirable to read that to a patient?—Yes.

2011. Do you think that justices in practice see that the topics upon which the medical certificate proceeds are properly explored in their examination of the person before them?—Yes, I think they are as a rule.

2012. Are the grounds upon which the case is brought before you disclosed to the relative who, as you say, accompanies the case?—Yes, I think so; there is no secrecy about it.

2013. If any relative who came with a case before you said, "I should like to see the medical certificate which you have," would you show it to him?—Oh, certainly.

2014. And, equally, if the patient was entitled to be accompanied by a third party, as a private patient is, would you think that third party ought to see the grounds?—I think so, certainly.

2015. But, following what you said, probably with an injunction not to show them to the patient?—Yes.

Chairman: Thank you, Sir John. We are much obliged to you for coming here.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Sir ROBERT WALDEN, C.B.E., J.P., called and examined.

2016. Chairman: Sir Robert, you are Chairman of the Visiting Magistrates of Institutions for Defectives for the County of London?—Yes.

2017. You are also Chairman of the Bench of Magistrates, Hanover Square Division, in the County of London?—Yes.

2018. And you have acted as Chairman of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, for the period 1913 to 1919?—Yes, I have.

2019. You are also ex-Chairman of the City of Westminster Board of Guardians, and an ex-member of the London County Council Mental Deficiency Committee?—Yes.

SIR ROBERT WALDEN, C.B.E., J.P.

2020. We therefore have before us a gentleman of large experience. I understand that you desire to put before us views derived by you from that experience on one or two of the main topics of our reference?—Yes.

2021. First of all I gather that the question of the personal examination of a case by a magistrate is a matter to which you attach importance?—I do attach considerable importance to it. I think that in every case where a magistrate adjudicates, he should see the person and ask questions, and of course hear what the alleged lunatic has to say; it is a very great advantage to know the personal conduct of the person. For instance, under an urgency order I believe that a patient may be seen by one medical man; he is removed to some institution and then within seven days he is seen by a second medical man, and the documents can be placed before a magistrate, who can sign that instrument. I think that in that case and in all cases, the magistrate should satisfy himself by his personal observation and contact with the case.

2022. If one may just put it broadly, you think that a justice who has this responsible duty to perform, should not proceed merely upon paper information?—That is so; that is putting precisely what I think.

2023. You think that he should have a personal contact with the case?—Quite.

2024. Under the existing regime, in the case of a pauper there is an obligatory personal interview, is there not?—There is, yes.

2025. In the case of a private patient if there is no personal interview there is a right on the part of the patient to demand an interview with a justice within seven days after reception?—Yes.

2026. One sees that your criticism comes in at this point, that in the case of a private patient who does not resort to that right, an order is pronounced where there has been no personal interview at all?—The patient of course may not know his right, and under the circumstances he may not ask for an interview, but it is necessary, I think, before the magistrate signs the document, that he should see the person.

2027. That is a question of general principle?—Of general principle I think in every case.

2028. Have you yourself had to deal with many cases?—Not a great many; my work has been chiefly administrative, but I have in past years seen a good many cases altogether, and I have recently, of course, seen a few.

2029. It would be interesting if you would just tell us, in the light of the actual experience you have had of dealing with cases—have you had difficulty in saying of a particular person brought before you, "Well, I think this case is one that ought to be dealt with by order" or not?—I have had difficulty sometimes. I have asked for cases to be put back and further observation to be made. I mean it is so very important, I consider, that one should be fully convinced in one's own mind, independently almost of medical evidence, that the patient is mentally disordered. You may converse with a person for ten or fifteen minutes, or even longer than that, and you do not find anything wrong at all, and then something happens, something is mentioned, and the patient goes off wrong altogether. Then there is no doubt about it; very often it takes you days to find out the condition of the patient's mentality.

2030. Are you speaking just now of private patient cases, or of pauper cases?—Pauper cases chiefly.

2031. In the pauper case the provision of the statute is that the justice is directed to call in a medical practitioner. Was it your practice to call in a medical practitioner, or did you find that the relieving officer was already armed with a certificate?—No, in every case there is a medical practitioner present, and there is the relieving officer with his certificate. Do you wish me to tell you the procedure?

2032. I would like to know how you have done it yourself. Stage the matter for us, so that we can visualise it.—What really happens is that the case paper is put before me, and I read it over carefully. Then, if anything occurs to me, I ask the medical man or relieving officer for an explanation. Then the patient is brought in.

2033. Earl Russell: Is it before or after the patient is brought in that you ask the medical man to explain?—If on going through the case paper I find that there is anything obscure that I want elucidated, I ask that question before the patient is brought in. Then the patient is brought in, and I talk to him in as pleasant a way as possible, put him at his ease, and then ask him various questions. Very often, in most cases, the relatives have been informed, and they are there, they also come in. Then you ask the man various questions which you think will not do any harm to the patient; you take him quietly. You commence at first, of course, by general conversation. Then he will generally answer your questions, and you can soon get an idea as to whether there is anything the matter with the man. Very often the people who come with the man will give you some very valuable hints, or information.

2035. Sir David Drummond: Are these cases that have already been brought to the workhouse by the relieving officer?—They may have been brought to the workhouse by the relieving officer or by a policeman; very often they are brought by a policeman. A man is found wandering in the street; there is a crowd there. He comes in in the middle of the night very often, and the policeman is there and tells you how the case occurred.

2036. But they have nearly all been to the workhouse?—All these pauper cases we are talking about now have been taken to the receiving ward of the workhouse.

2037. Sir Humphry Rolleston: And they have had a medical examination?—Yes, a medical examination. The doctor then reports to the magistrate his view of the case, which is done, of course, before the alleged lunatic. My idea is to make it as plain as possible, not to hide anything, but let the lunatic know as far as he can. Very often he takes a very intelligent view of the case.

2038. Chairman: You say you have a medical certificate before you?—Yes.

2039. When and where has that medical certificate come into being?—It is a form that has been filled in by the relieving officer, I suppose; and the medical man, of course, studies it and gives you his view of the case.

2040. But the medical man is apparently the medical officer of the workhouse?—He may be any one; but the guardians have a medical superintendent who is a very experienced man in these cases. We could call in any medical man, but it is better, I think, to have a man experienced in lunacy. The man I am thinking of has had over 20 years' experience, quite an expert.

2041. But the statute rather suggests to my mind that the selection of the medical practitioner who is to assist you shall be in your hands?—Quite.

2042. But in point of fact you find that a medical gentleman has already intervened?—He is there on the spot; it may be a bad case and a difficult case, and he is consulted. The magistrate does not appear until the day afterwards, perhaps; that is to say in pauper cases, of course.

2043. Have you ever found yourself at variance with the medical man?—I will not say at variance, but I have differed from him, and I have said, "I think this case ought to be put back for further observation; I am not prepared to sign an order."

SIR ROBERT WALDEN, C.B.E., J.P.

2044. Has that happened often?—No, not often, but now and then.

2045. What sort of means of resolving the difficulty is there if the justice sitting in his judicial capacity and the medical man differ as to what should be done with the case?—If they differ materially after observation, I think you should have another magistrate and a sort of medical board, consisting of an expert and two or three others that you could call in.

2046. There is no existing machinery provided for that purpose?—No.

2048. I see nothing to prevent you calling in any medical practitioner you liked, and you could select an alienist for the purpose.—I dare say. If it is a very difficult case I would rather have an expert to advise me.

2049. Earl Russell: If the doctor who had signed the certificate said to you: "It is no good; I am quite certain the man is mad," you probably would not take the responsibility of discharging him without consulting a second medical man?—No. I should like to be able to call upon somebody who has an expert knowledge. An ordinary doctor has not had the experience; he has not had the training. You want to be sure before you do this if there is a doubt.

2050. Chairman: Do you in your practice tell the person who is before you what are the grounds upon which he is alleged to be insane?—Yes; I give him as much knowledge as I think desirable. I go through the case paper and give him the information, whatever it is. I think he ought to have it.

2051. Do you do it by directing your questions to the matters which have been emphasised in the report, or do you actually read to him what is said of him?—I read part of it or make a comment and explain it. He might not get a grip of the thing unless you explained matters.

2052. I can conceive that there may be things in the medical certificate that it might be detrimental to tell the patient?—Yes; I should be careful about that as a matter of fact. You want to use a certain amount of tact in these matters.

2053. But in discussing with him his case, do you specially direct the conversation to the subjects emphasised in the medical report?—I say, "Now tell me all about it. What has happened?" and get his reply to it. He understands part of it generally.

2057. On the other hand, if he said, "I never knew anything so preposterous in my life," you would naturally proceed to probe the matter?—Yes.

2058. I suppose you regard it as important that you should have some discretion as to the extent to which you will put before the alleged lunatic the information you have?—Yes; you must trust someone in the matter. Magistrates are chosen men, but some of them dislike the work. I think it would be better to have a panel. In London there are about 316 judicial authorities and they are not all equal in that respect; they do not take the same amount of interest in it. Some of them cannot do it. I have known a man say, "Oh, no, I cannot do that work; I would rather be excused."

2059. As a matter of temperament one can understand that the duty would be much more painful to some people than to others?—Yes. If you are of robust mind you can stand it, otherwise it is painful to you.

2060. If any relative said "I would like to see the medical certificate which is before you," would you show it to him?—Certainly; I should give them all the information I possibly could, the relatives, the wife, or the father, or whoever it might be.

2061. Any responsible person who is there with the patient?—Yes.

2064. You do not want to import a forensic aspect into the transaction?—No, I do not think it is necessary really.

2066. Such institutions have been variously described as clinics or reception houses, or by other terms. Do you think that there should be interposed before the actual certification of any case such an intermediate stage?—I think in a great many cases it would be advisable that provision should be made for observation. I think that this place, whatever you call it, I venture to call it hostel—I do not like the word altogether, but that is subject to consideration—should be under the management of an expert neurologist, and he should have trained people under him, trained nurses, both male and female, having medico-psychological and other certificates, and they should be able to report on the case after a time. I think that would be better than the present system. A person, for instance, may be taken up out in the street. They lose their memory in the middle of the night and they may be taken into a workhouse and put into a ward where there are screaming and violent people. It would upset me, and there might be very little the matter with me. I might have had some domestic trouble—I will not say I might have had too much drink, but in such circumstances a man might be taken there. There this man or woman, nicely dressed, educated and so on, is suddenly plunged as it were, into this undesirable place. There should be a means of classification, I do not mean as to whether a man is rich or poor, but as to his mentality. He may be a poor lunatic, nothing very harmful about him. On the other hand, he may be very violent and do a great deal of harm, ready to commit a murder, or something of that kind. It is very hard to place that sort of person with others in one observation ward in a workhouse. I do not say it in any way disparagingly of the workhouse, but the people who are attendants there have not any expert knowledge; and the surroundings are not suitable for observation. I think at the beginning you want to be very careful how you treat the alleged lunatic. It is the beginning and the end that are important.

2067. That is very important. And another point is this: We have all been a little struck with it in certain instances at least. Cases have to be designated as pauper, possibly quite undeservedly. Now the provision of an observation period such as you figure, would have this advantage, that the cases could be sorted out, not merely according to their ailments, but also according to their ability to furnish the means of their own treatment?—I quite agree.

2069. That is a place which by the nature of things cannot have the same facilities or equipment?—The same surroundings, no.

2070. Either for treatment or for diagnosis?—Quite.

2071. Do you contemplate that this transitional period might have the result in many cases of a cure being effected, so that you would hear no more of these cases?—Certainly in some cases.

SIR ROBERT WALDEN, C.B.E., J.P.

2072. You would hear no more about them except possibly to write a formal discharge?—That is right.

2073. Is it desirable to eliminate both the workhouse idea and the asylum idea from this stage?—I think that it should be cut off from both the workhouse and the asylum. If you could send these cases to such a place as I have mentioned already, it would be very desirable in the interests of the patients. You would give the patient a better chance of recovery. Some people are very sensitive, and the idea of being sent to a workhouse or an asylum would have a very detrimental effect upon the mind, I think.

2074. Let us consider those people in this observation institution, and what might befall them. At the end of the period of trial it might be found that cases were obviously cases for certification. Then they would pass to the public asylum, or to the workhouse, if they were harmless cases which might be housed there, or they might possibly be the subject of an application for a reception order to go to a licensed house, or any of the other methods of treatment of private patients?—Quite.

2075. On the other hand, it might be found as the result of the trial that a person was not a certifiable person, and ought to return to his friends?—Yes; often it might be so.

2078. Then the case would no doubt be brought back to you at once by the medical officer of the institution, and a discharge pronounced?—Yes. There should be a rota of magistrates, and they could visit an institution of that kind frequently. Then there is the emergency case which required to be dealt with at once. A man has recovered; the medical expert is quite satisfied and the magistrate is quite satisfied; he reports to his friends and there is an end of it.

2079. Do you contemplate that during this period of observation the justice should visit?—If you had an institution of the kind I have mentioned, there would be many cases, and no doubt you would have day to day work to do in that direction.

2080. Do you think that that proposed place would be a suitable place for the patients to be brought to the justice for certification?—That is what I mean; get away from the workhouse altogether. The relieving officer or the policeman would take the patient to this hostel, or whatever you call it, and the patient would be examined there and would not go to the workhouse at all.

2081. It would also obviate bringing the patient to the justice's private residence or to his place of business?—Yes, that is undesirable, of course.

2083. You are a gentleman of large experience of local administration. How do you look at this from the point of view of the expense of providing such a scheme?—I look at it in this way. Of course, the lunacy accommodation in this country is overcharged at present, and you will have to make provision for it, and that will be expensive. If you provided two such places for London, for instance, one north and one south of the Thames, fairly large places, and spent the money in that way, you would relieve the pressure. There would be a number of people going to these places, and they would relieve the pressure on the asylums. I would suggest that you should build one or two and make the experiment, and see how you got on with it.

2084. Then you think that empowering legislation would be the appropriate thing at first, rather than directory legislation?—I do not know. I rather think that the Minister of Health by an Order could assist matters in that way. I have not gone into the legal position. It might be necessary to have an Act of Parliament.

2085. Have you found that the limits of accommodation in the Metropolis have been about reached?—The accommodation is inadequate, of course, now, and has been, I believe, for some little time. I was Chairman of a large mental hospital where there were imbeciles, and we also had lunacy cases there, not bad cases; but we cannot find accommodation for them; the authorities are glad to get accommodation anywhere.

2086. Your scheme of observation, of course, assists one there, because we have been struck with this, that there does not seem to be any method of distribution of cases according to their class; that is to say, that a bed in an asylum may be occupied by a chronic case, a hopeless case, which might quite equally and happily be relegated to a workhouse, while in the workhouse there may be a case which would benefit by the special equipment of an asylum?—I would rather have a patient in a mental hospital than a workhouse, because it interferes with the working of classification and that sort of thing. It is rather hard on the poor old people in a workhouse to have even a harmless lunatic near them and associating with them.

2087. Do you think it would be desirable to associate the proceedings for certification with such a hostel as you have described? Might that import an unpleasant element?—I suppose it would. It is difficult, of course; the whole question is very intricate, and it requires consideration.

2088. It has been suggested to me that possibly the certification proceedings within the hospital might be rather prejudicial to its character as a hospital?—Then you would go back to the old workhouse again.

2090. The police court, I think, is surely undesirable?—I think so; I would not go to the police court. It is a question that you will have to think about; it is difficult.

2091. One must bear in mind always that every new facility is expensive?—Exactly.

2093. Have you any view as to whether these places of observation or hostels should be under the jurisdiction of the Board of Control, or independent of the Board of Control?—I should think they ought to be under the Board of Control.

2094. Have you had any experience yourself of the workings of the Board of Control?—From time to time, yes. I have always found them a very reasonable body, always very helpful, and they do the best they can.

2096. This is quite a general question: Do you regard their position and their powers as affording a public safeguard for these unfortunate people?—Certainly, I think so. They are very careful in what they do, as careful as anybody can be, and you must trust somebody. I do not know what you are to do if you have not somebody of that kind.

2097. Now have you any views to give us on the question of visitation generally?—Well, of course, they have a different system, I believe, in the country, with which I am not very well acquainted. They have visiting justices, which we do not have in London.

SIR ROBERT WALDEN, C.B.E., J.P.

2099. But what I would like to know is this: When you visit do you have an opportunity of seeing individual patients and talking with them?—I go amongst them, and they say to me: "Oh, you have not been to see us for a long time; very glad to see you"—all that sort of thing. They know me; they tell me sometimes stories which are not quite true, but it is a relief for them to talk to some one like myself who goes among them and passes a joke, and the time of day, and they appreciate it.

2100. Have any of them grievances?—Very frequently they have grievances, and letters.

2101. If you get a letter do you make a point of seeing the writer?—It all depends upon the letter. It may happen that every time you go the same person has a letter for you; but every complaint that is made by letter I read very carefully, see the patient, the medical man and the case paper, if necessary.

2102. Do you see the patient alone?—Yes, if I think there is anything in the case. I remember going to one institution where a man impressed me very much. I took his name and saw the medical man about it. "Oh," he said, "he is a most dangerous man." That man impressed me that he was absolutely sane. The medical man said, "While he was talking to you we had someone near you." I went into the case paper and found that he was a hopeless man, very violent. I mean, in every case I do that. They have always a great deal to say to you. They let off steam, as it were, and they are satisfied. Another patient will wait and say: "Oh, Sarah, you have had your time; I want to see the gentleman," and then she has a turn.

2104. We are very much concerned with the question of the safeguards. No doubt the great majority of cases are all right, but one wants to know that there are means whereby if anything goes wrong it can be ascertained and remedied?—That is so. There are minor cases, of course. A nurse perhaps may give a patient a push, or sometimes a woman loses her temper and she gives her a bang, or something of that kind. I have had one or two cases of that kind mentioned to me, and I have gone into them thoroughly with the medical man, and have gone into the record of the nurse or the attendant. There are some cases where there has been a quarrel between patients, and a man has a black eye.

2105. You mean two patients?—Yes. The attendants come and of course separate them, and use a certain amount of force. Of course, the patients are great strong men and they have to restrain them. They both of them blamed the attendants, but it was not so really. I went into the case with the medical superintendent and found that it was a case of these two patients fighting. All that the male nurses or attendants did was to separate them. In some cases, of course, where we find something wrong has been done to the patient, it is reported to the Board of Control, and we get rid of the attendant at once. To my mind the most serious thing that can happen in that way is violence to a patient.

2106. But does the visit which you make give you an opportunity of personally investigating such matters, and do you afford the patients in the asylum the opportunity of bringing before you anything of which they complain?—I do. I have had telegrams sent to me at my home, "Can you kindly come at once," and I go and hear the case. If I think it is a case to be brought before the Committee I bring it before them; if not, I deal with it as I think best.

2107. As far as you are concerned, representing the local authority, I suppose you have no interest whatever to detain a patient in an institution?—We want to discharge them, of course, if we possibly can; all public institutions do, I believe. They have no interest except the interest of the patient, and they want to make room there; space is always wanted. It is undesirable to keep anyone if you can get rid of them. There are people in an asylum whom you could get out if there were anyone to look after them, but they are so helpless that they would be taken advantage of; they would do silly things in the street, and they are very much better in the asylum; they are very happy there. The ordinary idea is that these poor creatures are in misery all the time, but it is not so; they are quite happy if they are properly treated.

2108. We have heard that many of them labour under the painful feeling that they are being detained although they are quite sane?—Most of them do that.

2110. Have you found that as a result of inquiries made it has been frequently necessary to dismiss attendants for ill-treatment?—No, not often. As you know, in all classes you get the wrong sort of people, and you have to get rid of them; but I do not think the percentage is very high, because they know that if they want to keep their jobs they must behave properly and treat the patients properly, and that is always impressed upon them.

2111. Have you ever found in your experience the case of a patient who seemed afraid to tell you of his grievances? It has been suggested, you know, that sometimes a patient may be so much under the domination of a nurse or an attendant that he is frightened to tell the visitors what has happened?—I believe that is so, sometimes.

2112. Have you ever seen people in a cowed state, or in a state of fear?—Not cowed, but they would rather take you into a corner and explain things to you, independently of the surroundings.

2113. Would you always give a patient the opportunity of seeing you privately, away from an attendant?—Yes, always.

2114. What provision is there for private interviews?—You can take them into a private room or into the Board room. If it is a fine day you take them round the airing court and talk to them in that way.

2115. I can see that even so there must be some limit, because a dangerously homicidal patient might say he would like to see you alone, but I can hardly imagine that it would be reciprocated.—No; you have to run that risk, of course. You never know what risk you run really. As a rule they look upon you as their friend, and that is what you want to encourage. I always say to them, "Do not be afraid of saying anything to me; I will take care it does you no harm. I am here to look after your welfare and do the best I can." They say, "You promised the last time that you would let me out, but I am here still." I mean you cannot help that.

SIR ROBERT WALDEN, C.B.E., J.P.

2118. Again, you would not consider, would you, that it should be appropriate to make such an investigation on forensic lines?—No; I do not think there would be much good in that. I mean then it becomes a legal question, and so many side issues are brought into it that it really does no good. I am speaking from a medical point of view, of course. You are examining a patient as to his mentality, and that sort of thing, and as to his disease. You do not want to bring a lawyer into it.

2119. I was thinking of what one may call the apparatus of the Law Courts, examination and cross-examination, and so on. Those features do not strike you as suitable for this particular inquiry?—No, and very often the Judge does not know.

2121. But by what means short of judicial inquiry do you think there could be provided an independent safeguard?—I should think you might have a Board with a medical expert, the medical superintendent and a magistrate. I should always have the magistrate, because I think people, rightly or wrongly, attach so much importance to that. He is a sort of representative on the part of the public.

2122. He represents the public interest?—Yes; and you could get men to do it; there are men who would do it, of course. They have to be sought out. It is not everybody who would do it; some people do not like it; they cannot do it. Also you want men of experience.

2123. I have difficulty in seeing how you could work this. If, as you tell us, a very large number of rightly certified cases, obvious cases of insanity, labour under the delusion that they are quite sane and are wrongfully detained, would it not be a rather idle ceremony to have Boards sitting upon these cases over and over again?—It would. People do come up who a child could tell were insane. They come round you like a swarm of bees, and they all say they want to go home, but you can see that not one of them is fit to be outside the asylum. There must be precautions against abuse of the procedure.

2124. Have you any suggestion to make to us as to the method of selecting cases on which some independent investigation might be desirable? It seems to me that you get again into the element of discretion.—That is it, in the vast majority of cases. Of course the medical superintendent and the magistrates on the visiting committee do, as far as possible, let them out, and return to their civil life all they possibly can. Those who are detained there are, of course, certifiable and have to remain there. It is only very seldom that you get a border-line case, and it is difficult to determine. It seems to me that if the person's friends think the person is not insane and ought to be let out, and they can show good cause for it, then you might have a Board of that kind; but otherwise it would be futile and a waste of time.

2125. The initiation of such an inquiry would have to rest either with the patients themselves or with the relatives, or with some person interested in the case?—Yes.

2126. So far as the patient himself is concerned I can see great difficulty in giving him a legal right to initiate proceedings to consider his own case, because, ex hypothesi, he is not, or at least may not be, in a state to give any such instructions?—That is so.

2127. The relative, on the other hand, may not bring to the matter an independent judgment?—Very often not.

2129. The existing system, under which probationary periods of trial are provided for, of course affords a useful means of dealing with border-line cases?—Yes.

2130. Then we know there is a considerable amount of machinery in the Act dealing with discharge in a great many different ways, but for the moment one was considering whether it was necessary to have some additional method of investigation which might possibly lead to discharge, over and above those which exist in the present code.—I think every possible care is taken at present. There is nothing very much to criticise about it.

2131. Is it your view that so far as possible the medical superintendents in asylums and persons who would have to deal with places of observation should possess specialised qualifications?—Yes; I think they should be fully qualified. A medical superintendent is highly paid. Before he reaches that position and practices he should have every qualification, a diploma in psychological medicine, and all certificates that are obtained. He should be a fully qualified man in every possible way.

2132. Of course, in every profession persons specialise in particular branches; science is now so much divided and so much elaborated. Do you regard it as desirable that medical men, who have to deal with this important branch, should have some special qualification, as distinguished from the ordinary qualifications of the medical practitioner?—Yes, I think they should, and they should go through a course which would lead to these qualifications. They should have considerable practical experience.

2135. And, of course, in a public asylum three of the visitors may make such an order even if the medical superintendent does not agree?—Yes, quite.

2136. I misled you. Section 75 does not apply to a county asylum?—Not a public asylum.

2137. I understand your difficulty was rather not where a doctor improperly stood in the way, but where a doctor and the visiting committee or the justice was honestly in doubt as to whether the man was fit to be discharged or not?—Yes.

2138. And it was in those cases that you thought some tribunal might be useful?—Yes; I threw it out as a suggestion.

SIR ROBERT WALDEN, C.B.E., J.P.

2139. But it is always possible, is it not, for the visiting committee themselves to call in an alienist if they like to get his opinion?—There again it all depends upon whom they call in. They can do so, of course, but the ordinary person thinks that if he is a doctor he knows all about lunacy, but he does not. He has not the same experience as an expert.

2140. But, on the other hand, the public think, rightly or wrongly, that an alienist is apt to think everybody certifiable?—Yes, there is that point.

2141. Now, on the question of accommodation, and it also touches this question of the hostel, Section 22 does give the justice who makes an order an opportunity of letting a lunatic be cared for by his friends?—Yes.

2142. So that would, to some extent, relieve the position?—Yes. We find out sometimes that a person has a good home and surroundings and can be taken care of.

2143. What would be your idea as to boarding out, which, as you know, is practised in Scotland, but not very much in this country?—I do not know, I am sure. They get the village idiot, and life is not often very happy. In some cases it might be desirable.

2144. On the other hand, as against that, it is said that they would rather get home surroundings than institutional surroundings?—Yes; it all depends upon the case. I should say in some cases it might be desirable.

2145. Would you yourself feel disposed to recommend extending that practice to England, or introducing it?—Yes. I mean it all depends upon the case.

2146. Chairman: Might I put a question at that point?—Take Glasgow, or some of the large industrial places in Scotland; I understand that quite a number of the cases, particularly the juvenile cases, are sent out to country houses, selected foster-parents, so to speak, and there live, as Lord Russell puts it, more in family surroundings; and if the case is a mild one they have rather a pleasanter life and are brought up in healthy surroundings. You would approve of that?—Yes, I would approve of that, but they need to be very carefully selected cases, and also the people you send them to.

2148. And, secondly, they would not have the same medical treatment that they would get in the asylum?—You want very carefully to select the cases and the people to whom they are sent. Many of these poor people would take cases like that for profit, and you might get into a serious difficulty.

2149. You also have this difficulty, have you not, that you might possibly get breeding, which is undesirable?—Yes, that is a point; that is why I should carefully select cases, because that is a serious point.

2150. Mrs. Mathew: I wanted to ask you, Sir Robert, when you are talking to the lunatic before you commit him, do you go into his previous history at all?—Yes, always; in fact the relieving officer has a note book, and he furnishes you with it, of course; and you hear very often from the relatives, and find out all you possibly can about it, whether he has been certified before, or whether he has been to any other magistrate.

2151. That is not quite what I meant. I wanted to know, do you find it useful to have, or do you ever ask for, the previous medical history—not whether he was certified before or not, but just general observations on the medical history of the case, if any?—Yes.

2152. Do you find that useful?—Yes. I go into the case, and I think magistrates do, as thoroughly as they can.

2153. It sometimes takes a long time?—It does take a long time; you have to remand the case if you are not satisfied, and go again. It all depends upon the care that is taken and the individuals, the medical men and the magistrate, of course. You want to adopt a sympathetic attitude, and you get full information; they will help you in that way.

2154. Then with regard to seeing the patients in the institutions, is there any record of whom you see when you visit?—Yes, there is a record kept of serious cases.

2155. Even of those patients whom you take away into a corner?—No; as a rule cases of that kind are very few; I mean cases which merit a record being kept, because they are so very often trivial and unsatisfactory.

2156. I only meant the names of the persons who have interviewed you. Is there a record kept of their names?—If it is a serious case, yes, but not in the ordinary way when they come round you like a swarm of bees and want to be liberated.

2157. But I really meant the cases that you take apart and interview in a sort of private way—is there any record kept of such people who interview you?—Not necessarily.

2159. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I was much impressed with the stress you laid upon the desirability of specialisation both on behalf of the judicial authorities and of the medical men whom they call in. Would you be of opinion that the justices should be as specialised with regard to the enquiry into diseases of the mind as a coroner is with regard to an investigation into the causes of death?—Of course it would be better, but it would be impossible. You would have to have a paid authority; a man could not give his time. He would have to go through a course of study, and all that sort of thing, and unless you paid a man I do not think you would be able to get him.

2162. Sir Ernest Hiley: Sir Robert, in the case of what are termed trial cases, people who are sent on probation from the institution of which you are Chairman, is there any arrangement for after-care?—No. I think the after-care of these people is a very important point. You should have some arrangement for it. There are private societies, of course, and people who look after these cases, but I think it should be taken up more generally than it is.

2163. At the present time it is left entirely to voluntary agencies?—Quite.

2164. And your institution makes no arrangements whatever for visits in these cases, or to assist them in any way?—No; it is not done.

2165. Do you know whether it is practised anywhere in the country?—I think it is practised more or less all over the country, but it is by private people and private societies. I do not know of any public authorities who take it up in that way; there may be some.

2166. I am not speaking with regard to the juvenile population, the arrangements for whom are carried out in conjunction with the Education Committees, but I mean for the adults?—No, I do not know of any place; there may be some, but I do not know of them.

2167. Do you think that if these reception hostels were pretty generally adopted, something could be linked up with them which would carry out this after-care duty?—Yes, I think it would be a very great advantage if these people could be looked after in that way by an after-care committee; it would assist them materially.

2168. I suppose the vast majority of the cases that come before you present no difficulty with regard to the certificate?—No.

MR. WILLIAM HENRY LORD.

2169. You are perfectly safe in sending them to a mental hospital right away?—I always take care that it is so, and I think every magistrate does, too.

2170. Can you give me any idea of what is the proportion of doubtful cases that would have to go to this reception or observation home?—A great many would of course. My idea of it is that it should be a reception home, and that the cases should be remanded there if there is a doubt.

2171. I am asking you what proportion of cases there would be. Can you give me any idea?—I could not really; I have not sufficiently gone into it, but a good proportion of them would go to the reception home.

2172. Of course, as the Chairman pointed out, it would be an expensive matter to construct an institution of that kind, and to equip it?—Yes. Personally I think it would be worth the money, because you would get away from the Poor Law taint and the surroundings of the workhouse, and you would get better people to deal with the patients, expert medical men and people who are trained; the nurses and attendants of those people would be trained also.

2174. I am speaking more of the country?—I do not know so much about the country. I know it is important, but it is a difficult thing. Connected with the Board of Guardians, where I live, the area is 20 miles one way and 40 miles another, and it is difficult to deal with people there, of course.

2175. I take it that while the patient was in this reception home, he would more or less be under the jurisdiction of the magistrate who sent him there?—Yes, he would.

2177. Does not that involve having one of these homes for almost each district?—Yes. That will have to be thought out. I merely make the suggestion. I was thinking chiefly of London, where I think it is very desirable. It may not be workable in the country; I do not know.

2178. But it would be a very expensive matter?—I am sure of that. The question is whether you would get a return for it; I do not know. It all depends upon what is being carried out under the present system.

2179. Earl Russell: I want you to qualify one of your answers a little, if you will. You said that you thought a justice who dealt with this matter ought to be highly specialised?—I did not mean to say highly specialised, but I meant a man of experience. I will not go further than that.

2180. You have a considerable knowledge, and you are also a man of affairs, but if it were your sole business to do this, you might lose the confidence of the public?—No, I do not think that.

Chairman: We are much obliged to you, Sir Robert.

(The Witness withdrew.)

(After an Adjournment.)

Mr. WILLIAM HENRY LORD, called and examined.

2181. Chairman: Are you a Justice of the Peace for the City of Birmingham?—Yes.

2182. Have you held office since 1914?—Yes.

2183. I think you live at Northfield in the City of Birmingham?—Yes.

2184. Is your home near Hollymoor and Rubery Asylums?—Yes. It lies between the City and the Asylums.

2185. In consequence of that proximity have you been invoked in a large number of so-called pauper cases?—Yes.

2186. In dealing with pauper cases you act as a justice of the peace and not as a judicial authority?—That is so.

2187. Have you had any experience of acting as a judicial authority as well as a justice of the peace?—No.

2188. You are, however, in point of fact a member of the Birmingham Judicial Authority?—I am.

2189. But you have not had to act in that capacity?—I have not.

2190. May we take it that your duties have been as a justice of the peace dealing with pauper cases?—That is so.

2191. As such, you have a statutory duty to see every case, have you not?—I have.

2192. Do you attach importance to that personal interview?—Very strongly.

2193. What material in practice do you have before you when a case comes up for consideration?—A form filled up by the relieving officer with full particulars as to the patient's family relations, his address, and all the particulars which are necessary, followed in its proper place by one medical certificate as additional corroborative evidence.

2194. Has that certificate been obtained before the patient has been brought into your presence?—Yes.

2197. Then who is present when you are considering such a case?—The relieving officer, the patient, and one or two assistants of the relieving officer who will act as attendants—one in a mild case, or two if necessary.

2198. Do any of the relatives attend?—They do not. In my case, I do not think a relative or friend has ever attended in my experience.

2199. Where do you conduct the examination of the case?—My house is remote and in a quiet lane; the patient is in a motor-car, and generally I go to the motor-car to see him there and then.

2200. Does the interview take place out of doors?—The interview takes place out of doors. I am always prepared to have them inside, but as a matter of fact I find in taking the examination, that questioning the alleged lunatic is sufficient corroboration of the medical certificates to justify me.

2201. When do you first see the papers in the case?—They are brought to the house with the patient.

2202. A car drives up to your door, and that is the first intimation you have?—No. I get a telephone message first.

2203. You get a telephone message from the relieving officer that he is coming out with a case?—Yes.

2204. Then does the relieving officer come into your house with the papers?—He comes into my house with the papers, and I examine him about the particulars.

2205. Then does your interview with the patient take place in the motor car?—Generally I find it quite sufficient to talk to the patient in the motor car, and there is a real reason for it. If a patient is at all violent, it is inadvisable to disturb him, and they are generally quiet when they arrive. If they have been violent, they have generally settled down when they arrive, and it is better, I find, to have a quiet talk and take them as they are than to disturb them by forcing them out of the car.

MR. WILLIAM HENRY LORD.

2206. Do you never take them into your study and talk to them there?—I never have.

2207. Sir David Drummond: The examination has not been opened in the workhouse up to this?—No.

2208. Chairman: Where has the patient been examined by the doctor then whose certificate you have?—I think it is at home, but of that I am not quite certain. Sometimes it is at the parish offices, but I think usually it is at home.

2209. What about the case of a person who is seized with an attack actually in the street and taken by a police constable? Is such a case brought before you sometimes?—No.

2210. Then the class of cases you are most conversant with are where the relieving officer has been told by relatives or otherwise that there is a case in a particular house requiring certification; and the case is brought out to you?—Yes.

2211. Then may I take it that the cases which reach you are cases as to which there is little doubt?—Very little.

2212. Have you had any experience of cases which I might call border line cases?—No. I had such a case at the asylum to which I was called to certify someone who had to be taken there.

2213. But the cases which come to your door in motor-cars, as you have described, are generally cases in which a brief examination satisfies you?—Quite—it is either a case of deep melancholia or an inclination to violence or strong incoherence.

2214. Then those cases do not involve a degree of dubiety where further consideration might appear desirable?—They do not. My only trouble has been on the medical certificate. I think much depends on the medical certificate, and I have mentioned the matter in my proof.

2215. In the case you allude to was your difficulty this, that the major part of the evidence submitted upon which the medical practitioner proceeded was hearsay evidence, and not evidence which he had himself observed?—Yes, the weighty part of the certificate consisted of hearsay evidence and not arising from his personal observation, and I considered the evidence of his own observation somewhat trivial.

2216. How did you proceed in that case?—I referred it back.

2217. Did you then get a further certificate amended?—Yes, in about three hours' time.

2218. Containing his personal observations?—Containing his personal observations.

2219. Have you had any cases to deal with under Section 13 of the Act of 1890—cases of persons who are not paupers and not wandering at large, but who are not under proper care and control, or who are cruelly treated or neglected?—No, and; especially with regard to cruelty, I am informed that is very rare.

2220. Would you regard it as important that the medical certificate which you have before you should be fortified by a second certificate?—Those certificates which I have had have been from trusted people—medical men whom I have known to be trustworthy, and they have been so decisive that the point has never occurred to me.

2221. The medical practitioners called in in the cases which have come under your notice have been known to the relieving officer, and presumably the relieving officer would resort to the same doctor?—Yes.

2222. And he would be a man of experience?—Yes.

2223. In that way have you come to rely on the opinion of the practitioner?—Yes.

2224. You knew who the doctor was, really?—Yes.

2225. Sir David Drummond: Was he the police surgeon?—He was the police surgeon or a Poor Law surgeon, but I am not quite certain—I am not quite certain of the official status.

2226. Chairman: In such a case do you find a single certificate, coupled with your own observation, quite sufficient to satisfy you in the discharge of your very important duty?—It has been, but one feels a very heavy responsibility because you are taking away a man's liberty; and I am rather of opinion, apart from personal feeling, that it would be well to have a second certificate.

2227. Do you think it would be necessary in every case, or are there not cases in which there would be no room for dubiety, and a second opinion might be unnecessarily duplicating the evidence?—That is so, and one knows when the patients are going into a public asylum they will be received by a first-class medical officer who undoubtedly will do his duty.

2230. Rather than to incur the expense of two certificates in every case?—Yes; and one must consider not only the responsibility but the possible result of sending a man to the workhouse.

2231. Have you ever had occasion in your capacity as a justice to differ from the certificate which has been before you?—No. I have always found my own observation confirmed by the medical certificate.

2232. I do not think you can assist us as to the procedure by a judicial authority?—No.

2234. Would you think it desirable that a person who is a pauper coming before you, as a justice of the peace, should have the right to be attended by a friend or relative?—I regard it as of importance for this reason, that if you get a difficult case, the alleged lunatic is, as it were, without any defence and the magistrate has to act as counsel for the defence and, in addition, in a judicial capacity. Now a criminal is brought up in open Court and not in private and in the case of a criminal there is a supposition, if he is charged with an offence against society, that he is innocent until he is proved to be guilty; but in the case of a lunatic I am afraid the supposition is that he is guilty until he is proved innocent. Therefore I think a man should have a friend with him. The wife is not even mentioned in the case of a pauper lunatic.

2235. Of course, there is a notable difference between an ordinary citizen charged with an offence against the criminal law and a person in this unhappy position, in that the criminal is able to instruct someone to defend him and is able to take an intelligent part himself in the proceedings, but in the case we are dealing with the person concerned unhappily is unable to take part in the investigation.—Yes, and the evidence is all on one side—there is no evidence called on the other side.

2237. In your case you have not had experience of the difficulty, because the cases before you, having come through the relieving officer, have all been pronounced cases?—Yes, but I have personal cognisance of one case of a man classed as a pauper, a highly-respectable country workman, who had been, I think, a colour-sergeant in the Army, and who was taken without his wife even having had notice of the proceedings. That was not a case of mine.

2238. Where was he at the time?—In the village, and he was fetched with no prior notice of the proceedings, whereas if he had been a private case, the wife would have been the person to present the petition.

MR. WILLIAM HENRY LORD.

2239. Then you would attach value to a proposal that in the case of a pauper there should be the right to have a third person present?—I think so.

2240. At the same time, do you consider it undesirable to import the element of a Court into the investigation?—Quite. Of necessity, the proceedings must be private, and they appear to me more a matter of common sense than of argument.

2241. You want the inquiry to be exhaustive and not one-sided only, but at the same time you want to eliminate what I might call the forensic element?—Quite.

2242. Have any of the persons who have come under your cognisance and have come before you in this way protested that they were being taken away against their will quite improperly?—No.

2243. Never?—No.

2244. If a person brought before you by a relieving officer protested that he was quite sane and the whole proceedings were a mistake, what would you do? Of course, you would have the medical certificate telling you the man was really insane, but how would you solve the situation?—I should continue the conversation, and my experience is that in quite a short time the weakness would declare itself.

2245. But if no weakness declared itself, what would you do?—Then one would have to remand the case.

2246. Would you take advantage of the provision that you can retain a doubtful case for 14 days?—Yes, there is one workhouse near Birmingham where such a case could be sent to.

2247. And there the patient would be under observation?—Yes.

2250. You concur in his views?—I concur.

2251. Have you any suggestion to make from your own experience?—No. I think the subject has been fairly exhausted by Sir John.

2253. And if he were brought with no one belonging to him, would you take any steps to ascertain whether there was anybody related to him concerned?—No, I have not done so.

2254. I suppose if it were a clear case on the certificate and on your judgment, you would feel that there was nothing to be gained by remanding him for the attendance of a relative, but that the case should go at once to the asylum?—Yes.

2255. Of course, you would have power to remand the man and have him up again with his relatives present, but you do not make a practice of inquiring of the relieving officer whether there are any relations, or why they are not there?—No, I have not.

2256. I want to ask a question or two as to the actual words of the Act, which are perfectly clear and which do not seem to us now to be in all these cases observed. Section 16 says that the justice before whom a lunatic is brought (that is you) shall call in a medical practitioner, and then it says after that, if in those cases the medical practitioner who has been called in signs a medical certificate the justice may make an order: in fact, I gather you do not call in a medical practitioner?—In fact, the patient has been seen by the medical officer.

2257. And you do not call him in, in the sense of having him there and saying, "Will you make this certificate?"—you simply take the certificate presented to you?—I simply take the certificate presented to me.

2258. That is not in accordance with the actual words of the section, is it?—It appears not to be.

2259. Then there is another point in Section 18 which says that, "A justice shall not sign an order for the reception of a person as a pauper lunatic into an institution for lunatics or workhouse unless he is satisfied that the alleged pauper is either in receipt of relief or in such circumstances as to require relief for his proper care." In order to fulfil the conditions of that section do you ask the relieving officer whether the man is in fact unable to pay for his treatment?—Into what institution?

2260. The words are, "shall not sign an order for the reception of a person as a pauper lunatic into an institution for lunatics or workhouse."—No, I have never done it. The position is fairly obvious as a general rule.

2261. But your order, in point of fact, is an order that the relieving officer shall take him to a particular asylum as a pauper?—Yes.

2262. And the section says you are not to sign unless you have satisfied yourself?—I have never satisfied myself, but in every case the position is obvious.

2263. I have no doubt the relieving officer satisfies himself, but you have never done so?—No.

2264. Do I understand that this remand to the workhouse is never used in Birmingham?—Hardly ever.

2265. And you send them direct to an institution?—Yes.

2266. And, in spite of overcrowding, you can tell what institution to send them to?—Yes. As a matter of fact, some cases do get sent to the Erdington Union.

2267. If you have any doubt you have a right to call in a second doctor or even a third doctor?—Yes.

2269. You do not feel that their absence introduces any element of doubt in your mind in dealing with a case?—I do not think it has ever done so in any case I have ever dealt with, but I can conceive that a different complexion might be put upon certain cases by the presence of some near relative, and I cannot understand the position of the relative in a private case and the position of the relative in a pauper case being different.

2270. Let me give you an example of a case of a certificate which came before me as a visitor on one occasion. Practically the only statement indicating insanity in the doctor's certificate was this: "Has delusions that his wife is unfaithful to him." Now you will admit that it was a difficult thing for the doctor to say whether that was a delusion or not?—Yes.

2271. If that case had come before you, would it not have been material to have had the wife before you and that you should have seen her?—Yes.

2272. You would not have accepted a certificate of that sort, would you, without seeing the wife or having some further explanation?—I should not.

2273. I admit that we ourselves were surprised to find that the patient had been brought to the asylum on such a ground as that. But there are cases, are there not, in which relatives would give you any information you desired?—With regard to that, you cannot tell what information a relative might give you, but I have said I think they should be there.

22 October, 1924.]

MR. WILLIAM HENRY LORD.

2274. Of course, where a statement is made which has to do with a relative, or if one of the statements was that he had tried to kill his small boy, the absence of the wife would be important. But you do not in fact inquire why the relatives are not there?—I do not.

2275. But I take it you think it would be a better practice if they were?—Yes, I do.

2276. Chairman: There are many cases, I suppose, where there are no relatives available—for instance, take the case of a person wandering at large?—Quite so.

2277. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to the question of having a second or consultative medical opinion in certain cases, have you any view as to what should be the nature of the qualifications of the medical practitioner—should he be a man with a special experience in lunacy, or should he not be an expert?—I have not formed an opinion about that. I think in a case of this kind I should be content with a man of wide general experience, not highly specialised.

2278. Do you think there would be a feeling of prejudice against a man who was always dealing with such a subject?—No, I think not—there might be, but I do not think so.

2279. Sir David Drummond: Can you explain to us how it happens that in Birmingham the use of the workhouse is not resorted to?—No.

2280. In some large areas in populous districts the workhouse is nearly always used, is it not, before a patient is sent to an asylum?—No, I have never inquired into the origin of the custom at Birmingham.

2281. Because it strikes me as remarkable that in Birmingham you do not utilise the workhouse generally in that way?—If I may give an opinion, which is not evidence, but only my opinion, it is that it is regarded as better to send a man to a place where he will meet very skilled people rather than to a place where there would be only the workhouse doctor to see to him—I mean a man who has many other duties and has not this one duty in particular to perform.

2282. In the districts which I have in mind it has often been found that a patient might not have to go to an asylum at all, and in 14 days he is discharged, and I do not see how you get over that difficulty at Birmingham, because presumably in a number of cases where a patient has been sent to an asylum he ought to have been discharged?—Yes, I am unable to explain it.

Sir David Drummond: I cannot understand how the practice is so different at Birmingham as compared with places elsewhere.

Chairman: I suppose there is a very considerable variation of practice in different districts, and we have already had examples of that. Some authorities use certain provisions and some authorities use others.

Witness: I would suggest that it is not altogether beyond imagination that very possibly patients are sent to a mental hospital, with a view of giving them a better chance of special treatment straight off.

2283. Would all this difficulty as to the different practice and the 14 days' rule, and so on, be obviated if effect were given to the suggestion that there should be a probationary institution, to which all cases should in the first instance be relegated for observation and treatment before certification?—Yes, very largely.

Sir David Drummond: But I take it, according to Mr. Lord's evidence, that he has not seen any cases which are at all doubtful.

2284. Chairman: I think that is the accident of his experience. (To the Witness): There must be obviously difficult cases?—Yes. May I say that I happen to be in a very convenient place for approaching Hollymoor or Rubery, and most of my cases are urgent, and I should say that the cases sent to me are such that the officials have to take them to Hollymoor. They must take them in, and they would rather take them in certified than uncertified, and the most rapid way is to call at my house on the way.

2285. Have your colleagues, the justices in Birmingham, to deal with many other cases?—Oh, yes, a great many.

2286. Have you had any opportunity of conferring with them?—They have never expressed any opinion to me. I am quite sure what I say is right, because the call to me is always, "Can you see them within a short time?" In all those cases they go to Hollymoor or Rubery, so that I think the custom has grown up from the idea that the proper place for a mental case is a mental hospital, and not a workhouse infirmary.

2287. Sir David Drummond: It is a question of rapid diagnosis, is it not?—Quite.

2288. Sir Ernest Hiley: Could you obtain for us and send to the Secretary the average number of cases per annum you have sent to the workhouse for temporary detention?—Yes, I could get those figures* for you; I think they are almost certain to be available, but I will get any figures I can which you want.

2289. If you had in Birmingham one of these observation homes, would you make any more use of it than you do of the workhouse at the moment for temporary accommodation?—Obviously, because you would have a highly-skilled staff who would be keen on determining the proper treatment of the patients who went in, so that they would be certainly sent there to start with. It would mean this—that you would send them to an institution where you would get a highly-skilled staff.

2290. Chairman: I notice that under the Lunacy Act certain forms are prescribed in the case of pauper lunatics, and the order form has appended to it a statement of particulars which you must have often seen, no doubt?—Yes.

2291. And in that statement of particulars information must be given as to whether the person is married, single, or widowed, and also information as to relatives who may have been afflicted with insanity, the Christian name and address of the nearest known relative, and the degree of relationship, if known. So that apparently there is before you information as to the relatives of the person you are examining, and if you wished you could ask to see any such person?—Yes.

2292. I mean, you have to be supplied with that information before you pronounce your order?—Yes.

2293. But you have never found it necessary in your experience to ask to see any such relative?—I have not.

2294. Have you had any experience of a patient after you have certified the case and it has been received into an asylum—have you ever been a visitor?—No.

2295. You have nothing to do with visiting?—No.

2296. Then your evidence is simply confined to your experience in connection with the admission of patients?—Yes.

2297. Have you had any relations with the Board of Control at any time?—No.

2298. Or any experience of their action?—No.

2300. Then your experience is solely confined to the one step you have spoken about?—Yes.

2301. Can you give us any figure as to the cost to the public of the certification of a pauper lunatic—can you tell us what it costs?—No, I cannot. Do you mean the proceedings on the one day they are certified?

2302. There is the expense of the medical man who certifies; there is the expense of the transport, the vehicle or motor which brings the man to you?—Yes, and the proportion of the salary of the relieving officer and his man, or what not. I cannot tell you that, but I think I could ascertain it for you.

* See Appendix VIII.

22 October, 1924.]

MR. WILLIAM HENRY LORD.

2303. Earl Russell: You might ask the Guardians to let us know what the average cost per head of getting a lunatic into an asylum is?—Yes, you want to know what are the out-of-pockets.

2304. Chairman: Yes, apart from the percentage of any salaries of the officers concerned?—I will try and get that for you.*

Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Lord.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Councillor C. F. SANDERS, called and examined.

2305. Chairman: You are a Justice of the Peace in the City of Cardiff?—Yes.

2306. Were you appointed a Justice of the Peace in 1906?—That is so.

2307. Have you in that capacity from time to time signed orders for the detention of persons of unsound mind?—I have.

2308. I think at first your Bench appointed a limited number of justices as the judicial authority?—That was so.

2309. But latterly you have changed some of the arrangements which formerly existed, as they were found inconvenient because justices were not always available; and for some years past the custom has been adopted of annually appointing all the justices to act as the judicial authority?—That is so.

2310. In point of practice, however, the function of the judicial authority falls, does it not, largely on certain of the magistrates?—On a very few, who happen to be conveniently near.

2311. Have you personally been one who has had a large share of the work?—Yes, a very large share during the last couple of years.

2312. You actually daily pass the workhouse, I think?—That is so. I pass it several times a day.

2313. So that you are pretty nearly always at hand?—I am.

2314. In the course of the past two years have you had something like 300 cases through your hands?—Up to date the number is 333.

2315. Of those 300 odd cases which have come under your cognisance, how many of them were discharged without certification?—Of the 333 cases 58 were discharged without being certified as of unsound mind; but two medical certificates are obtained in each case that the patient may safely be discharged.

2316. I am not sure that "discharged" is the correct word. At any rate, nothing further was done in those cases, and no certificate of insanity was granted?—Quite.

2317. It would be interesting to know on what grounds the proceedings were stopped in the case of those 58 people?—Of course they would not all be for the same reason, but I should say a large proportion of them would be cases of men and sometimes women brought in suffering from the influence of drink—delirium tremens cases, or sometimes the taking of methylated spirits—but there were other cases of severe depression coming on suddenly, and after a little rest in a peaceful place all the evidence passed away.

2318. Will you tell us of the 300 odd cases you have mentioned how many were pauper cases?—A great many of them would not be pauper cases in the ordinary sense of the word; that is to say, they would not be persons who had been paupers.

2319. But in a legal sense were they paupers?—They were paupers in the legal sense, because they would become paupers directly they had been brought within the walls of the workhouse, but they were not certificated as paupers.

2320. But you know pauper patients are treated differently from non-pauper patients?—Yes.

2321. And in the one case you have an application made to you as judicial authority, while in the other you function as a justice of the peace?—Yes, but I have had very little experience of private cases.

2322. Then the cases you have told us about must have been cases in which you were acting as a justice of the peace and not as a judicial authority?—Well, I do not know quite the distinction. The procedure is this, that persons finding a relative suffering mentally, either through their own medical man or by themselves, draw the attention of the relieving officer, charged with that special duty, to the case.

2323. If those cases come to you through the relieving officer we know what class you mean?—They do. I find them in the wards of the workhouse which have been set apart for the purpose entirely.

2324. You first come into contact with a case, do you, by the relieving officer bringing it to your notice?—That is so.

2325. And you have to see the person in question?—I do.

2326. Is the person brought to your house?—No, I go to the receiving wards and usually I find some three or four persons, sometimes half a dozen.

2327. Have these persons been taken by the relieving officer to the ward in the workhouse?—Yes.

2328. And you are asked to come there and see them?—Yes.

2329. By that time, has any medical man seen them?—Sometimes, but not always.

2330. Do you yourself call in a medical practitioner?—I do not, frankly, in each case. I have inquired what is the usual practice and I find what is done is that generally the family medical man gives one of the certificates, the relieving officer chooses sometimes the resident medical officer of the workhouse, sometimes he calls in a medical practitioner who happens to be conveniently near. I have discussed with him the principles on which they have proceeded and I sanction the procedure, so that in a sense I may be said to have chosen the method by which the thing should be done.

2331. When you arrive at the ward does the medical practitioner attend you?—Not usually. I frequently see the resident medical officer of the workhouse, and I have sometimes seen others.

2332. Has any medical man left a certificate for your consideration?—Not always before I see the patient, but I always see the certificate before I sign the order.

2333. If the doctor is not there when you arrive and there is no certificate, you cannot very well go on, can you?—I make my own observations and await the production of the certificate.

2334. Do you see any of the relatives of the person before you?—Occasionally, but not usually. Making a rough guess, I should say in 19 cases out of 20 a signed statement of a relative is put before me.

2335. But that is not obligatory, is it?—I do not understand it to be obligatory, but that is one of the methods by which information can come, and it is surely a very obvious method.

2336. In Cardiff do you make use of Section 13 of the Act of 1890?—Yes, I think, very largely.

2337. It has a curious feature, has it not, in that a person dealt with under Section 13 becomes technically a pauper?—Yes, I presume that is so.

2338. Although Section 13 relates to persons who are not paupers, the result of the utilisation of Section 13 is to convert them for the time being into legal paupers?—I understand it has technically that effect, but I do not think anything turns on that in our practice in Cardiff.

* See Appendix IX.

22 October, 1924.]

COUNCILLOR C. F. SANDERS.

2339. Still the person would be taken to a workhouse?—Yes. A great many of these become paupers afterwards, when they reach the asylum and become chargeable to the Union.

2340. And they become chargeable in consequence of their detention?—Yes.

2341. But they have not been previously persons chargeable to the rates?—Quite so.

2342. Do you think it is desirable that the workhouse should be utilised as the clearing house for these cases?—I cannot think of a better way. It is technically part of the workhouse. But the building itself is quite separate from the rest of the buildings, and except that you go in at the front gate there is no association with the workhouse at all.

2343. What provision have you in the workhouse for mental cases?—In each of the wards there are six or eight beds for females in the one building and males in the other; there are padded rooms in connection with them and there are specially appointed attendants night and day, male and female, and I think the whole thing is worked as reasonably and as effectively as possible.

2344. Have you patients there who are being permanently detained in the workhouse?—Who have previously been permanently detained—yes—a proportion of them come in in that way. They are usually senile cases.

2345. If one visited such wards, would one find a few cases waiting your visit for certification?—I am not quite certain whether we are on the same point exactly.

2346. What I want to know really is whom should we find in the ward in the mental department?—In the special receiving wards you would find only cases which have been brought in for observation, whether they were brought some of them from other parts of the workhouse or from outside. They are not detained there beyond three or four days.

2347. They are there under the three days' rule or possibly under the 14 days' rule?—Possibly, but I should think very rarely are they detained beyond three days.

2348. This accommodation is distinct, is it, from the accommodation which you have in the workhouse for chronic cases which are intended to be detained permanently?—The chronic cases are dealt with at another workhouse two miles distant.

2349. Then these temporary wards are really utilised by you as reception and observation premises? Nothing else.

2350. And also as a place where the justices attend for the purpose of certifying?—That is so.

2351. Do you often in practice, in the cases brought before you, find that any large number of the people are discharged by you at once when you see them?—The figure I have given shows the number that have been discharged.

2352. Does that number of 58 relate to persons who, having been brought in, have within the three days recovered or shown that they ought no longer to be detained?—Yes, that is so—the doctors are satisfied.

2353. And you are accordingly not asked to make an order in those cases?—That is so.

2354. You do not intervene in those cases, do you?—I form my own opinion, and I hear also what the doctor says, and I have mentioned in my précis one instance where I did hesitate to discharge a patient on the advice of the doctors.

2355. You find three or four cases brought before you and in one case a doctor said, "He has pretty well recovered," but you have to deal with the case yourself?—Quite, only I could not do anything without the certificate of the medical man; I could not make an order. But in the one case to which I allude it had been brought to my notice that the patient had shown a suicidal tendency and a disposition to do harm to other people, and I was very reluctant to say that that man might go. The medical certificates were put before me, one by the family doctor, and I said, "It is quite clear the family want him to be discharged, but I do not think it is quite good enough to say that this medical certificate shows that the patient with such tendencies should be allowed to go out in the care of his relatives." I questioned the other medical man and he said there was a little doubt; he was not prepared to certify and would like the case to be put under observation a little longer; and I said to the relieving officer, "I do not think I could take the responsibility of allowing this man to go; would you like to call in another justice?" He said "No," and I said, "Very well, I want the opinions of two other medical men," and I named two other medical men who I knew would give an opinion, and I was relieved to find that all the four medical men took the same view; and thought that the man, who had been in a dangerous condition arising from delirium tremens, was likely to recover, and he did recover from that condition and he was discharged ultimately.

2356. I quite see from that that yours is a very responsible duty?—It is.

2357. And that was a typical case where you in your judicial capacity were puzzled by the facts, but you had no difficulty in getting the necessary skilled assistance to enable you to make up your mind?—Quite so.

2358. Of course, if anything had gone wrong in that case, after you had disagreed and you had discharged the man, you would have felt a certain amount of responsibility?—Yes. I asked the relieving officer if those certificates would be filed so that they could be produced at any time.

2359. But in this large experience you have had, have you found that there are many cases which give you any difficulty?—Practically none, but in saying that, I should like to add at the same time that I do not think a justice of the peace could make up his mind on his own observation as to whether a patient should be detained or not. I am bound to rely on the certificate of the medical men. Usually as the patients lie in bed, three or four of them might be very quiet; they will show signs of depression sometimes and stubbornness sometimes, and one cannot get an observation from them at all; so that it is very difficult indeed to form a judgment on what one sees, and I should imagine the medical officer has to take means which I should not like to adopt in order to draw from the patient evidence of the condition of his mind.

2360. Do you try to engage them in conversation?—I do frequently, but a doctor can concentrate on certain points and when he has discovered the point on which they are insane, he can deal with them better.

2361. What have you in mind when you talk about the medical man adopting methods that you would not like to adopt?—Well, I presume they will have to be prompted by information supplied to them and examine the patient on certain questions.

2362. You mean they would have to resort to other sources of information?—I mean that I should not like to have to put the patient to the trouble of extracting from him, or her, the information which would be necessary to enable me to form an independent judgment, even if a layman could form such a judgment.

2363. When you talk to them do you direct your attention particularly to the matters which are referred to in the medical certificate?—I do not usually.

2364. How do you set about your task?—I do not understand it to be my task—I may be wrong—but I have never understood it to be my task to examine a patient and satisfy myself from my own observation as to whether he is sane or insane. I think it is more my duty to rely on the certificate of the medical officer and the other information which is brought to me.

2265. But are not you reducing the value of the personal interview very much in that way? We have been told that the personal interview is a very great safeguard?—It may be slightly reducing its value, but I should say, judging from my own experience, that there is very little danger on any such ground as that, and I should be very much surprised indeed to find that any person had been committed to our Mental Hospital at Cardiff without due cause.

2266. You are speaking, of course, always of what we call the pauper case?—I am speaking of the cases that come under my observation—technically pauper cases—and, of course, very largely persons brought from poor homes.

2268. Is the absence of doubt in your experience due to the fact that the cases you have had to deal with are all more or less obvious cases?—Most of them.

2269. You do not seem to have had any experience of border line cases, except the one you have told us about?—Quite. I think I have had other border line cases, as is evidenced by the fact that 58 people have been allowed to go.

2270. But they might not be border line cases. The cases, I mean, are cases which have been brought in for detention as distinct from cases arising from a bout of drinking?—I should not think any cases have come under my observation otherwise than as cases suitable for temporary detention.

2272. And you have accordingly no difficulty in designating the asylum to which any particular case is to be sent?—No, no difficulty at all.

2273. When the patient has been certified and removed to a public asylum at Cardiff, have you personally taken part in the visiting?—Yes, some years ago. Before I became a magistrate I was a member of the board of guardians, and as such I made visits.

2274. And you visited in your capacity as a guardian?—Yes, and for four or five years I was Deputy-Chairman of the Mental Hospital Committee and I visited in that capacity.

2275. Is there any difference between the visit of a guardian and the visit of the visiting committee—you have done both, I understand?—Yes. I could not say that there is as to the visitation; but, of course, the duties of the committee are wider than those of the visiting guardians.

2276. What is the concern of the guardians when they visit a hospital?—To see that the hospital is in all respects satisfactory, that the patients are being well-treated and well-fed, to hear any complaints of patients who wish to make complaints, and to form their own conclusions upon such complaints, and to report such to the superintendent medical officer.

2277. That is a description which might almost equally well fit the functions of the visiting committee?—Quite.

2278. But has not the visiting committee a more responsible part to play; theirs is a more responsible visit, is it not?—Well, they deal with a great number of details as to which the guardians would not be responsible.

2279. Are not the guardians more concerned with the persons who administer the Poor Law and see that everything is going on all right in the institution to which their paupers are sent?—That is so.

2280. Have they any individual responsibility with regard to the detention of the persons there?—No.

2281. Of course, the fewer the people chargeable the better from the guardians' point of view?—Quite, but I do not think that affects them in their action at all.

2282. As a member of the visiting committee, on the other hand, have you seen individual patients and gone into their cases with them?—Only when some individual has stepped forward and wished to make a complaint or a suggestion (which has happened to me on numerous occasions) that they were all right, that the other people should be kept there but that there is no reason why they should be. I do not think I have visited the hospital without somebody saying something of that kind, and on my mentioning the matter to the superintendent medical officer, I was very speedily satisfied either that the case was under observation with a view to discharge, or that there were very good reasons for the detention.

2283. In such a case would you have a private conversation with the patient who was complaining?—Yes.

2284. What sort of opportunity would you give to a patient of discussing his case with you?—I always allowed him to say what he wished to say. It never took very long, because what they had to say usually was very simple: "I am all right; I understand everything."

2285. Would you have such a conversation in private, or would it be in the ward as you were passing through?—It would be in the ward, but not in any sense interfered with by other persons.

2286. Have you ever been asked by a patient for a private interview?—No, never.

2287. In the frequent instances where a patient has said he is quite sane and ought not to be there, what steps have you taken to inquire into his treatment?—I have usually immediately mentioned the matter to the medical officer, and I remember one case particularly which I mentioned to the doctor, and he said, "Oh, yes, that man is all right, and there is only one question on which he is not right; I will ask him now," and he asked him, "Who is the King of England?" and the patient replied, "I am," and that was the one point on which he was wrong.

2288. In your experience in more than one capacity, as a certifying justice, as a guardian, as a member of the visiting committee, of which you were Deputy-Chairman, you have been brought into contact in Cardiff with the administration of the Lunacy law in relation to paupers?—Yes, and in some other places.

2289. Have you any suggestions to make to us as to the necessity for further safeguards with regard to the personal liberty of the subject?—No, I do not think anything arising out of my experience points in that direction.

2290. Are you satisfied with the powers you possess at the present moment, as enabling you to protect the public and protect afflicted persons against undue detention?—I have never seen anything which would suggest to me that further protection is necessary.

2291. We may take it, however, that your evidence does not relate to the private patient, and consequently has no relation to licensed houses and other institutions where paupers are not received?—I have only one experience of a licensed house at all, and that was unfortunately when I had to take a friend of my own there, and he died within a few days, so that my experience is practically nothing.

2292. So you have no experience with regard to the private patient?—None, except as to certifying in a very few cases.

2293. Then you have no experience of cases where it might be to the pecuniary interest of persons to have patients detained?—No.

2294. And has the only consideration before you in the cases you have dealt with been the question of what was the best to be done for the unhappy person?—Yes.

2295. Have you found the same spirit animating the other persons concerned with you in the discharge of these duties?—I have. I have never seen any variation from that spirit at all.

2296. Earl Russell: I understood you to say that when you interview an alleged lunatic whom the relieving officer has brought to your notice, you consider it is not your task to form an independent judgment as to his sanity or insanity?—Not exactly that; I do all I can to form an independent judgment, but I have not conceived it to be my duty, so to speak, to probe the wound, to stir up anything that is latent at the moment.

2397. I can quite understand the perfectly natural feeling that you would not have the capacity or the knowledge of the medical man to investigate that particular question, but you do feel, as the justice who stands between him and the law and his liberty, that you have to satisfy yourself that he is a proper case?—Quite.

2398. And you do that to some extent, do you not, by making up your mind that the person is not sane?—I do that by satisfying myself that there is nothing I can see that is at all out of harmony with the certificate or certificates of the medical man or men which have been produced to me.

2400. Apart from those cases where you say nothing beyond a few conventional words, and the lunatic says nothing, do you have any cases in which something more might be gained by the interview; or does it amount to this—that you sign the papers without practically seeing him?—Yes, I see the depression or moroseness, frequently, which seems to me to corroborate the medical testimony and the statements of friends.

2401. It really amounts to this, does it not, that although you do not try to confirm the medical judgment you really do try to satisfy yourself that the man is a proper case for detention?—Certainly.

2402. And to that extent you apply an open mind to the matter, apart from the certificate?—Yes.

2403. Did you hear the evidence given by Mr. Lord?—Only partly.

2404. You see nearly all your patients, I understand, in the reception wards of the workhouse?—That is so.

2405. The practice, we were told, adopted by Mr. Lord, was that the alleged lunatic was brought by the relieving officer to the justice, and was generally seen by him in a cab?—Well, I have had no such experience at all.

2406. And that in Birmingham, apparently, they do not use the workhouse as a place for detention, or a place in which the justice can visit the patient, while in Cardiff you almost invariably do?—Always, practically.

2407. Then there is another difference between you—you have told us that in 19 cases out of 20 you have a written statement from relatives or friends as to what they know about the patient?—Yes.

2408. In Birmingham we understand inquiry is not very often made as to whether there are any relatives or friends at all?—I have not had occasion to make inquiry, because the facts are put before me in the forms to which the Chairman alluded in his examination; and they are always produced, giving full particulars, and those come under my observation.

2409. Then, in fact, there is a different practice with different relieving officers—one takes statements from relatives and friends, and the other, whether he takes them or not, does not put them before the justices. Do you think it desirable that the immediate relatives of a patient should know that he is likely to be certified before such a thing happens?—I think they always do.

2410. But do you think it is right they should know?—I think they should know of the proceedings, and I have no doubt they do.

2411. So that they might have an opportunity of objecting?—Yes, quite, but I think as a rule the proceedings are taken at the desire of the relatives, and often they are taken very reluctantly. There is one point on which I have not said what I wanted to say, and that is I am afraid that in a large number of cases these proceedings are delayed too long. I had a case only a fortnight ago of a woman, where the information from the relatives was that there had been a change in her condition for the past nine months, and it seemed to me to be a case in which earlier treatment would have been desirable. I have an impression, too, that earlier treatment of persons might take place at a stage before certification, and that in certain cases treatment might be remedial; and I am glad to know that some such work is being done in our Royal Infirmary at Cardiff, where Lieut.-Colonel Goodall, the Medical Superintendent of our hospital at Whitchurch, is attending, I think, weekly, a clinic, quite apart from his other duties, seeing cases of nervous breakdown and that kind of thing, with the object of remedial measures being taken.

2412. In uncertified cases?—Yes.

2413. I do not think the Commission differs from you at all in the opinion that probably in the majority of those cases relatives and friends feel that treatment is necessary, but what we feel anxious about is the possible case in which a patient ought not to be certified and an opportunity ought to be given to the relatives to say so—that is what we have in mind, and that something might be done in that direction. Do you think it desirable that the relatives should know what is going on?—Yes, and I have no doubt that they do.

2414. Chairman: If there are any relatives; but there must be many cases where a lunatic is found wandering at large?—Yes, there are a few cases where there are no relatives at all, and where the antecedents of the patient cannot be discovered.

2415. Earl Russell: I suppose in a seaport particularly you have cases where no relatives are discoverable?—Quite, but they are rather rare.

2416. If a relative desired to be present when you are seeing a patient, or to see you at the same time, would there be any difficulty about that?—None whatever. They have free access, and I do sometimes see them.

2417. I was rather struck by one thing you said, that you found patients lying in bed—are these people always in bed when you see them?—Practically always, unless they are so violent that they are in a padded room.

2418. That is, of course, very different from the cases we have heard of which were seen in a cab?—I can only speak, of course, of Cardiff, and our experience there. I have understood from our relieving officers that in outside parishes a different course has to be adopted altogether, and in the country a patient has to be taken to a justice of the peace, but in Cardiff our workhouse is fairly centrally situated and there is no difficulty whatever of access.

2419. Can you tell us a little more about the clinic which you mentioned?—It has been opened within the last two or three years, I think. I made some inquiry about it from the Secretary of the Infirmary, and he gave me the number of cases, I think it was 56, which had been treated there within the last 12 months.

2420. It is a voluntary charitable institution, I suppose?—That is so.

2421. It is not rate-aided, I mean?—Well, Cardiff does make a contribution to it out of the rates, but it is supported by voluntary contributions. I think it would very greatly help the Commission, if I might suggest it, that if Lieut.-Colonel Goodall has not already given evidence he should be invited to do so.

2422. Chairman: I have just been told by our Secretary that Colonel Goodall is coming to give evidence, so that we shall have the advantage of his views?—I think he would be a valuable witness.

2423. Earl Russell: Your workhouse at Cardiff, I understand, is very well fitted up for the purpose of a temporary observation ward and a reception ward for these cases?—Rooms have been built on purpose.

2424. Would you think it an advantage to have anything like a sort of clearing-house, as has been mentioned—a place which was not exactly a workhouse and not an asylum, where patients could be confined, say, for a month or two months?—The idea came to me first when I heard the question asked just now. I asked myself then whether it was desirable, and I can quite believe that there are some cases in which it would be desirable, but I should not say, arising out of my experience, that anything would suggest itself to me as showing that it would be worth while, dealing with cases as we do in Cardiff, to set up a new and separate institution for that purpose.

2425. You do not think you would be able to get rid of a sufficient number of cases without certification at all?—I do not think so; I think a considerable number of such cases are now sent by us to the workhouse at Ely, a place two miles away, and they can easily be discharged from there. It is regarded as a sort of auxiliary institution for cases which are not discharged and not likely to recover, and they are mostly cases of aged people.

2426. You have, in fact, succeeded in getting rid of 58 people out of 333 without certification?—Yes. I am not adopting your language, "getting rid," but I mean to say they have been brought there for observation, and the observation has resulted in their discharge.

2427. So that those 58 people have never been certified?—Quite.

2428. That is a successful percentage?—Well, I think it shows the desirability of that process.

2429. And as carried on at Cardiff it seems to work well?—It does.

2430. Sir Thomas Hutchison: How long do these patients remain in the reception house?—I should say rarely more than three days.

2431. But a few remain more than three days?—Well, it is hardly right to say a few, because they are very rare.

2432. Is there a resident medical officer attached to that building?—Yes.

2433. Whose sole duty it is to attend to that work?—No, not to that work only; he has to attend to the whole building.

2434. How far are the buildings apart from each other?—They are quite adjacent—very near.

2435. So that the medical officer who looks after the workhouse generally can quite well keep an eye on the place?—Perfectly well.

2436. Mrs. Mathew: Can you tell us the cost of these observation cases?—No.

2437. I was wondering whether the cost would be any more than the cost in the case of pauper lunatics?—I do not think there would be any special cost, except that of the day and night attendants in each of the wards, male and female. The wages of those persons, I should think, would be the only extra cost.

2438. There would be no different food?—No, I do not think there is any special treatment of that kind, unless the doctor ordered something. I should think more usually the patients would refuse food.

2439. Then special food is given, though often they refuse food. Were the 56 cases you refer to at the clinic discharged cases, or recurring cases?—As far as I understand they are cases of nervous breakdown, where the friends have some reason to fear that things may tend in the direction of mental instability. But I think as you are going to have Colonel Goodall here he might perhaps deal with that better than I can.

2440. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to the 58 cases which were discharged out of the 300 odd, can you tell me what proportion of those cases were cases of delirium tremens?—I am not able to give you an answer now, but I might ascertain, if it is desired; I should think a large number would be cases, not exactly of delirium tremens, but something bordering upon it—cases of excessive drinking.

2441. There are cases of alcoholic insanity, but would you be inclined to include under that class cases of delirium tremens?—No, I think the action which has been taken at Cardiff shows that we do not include it.

2442. Chairman: Can you help us by getting us that figure?—I will ascertain from the relieving officer and send to the Secretary under the various headings exactly what takes place.

2443. Sir David Drummond: Are private patients sent to the same institution, the workhouse, which you have spoken about?—No, not the strictly private patients. What happens in Cardiff would be this: they are allowed to go through this place and then they are treated as private patients.

2444. They go for three days to the institution you have described, do you mean that?—Yes, probably—I mean persons who are quite willing to pay for the treatment of their friends will allow them to go through that process, and when they arrive at the mental hospital they ask that they shall be treated as private patients. There is very little difference in the treatment, except that they pay.

2445. When you refer to the mental hospital, are you speaking of the workhouse?—No, I am speaking of the asylum, but we always call it the mental hospital.

2446. Chairman: The point one wants to be satisfied on is this: In the case of those patients who ultimately become paying patients in the asylum, do their people resent their reaching the asylum through the avenue of a workhouse?—Probably in some cases they do, and they have them sent to another institution; but, as I say, there are some people who are quite willing to allow them to go through the same process.

2447. Because there is something in sentiment, and what one knows as workhouse taint?—I think that that kind of feeling is dying out at Cardiff, because we have a large workhouse hospital, and people are coming to the conclusion that it is better to allow their friends to be put there.

2448. Thank you very much.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Dr. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., Medical Superintendent of Lambeth Infirmary, called and examined.

2449. Chairman: Dr. Baly, are you the medical superintendent of the Lambeth Infirmary?—I am.

2450. I think you have appreciated that, under the terms of our remit, we desire to have the advantage of your evidence on the particular aspect of lunacy administration which falls within your province?—Yes.

2451. You have been good enough to place before us in the form of a précis your experience and your suggestions?—Yes.

2452. Now do I understand that the hospital under your charge is a Poor Law institution?—Yes.

2453. Is the institution entirely devoted to dealing with rate-aided patients?—Yes.

2454. And is it an institution devoted entirely to persons who are suffering from ailments?—Yes.

2455. From mental ailments or from all sorts of ailments?—All sorts of ailments.

2456. Then it is not an institution associated with a workhouse as the ordinary person understands it?—No, the workhouse has been abolished.

2457. So that it is a specialised institution for dealing with the destitute who are also afflicted?—Yes, the sick and infirm.

2458. Is there no workhouse accommodation at all associated with it?—There is none in Lambeth; all the workhouse inmates are boarded out.

2459. Your work is concerned not merely with the insane destitute, but with the destitute who are suffering from any form of ailment or disability?—Yes.

2460. Before we come to the detail of your evidence will you first give us a description of your institution?—There are about 1,500 beds altogether; 1,000 of them are for sick patients and the remainder for the infirm.

2461. How many wards have you?—Somewhere about 30, I think.

2462. What is the character of the building; are you in detached blocks?—There are two buildings; there was the original infirmary which had to deal with the sick and the institution which was called an infirm workhouse. The infirmity of those in the infirm workhouse has been steadily rising so that the guardians have decided to amalgamate the two buildings. Our reason for the amalgamation was that there was not sufficient room for the sick; the sick part of the institution was very much overcrowded, and in order to get more room for the sick they amalgamated the adjoining building and made one so-called hospital.

2463. Then putting aside for a moment the special case of the insane rate-aided patient, do the patients come into your infirmary from the various workhouses throughout the City?—No; they are supposed all to come in from Lambeth; but, of course, we have to take in patients if they are urgently in need of treatment wherever they come from, if they come to our doors.

2464. But primarily you treat people from your own parish of Lambeth?—Yes.

2465. Are they brought to you from their houses?—Yes.

2466. And in some instances are they brought from the workhouse properly, so-called?—Yes, they may be.

2467. Then is the infirmary under your charge the place to which are brought all persons who are supposed to be insane and are dealt with under Section 20 of the Lunacy Act?—Yes.

2468. Have you special accommodation set apart for this class of case?—Yes.

2470. One ward with 11 beds for men and four wards with 50 beds for women?—Yes.

2471. As far as the men are concerned the accommodation seems to be very limited?—It is very bad indeed, but I am hoping to get that put right this year possibly, or certainly early next year.

2472. It seems to be limited in extent and does not enable you to effect any classification of the patients?—None at all.

2473. Now will you tell us next the procedure under which patients come into these male and female wards under your charge?—The majority are admitted on orders issued by a relieving officer in lunacy whose sole duty is to deal with mental cases.

2474. So they come before you really through the medium of the relieving officer?—Yes; they are also brought there through the medium of the police.

2475. Cases off the streets, I suppose?—Yes; and a certain number are transferred from the ordinary wards of the hospital to the observation ward.

2476. So that really your first contact in the mental wards arises either through the relieving officer bringing in the patient or through the police bringing in the patient from the streets, some emergency case, or through patients being transferred from the sick wards to the mental wards?—Yes.

2477. Does that exhaust the methods by which they reach you?—Yes.

2478. Now will you tell us how you yourself personally first come in contact with a patient who is brought to your institution?—I see the case myself, the morning after admission.

2479. What happens to the patient when he is brought in?—He is taken to the receiving ward and examined by one of my assistants.

2480. That is a separate ward from the four female and one male wards?—Yes.

2481. Is the receiving ward for male patients only?—All patients come to that ward.

2482. What happens to him there?—He is examined by one of my assistants, purely from the physical point of view, and also to make notes which are required by the Board of Control as to whether the patient has been damaged or has received injuries before admission.

2483. We are familiar with that examination. Then having been subjected to that medical examination by one of your assistants, what happens to him next?—He is transferred to one of the observation wards.

2484. What are the observation wards?—The observation wards are the ones I have mentioned.

2485. If the case is violent, what happens?—If the case is very violent, the patient would probably have to be confined to a padded room; that is the usual form of restraint used; we very rarely use a straight jacket now; but that of course cannot be done without a special order of the medical officer.

2486. So that a violent case is dealt with specially?—Yes.

2487. In the normal case the patient is put to bed simply in one of the wards you have described?—Yes.

2488. And then next morning you see him or her for the first time?—Yes.

2489. Now what do you do next? We are anxious to get a practical description of this system?—I examine the patient; if it is obvious that the patient is suffering from some serious mental disorder, I take steps myself to endeavour to have the patient removed from the observation ward to a mental hospital at the earliest possible moment, especially in the case of the male patients, because the accommodation is so bad.

2490. I suppose that the cases that come under your observation will range through practically every degree of intensity?—Yes.

2491. From slight cases to the gravest cases?—Yes.

2492. Then do you find that some cases present no difficulty at all—I mean that they are obvious cases of insanity?—Quite obvious some of them; I do not think they are in the majority; it is a comparatively small number in which it is obvious at first sight that they are suffering from some serious degree of mental disorder.

2493. I suppose experience such as you possess enables you to diagnose the situation rapidly?—Generally, yes.

2494. Now suppose, on the other hand, the case is not so obvious a one what is your next step?—It depends on when the magistrate visits. In Lambeth there are so many cases to be dealt with that most of the magistrates who attend prefer to come on fixed days of the week.

2495. That will lead us to the point at which you are brought into contact with the legal side of the matter. You make your examination first of all, and make up your mind as to the class of case you have to deal with?—Yes.

2496. Then is the next thing the intervention of the magistrate?—Yes.

2497. In Lambeth I think the duties of relieving officer have been specially delegated to one man?—Yes.

2498. As we know under the Statute that can be done. You will accordingly be quite familiar with the officer who brings the patients to you?—Yes.

2499. Is he a person of experience?—The present holder of the office has been there I should think quite 10 years, or more than 10 years.

2500. Have you confidence in his discretion?—Yes, I think he is very careful.

2501. We have heard in the course of the evidence before us here that the relieving officer seems to have a considerable amount of what one might call the initial responsibility, when he is called on to judge whether the case is one that he should bring to you or not?—Yes, I know that our relieving officer always tries if he can to get a medical certificate even before he will move; I know he does not like removing a patient from a home unless he can get some kind of medical certificate to the effect that the patient should be admitted.

2502. I think he is as it happens a married man?—Yes.

2503. And his wife has the duty of assisting him?—Yes.

2504. Of course in his case he operates under Section 20 of the Act, does he not?—Yes, in nearly every case—not always.

2505. As we know, his duty is to communicate with the magistrate within three days, apprising him of the case and setting in motion the machinery for dealing with it?—Yes.

2506. But do you find that in Lambeth it is desirable to arrange for regular visits from the magistrates?—Yes, I find it is very much more convenient if a magistrate will do that.

2507. When do they attend?—They attend on two days a week—their own choice.

2508. Do the same magistrates attend?—They change monthly; they are on a rota of a month each.

2509. Of course these justices are not “judicial authorities” under the Act. They come under the words “any justice of the peace having jurisdiction in the district may act”?—I think there is a special list of magistrates who are entitled to act in this capacity; I do not think it is “any magistrate,” because I know I am supplied with a list.

Lord Eustace Percy: It is Sub-section (1) of Section 13.

2510. Chairman: Thank you. What I am really concerned in is that these justices who co-operate with you do not require to be a “judicial authority” within the meaning of the Statute, do they?—I do not think so; but I do not think any justice of the peace can be called. I think I am right. I know I have a list; and a list is provided annually of the justices who can be called.

2511. Under Section 13 of the Act to which Lord Eustace Percy has drawn attention cases brought in would have to be dealt with by a judicial authority, but you are dealing for the moment with Section 20?—Yes; I was not aware of that fact.

2512. And there I think any magistrate who has jurisdiction within your territory can operate. Of course, it is for the justices to make arrangements between themselves as they please, and with you they have a system of monthly attendance?—Yes, they have a rota which is settled annually.

2513. And how many justices attend at one time?—One justice.

2514. Two days a week?—Yes, and at other times, if necessary. If I have an urgent case I ask the relieving officer to get a magistrate at once.

2515. Earl Russell: That is chiefly to enable you to clear your ward?—Yes, to remove the dangerous people from the ward as soon as possible, because it is so bad for the other patients that they should remain.

2516. Chairman: Now before we go further into that, it might be useful to know the extent of your work. Take the year to the 31st of March, 1924, for which you have statistics. How many persons were brought before the magistrates in your mental department during that year?—615.

2517. And we might just get on the note the history of those 615 cases. Of those how many were admitted on orders under Section 20 of the Act?—453.

2518. And of those were 363 brought to you by the relieving officer and 90 by the police?—Yes.

2519. Then as regards the balance of cases were 74 transferred to the mental department from the general wards of the infirmary?—Yes.

2520. And then 88, I think, were dealt with under Section 24?—Yes.

2521. Section 24 is the section under which patients may remain for a longer period in the Poor Law infirmary?—Yes.

2522. I understand that under the administration at present in operation, in some cases there are lunatics in workhouses?—Yes.

2523. But in London I understand a discrimination is made and you have wards set apart for the insane?—Yes. There are none in my infirmary. All those dealt with under Section 24 are transferred to Tooting Bec, a special institution which, I believe, is technically a workhouse; it is for harmless mental cases.

2525. And the patients from your parish reach you in the way you have described. We know how you are first brought into contact with them, and we have brought ourselves up to the point where the magistrate intervenes, and we have paused there to see how many people there are who come under your cognisance. It is 615 in all; that means to say there are nearly two a day—not quite so many?—Yes, nearly.

2526. Then as regards those who reach you under Section 20 through the relieving officer or the police, how are they disposed of; that is to say, we have 453 to account for. How did you dispose of them in that year?—193 of them were transferred to mental hospitals.

2528. Then in how many cases were orders obtained but allowed to lapse?—In 111 cases.

2529. Then lastly was the balance of 149 discharged or transferred to the general wards?—Yes.

2530. Now with regard to the 111 patients, I am not quite sure I understand what is meant by a person being certified but the order being allowed to lapse?—There is no means under the Act of remanding a case; so, if the magistrate comes and I am not in a position to give a definite opinion as to whether they are fit persons to be transferred to a mental hospital or not, the only means by which I can keep them is to say that the patient is of unsound mind, which is probably quite correct, and ask the magistrate to suspend his order of removal. That means to say that he has to give me an order to transfer the patient to a mental hospital; he suspends the order under Section 21. I think it is.

2531. We will explore with you a little later if we may the drawbacks of the present rigidity of the system which you are going to tell us about. You find a certain embarrassment in the statutory time table in dealing with the patient; certain things have to be done within a certain time, but you do not find that your cases accommodate themselves to that calendar. We will certainly get some evidence from you upon that a little later on. Meantime we may reserve that, in order to get the figures further analysed. With regard to the cases transferred to the mental hospitals, can you give us an account of them?—There were 74 who were transferred from the general wards of the infirmary through the observation wards and then sent on to mental hospitals.

2532. That is to say, 74 were people already in your hands as sick patients, passed through the mental department, were certified, and reached ultimately the public asylum?—Yes.

2533. Then next with regard to 88 of those cases?—They were transferred to Tooting Bec. I must make it clear that there is a duplication there. Some of those 88 patients may originally have been admitted under Section 20, either certified and the order allowed to lapse, and then re-certified for Tooting Bec, so that some of those people have been counted twice really.

2534. And a small number were transferred to private mental hospitals?—Yes, there were five.

2535. That gives us a total of 193—is that right?—Yes.

2536. When did you first receive your appointment, Dr. Baly?—In 1911.

2537. So that you have had 13 years' experience?—Yes.

2538. Have the cases increased in number during your period of office?—Yes, they have increased very considerably.

2539. I think when you first started the average annually dealt with was 434?—Yes.

2540. That is excluding the cases dealt with under Section 24?—Yes.

2541. Whilst last year the figure had risen to 527?—Yes.

2542. What inference do you draw from that increase?—I think it is due to the more rigid rule that patients should not be brought into the infirmary against their will. At the time when I was appointed, it was not at all an uncommon practice to bring patients into the infirmary against their will without invoking the Lunacy Acts, which is quite illegal to my mind; so that by more rigid instructions to the officials, these patients could not be brought in without invoking the Lunacy Acts.

2543. Take the figure 434 for 1911. Do you mean that at that time there may have been cases which strictly ought to have been dealt with as mental cases under proper procedure, but simply went to swell the statistics of your ordinary hospital?—Yes. To give the best example I can, old people who are very unwilling to leave their homes remained in their homes until the neighbours complained of their neglecting themselves, and then the relieving officer was called in, a doctor went and saw the patient and had the patient removed to the infirmary, and the patient was removed to the infirmary whether he liked it or whether he did not; whereas now, if the friends want the patient removed and the private doctor wants the patient removed, but the patient objects, then, unless they can get the relieving officer to act, the patient ought not to be removed if he wishes to stay at home.

2544. That class of case would formerly have been dealt with simply as a sick case?—Yes.

2545. Now that class of case is dealt with by being brought within the provisions of the Lunacy Acts?—Yes, a very considerable number of those as soon as they are in the infirmary are quite satisfied. They do not like leaving their homes, but once they are in the infirmary they are quite content to remain. Therefore they are brought before the magistrate, having been brought in against their will, and released—sent to an ordinary ward and treated as a sick patient.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2546. Earl Russell: Would that be part of your "order allowed to lapse"?—It may be either an order allowed to lapse or else never made.

2547. Chairman: But you desire to have some legal sanction for the removal of these people?—Yes.

2548. Formerly you simply removed them without any legal sanction?—Exactly.

2550. Sir David Drummond: It depends upon whether there is sufficient accommodation?—Yes, if they are not removed, I think they might be prosecuted under certain circumstances.

2551. Chairman: Of course there has been in the period in question an increase in population?—Yes.

2552. And that might account, might it not, for a certain number of additional cases?—Yes, it might. I think the bulk of the increase is due to the more rigid enforcement of the Act.

2553. Is one of the difficulties that you have experienced in practice that there are cases, such as you have described, of aged persons who ought to be removed from their homes because of the circumstances in which they are placed, and that there is no existing machinery for doing that unless you invoke the Lunacy Acts?—Yes.

2554. On the other hand, are some of those cases cases which you could not certify as lunatics?—Yes, quite rational.

2555. Does it not seem rather a curious procedure to utilise statutes intended for one purpose in order to achieve another purpose?—Yes; I mean they are rational when I see them. I do not know whether you would consider it rational for a patient to remain in a home when she is too feeble to look after herself and becomes verminous and filthy. As district medical officer, I have been into these homes and have seen the most unutterable filth and the patient refuses to move—yet she is quite incapable of looking after herself. If you see them before they come in they are not behaving rationally, but after they have come in and have been cleaned and have settled down they are perfectly normal.

2556. It may be, however, that that case should be dealt with by special legislation, because the Lunacy Acts are intended to deal with the actually insane person, as you are aware?—Yes, quite.

2557. But you have found in practice that the only way to deal with the cases, which you say you would not medically regard as insane although they may be abnormal or almost pathological, is to invoke the machinery of the Lunacy Acts and then to discard it when you have got them into your hands?—Yes, that is exactly what we do.

2558. I think we need to consider that aspect of the case. Do you find that is a frequent experience?—It is not at all infrequent.

2559. Of course you may have persons who are incapable of looking after themselves or of looking after their affairs who are not technically insane, may you not?—Yes.

2560. Does that occur most commonly in cases of senility?—Yes.

2561. In the case of some person living alone in squalid circumstances?—Yes.

2562. But who declines to enter your infirmary?—Yes. Of course a considerable number of them are cases of senile dementia.

2563. Certifiable cases?—Yes.

2564. On the other hand some of them are not?—Some of them are not.

2565. With regard to those who are not certifiable but who are manifestly their own worst enemies in the circumstances, you find it expedient to utilise this compulsory procedure?—Yes.

2566. Do you think it would be desirable to have some legislative or administrative provisions to deal with such cases which are technically short of lunacy, but nevertheless in a position where the person may be suffering and would be the better for being brought into your hands?—I am not sure that the patient or anybody else suffers by the Lunacy Acts being invoked and then discarded. It does not affect anybody. The patient simply is brought in against his will by the only means we have got; it seems a very effectual means.

2567. It is a little shocking to the legal mind to find that you should utilise, with the best intentions of course, a code of law designed for one purpose to achieve another no doubt equally beneficent purpose?—The Act might be made to include that.

2568. We are here to get suggestions as to improvements, and I gather that you have been driven to this expedient through the absence of any existing machinery to meet this particular class of case?—That is so.

2569. Is it a class of case which in its own interest you think ought to be dealt with?—Yes, it certainly ought.

2570. Will you next tell us in connection with the patients who reach you under one head or another to what extent you are brought into contact with the relatives?—The relatives, the next of kin, or the nearest friend, sometimes only a landlady, attend at my office the morning after admission. The relieving officer always gives instructions that they must attend; I ask him to point out to them that it is necessary if they want their friends put under restraint for them to attend, and the next morning at nine o'clock I see them.

2571. Do these relatives or friends see you before you make your medical examination of the patient?—Yes, usually they do.

2572. Do you ask them questions about the case?—Yes.

2573. And do you endeavour to get as far as possible a history of the case from them?—Yes.

2574. What has been your experience as to the attitude of the relatives whom you have met?—Well, very frequently the attitude of the relative is that they want the patient detained in the infirmary, they do not want the patient sent to a mental hospital.

2575. They want the patient cared for and protected, but they have an aversion from the idea of the asylum?—A very strong aversion.

2576. To what do you think that aversion is due?—Well, I do not know; partly I think it is due to the fact that they think their friends will become worse if they are placed with other mental cases.

2577. Are they afraid of the effects of association?—Yes, and they also think that something terrible has occurred if insanity can be said to be in the family.

2578. We are familiar of course with the general reluctance of relatives to have any member of their family certified?—Yes.

2579. Apparently in your experience there is quite a strong desire on the part of relatives to obtain treatment, but if possible to avoid certification?—Yes.

2580. And apparently to obtain treatment without association with obviously insane cases?—Yes.

2581. That is a topic we want to explore a little further. After you have had a conversation with the relatives, where do you see the patient?—In the observation ward; I see the patient apart from the other patients whenever possible. There is a small room attached to both wards where I can have the patient alone.

2582. Are the patients in bed?—Yes, they are usually in bed; at least they are always in bed the first morning when I see them, but I can have them out into the room in a dressing gown if I want to.

2583. Do you make your examination in the presence of any other parties?—There is usually an attendant or a nurse there; the nurse, as a matter of fact, is standing by.

2584. Perhaps you would tell us about the staff you have in your mental department?—On the male side there are always two male attendants in the ward, and they are in charge of a sister—a nurse.

2585. Two male attendants in the male ward—with anybody else?—And a nurse in charge; the nurse is not necessarily in the ward all the time, but she is in charge of them. In the four female wards there is a sister; there are two nurses always in that section of the ward which is set apart for the troublesome patients, and there is one in each of the other wards always present.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2586. On your medical staff have you any assistant whose special province is the mental department?—There are assistants in charge from the physical point of view of both the male and female wards, but I do entirely the mental examination. I have an assistant who goes over the patient to see whether there is any other illness which wants treatment and to treat them.

2587. Have you had any special qualification in the treatment of insanity?—Not in the treatment of it, no.

2588. In so far as your academic course is concerned you would naturally take an ordinary course in insanity?—Yes; all my experience was at Lambeth before I was appointed.

2589. Before you took up your post you had not any specialised training in mental disease?—No, other than being the assistant of Lambeth; I was the senior assistant there.

2590. You were at Lambeth before 1911?—Yes, I went to Lambeth in 1907.

2591. Before that had you been in practice?—No, I came practically straight to Lambeth from one or two hospital appointments I had.

2592. So that you had never been in general practice?—No. In Lambeth we are also responsible for the districts outside. I am the District Medical Officer as well as Medical Superintendent, so that I have had experience in general work and in the homes of these particular people.

2593. But as regards the treatment of mental disease you have acquired your experience in the service, if one may so put it?—Yes, and even there I do not get experience really in the treatment of mental cases. If they want treatment from a mental point of view they all go to a mental hospital.

2594. We shall want to know what facilities, if any, you have for treating cases in your wards, but we will come to that later. Will you tell us about your actual examination of the case? How do you proceed to set about your task? The patient is in bed, we understand, and you have the nurse there? Are the relatives there at this stage?—No.

2595. You have seen them and got from them the necessary history of the case? You are now going to carry out your examination?—I have found from my experience that the easiest way from my point of view is to get the patient to talk if I can, and from his conversation I can judge very clearly as to his mental condition, better than by asking him questions.

2597. Do you find much difficulty after you have had a conversation and with your knowledge of the history of the case in making your diagnosis?—No, I do not. The difficulty which I experience generally is in connection with the second part of the certificate—not saying whether a patient is of unsound mind or not, but in deciding whether a patient is a proper person to be placed in a mental hospital—I think that is the most difficult part of it.

2598. I do not quite follow that. If the person is to your mind manifestly insane?—If he is manifestly insane there is no difficulty at all; but there are a large number of cases which you can say are of unsound mind, but you have also to sign a certificate to say they are proper persons to be placed in a mental hospital. It does not necessarily follow that, because a person is of unsound mind, it is necessary for him to be sent to an asylum, because the second part, I consider, depends more upon the surroundings and the home conditions of the patient.

2599. When you speak of unsoundness of mind, you merely mean that the patient is in a pathological condition to this extent, that he or she is not normal?—Yes.

2600. But you are not quite satisfied that the abnormality goes the length of justifying detention. Is that the practical difficulty that you feel?—Yes.

2601. And of course you cannot certify unless there are present both unsoundness of mind plus the desirability of detention?—No; that is my reading of it.

2602. So you generally find, do you, indications of mental unsoundness, but your difficulty is whether the unsoundness is such as to justify you in recommending detention?—Yes.

2603. That is where your difficulty seems to reside?—Yes, especially so when one realises that if you certify you are inflicting a stigma on the patient. If that can be removed, then I should not have any doubt in many cases.

2604. Is it a reluctance upon your part, and one which is shared by the relatives, to impose upon the person the stigma of certification, when it may be in doubt as to whether the case is really so bad?—Yes.

2605. We have had a good deal of evidence before from witnesses who have preceded you as to the desirability of some provisional period of trial. Such a scheme would obviate a great deal of your difficulty?—Yes, in the right form.

2606. Again, upon that, we shall want you to expatiate a little later on. Now I suppose one may take it that in the general course, patients who are brought to you, coming as they do through the relieving officer or the police, in the great majority of cases will be prima facie cases of mental unsoundness?—Yes, the majority of them.

2607. I am distinguishing between the case of the private patient as to whom there may be doubt. There is no particular desire on the part of the relieving officer, I suppose, to bring patients to you unless there is a prima facie case of insanity?—That is so, but I find a very considerable number of cases appear to be more in the nature of domestic trouble than of insanity. Quarrels existing between husband and wife are quite common cases, and when you get the patients away from their surroundings at home they are quite normal. I have had one or two cases where a husband and wife have alternately sent one another in as insane—that is not at all uncommon.

2608. You mean domestic controversy may attain such a height as to reach insanity?—I have not infrequently recommended that they should make some arrangement and live apart, and if they do so I am quite confident they would be all right. There are quite a number of such cases.

2609. A temporary over-balancing of the reason due to exasperation, shall we say?—Due to incompatibility of temper, I think.

2610. But, quite seriously, you do find that people become, shall we say, hysterical or upset in consequence of domestic trouble?—Yes.

2611. Of course, apart from the instance you have taken of strife between husband and wife, I suppose affliction of one sort or another, the effect of a great sorrow or tragedy in a home, or any calamity may produce a temporary state of hysteria or mental upset?—Yes.

2612. The symptoms of which disappear when the patient is brought into a calmer region and removed from the immediate seat of the trouble?—Yes, they form quite a large percentage of the cases.

2613. You would not characterise those as cases of insanity, would you?—No. They are the most difficult cases to deal with—when a husband accuses a wife of trying to put him away.

2614. Or vice versa?—Yes, when there is domestic trouble.

2615. I can imagine that your task must call for the exercise of a great deal of tact, doctor?—I think it does.

2616. Do you record your results of the examination of the patient?—Yes.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2617. Is that with a view to the compilation of your certificate?—Yes.

2618. In the cases when you are satisfied that the patient ought to be sent to a public mental hospital or asylum do you then proceed to prepare your certificate?—Yes, I do.

2619. That is the statutory form, is it not?—Yes.

2620. In this case is only one certificate required?—Yes.

2621. If you are not satisfied that the case is one that should be sent to a public mental hospital, what do you do?—If I am uncertain, if I can get any grounds for supposing a person to be of unsound mind, I record all the possible grounds, and I do in practice certify. It is the only existing method under the law that I can see by which you can detain a patient for longer than the three days.

2622. Your examination is taking place the morning after admission?—Yes.

2623. When does the magistrate intervene?—He must come within three days, and I always bring every patient who has been admitted since the magistrate's last visit before him, whether I have really decided or not, because otherwise he would have to come again in the intervening days.

2624. When you have completed your medical examination and have the history of the case before you, are there some cases which you recognise at once as not being certifiable cases?—Yes, there are some you can recognise as not being certifiable definitely, and of course there are others that you can recognise as being certifiable definitely.

2625. What about the cases which are clearly not certifiable cases?—I advise the magistrate on his arrival that the patient is not certifiable.

2626. If there is no medical certificate before the magistrate, he has really no function to discharge, has he; he cannot commit the patient without a medical certificate?—No, he must release the patient.

2627. So that in these cases a certain number will be discharged at once as not being mental cases properly so-called?—Yes.

2628. They remain in your wards until the magistrate comes?—Yes.

2629. And after the magistrate comes, a certain number of cases will be eliminated at once?—Yes, they are released; they can do what they like; they can either remain in the infirmary as patients or they can take their discharge.

2630. Some of them may have medical ailments and would be sent to the general wards; others may have recovered from the temporary upset and are just discharged?—Yes.

2631. Now with regard to the cases which are clearly certifiable, you have prepared your certificate in advance of the magistrate's arrival?—Yes.

2632. In the intermediate category, that is to say, cases as to which you are not quite certain, what do you do?—I prepare a certificate.

2633. Do you sign it?—Yes.

2634. In an intermediate case?—Yes, it is the only way I can keep the patient. It does nobody any harm because nobody knows the certificate has been signed if they recover. It is the only legal way I can see.

2635. I do not know that it is a legal way. The certificate requires you to affirm the two propositions that you have just told us about?—Yes.

2636. Do you tell us that you prepare such a certificate and sign it in advance of the arrival of the magistrate?—I forget the wording of that certificate at the moment. It is "a fit and proper person to be detained" I think. I certainly consider the patient as a fit and proper person to be detained in my observation ward. I think you can get over it by the wording of the section.

2637. Is it what is called Form 8?—"A proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment?—Yes. In my opinion a person is a proper person to be taken charge of for the time being, but I do not say that it is necessary to transfer him to a mental hospital.

2638. The form, however, asks you first of all this question: "Have you come to the conclusion that he is a lunatic, an idiot or a person of unsound mind?" In that case you would select probably the expression "person of unsound mind"?—Yes.

Lord Eustace Percy: Just to clear up this point: I suppose, Doctor Baly has the option in such a case to sign a certificate under Section 21 or a certificate under Section 24 which merely states in Form 10 that he is a proper person to be allowed to remain in the workhouse as a lunatic?

Witness: Yes, but that requires another doctor as well as myself.

2639. Chairman: Yes. Under Sub-section 4 of Section 24 I think you require a medical certificate under the hand of a medical practitioner not being an officer of the workhouse?—Yes, I cannot use Section 24.

2640. So you avail yourself of Form 8 in this case, because you are satisfied that the person is of unsound mind and is a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment, although you have by no means made up your mind that he is a proper person to be sent to an asylum?—That is what it comes to.

2641. Then the magistrate supervenes, and what passes between you and the magistrate?—I take the magistrate down to see the patient.

2642. Let us visualise actually what happens. Do you put before the magistrate the papers relating to the cases for that day?—I generally take the papers with me to the ward.

2643. You and he go in company to the actual ward. You have the record of the day's cases in your hand?—Yes, and I hand him the certificate and the case paper.

2644. Of each case as he comes to deal with it?—Yes.

2645. Does the justice go into the ward and find the patient in bed?—Yes.

2646. And he is handed the papers relating to the case?—Yes.

2647. What does he do then?—It depends upon the magistrate. Some magistrates read the paper and ask a few questions of the patient and then pass on to the next case.

2648. They pass judgment upon each case as they deal with it?—Some pass judgment in a way in their own minds; others merely look at the papers and the patient.

2649. And are satisfied without engaging the patient in conversation?—Without engaging the patient in conversation.

2650. Do the justices see the relatives?—Not in every case.

2651. Do they in some cases?—They do in some cases.

2652. Do they ask to see them?—No. If a patient's relatives are very averse and very insistent that there is no necessity to send the patient to a mental hospital, I always tell them they had better see the magistrate themselves. I think the presence of the magistrate will satisfy them better than I can.

2653. If any relatives have come with a patient or are there the next morning and wish in the interests of the patient to see the magistrates themselves, can they always do so?—Yes.

2654. And do they in practice do so?—Not very often.

2655. Earl Russell: Do they always know on what day the magistrate is coming?—I do not think they could know.

2656. Then of course they could not be there?—No, that is true.

2657. Chairman: It would rest with the relieving officer to tell the relatives that the magistrate would be in attendance?—Yes. What actually happens in practice is that I always tell the relatives. If the patient is in the observation ward, and if it is necessary for the patient to be removed to a mental hospital, they will be informed at once.

2658. If the relatives are there, you no doubt tell them what you propose to do; but how do you know that the relatives have been made aware at all of what is happening to their unfortunate relation? The relieving officer brings the patient to you; how do you know that the relieving officer has taken any steps to apprise the relatives of the condition of their relation and what may befall him?—I think the relatives are fully aware that their action will lead to a certification if the patient is removed.

2659. I can figure a case where I think that would not happen. Supposing you had an old woman living alone, which not infrequently happens; she has reached a stage when the relieving officer sees that something must be done and has her removed to one of your wards. She may have relations living in another part of the town; some old people insist upon living alone by themselves. Would the relatives in such a case be communicated with?—Yes, always. The relieving officer always informs the next-of-kin if he can find them. If the case is brought in by the police, the police endeavour to find the next-of-kin, and if the police fail, we try; the police always produce the next-of-kin the next morning if they can.

2660. That is all done, although there is no statutory obligation of communication with the relatives?—No, I do not think there is.

2661. Do you regard it as valuable to have information from the relatives?—I always try and get the relatives, before I bring the case to the magistrate.

2662. And do you also regard it as important to ascertain if possible the wishes of the relatives?—Yes.

2663. Would you think it desirable that some machinery should be provided whereby intimation should be given in every case to the relatives of a patient?—Yes. I certainly think so. Of course the relieving officer invariably tries to find the relatives for another purpose; for the purpose of chargeability.

2664. That gives him a motive and a duty?—Yes, but I always expect him to produce the relatives to me.

2665. And I see that you attach importance from two points of view to the presence of the relatives: firstly, that they may inform you of the history of the case, and, secondly, that they may also express to you their wishes and desires with regard to the future of the patient?—Yes.

2666. Those are very important matters?—Yes, very important, especially in the case of old people living by themselves and whose relatives may wish to take them home.

2668. Then in cases where relatives are not to be found or where relatives are callous or negligent, the patient is dealt with by you and the magistrate although no relative may be there at all?—Yes, that is not very frequent, but it does occur, especially in cases brought in by the police, who are sometimes unable to obtain the name of the patient, let alone the whereabouts of his friends.

2669. Do you try to find out from the patient, if the patient is in a mental condition to give it to you, information as to whether he or she has any relatives to be communicated with?—Yes.

2670. If you get that information, do you communicate with the relatives?—We communicate because a notice is sent out from the infirmary, in the case of every patient who comes in whether mental or not, the next day. There is a special notice for the mental cases sent to the next-of-kin, if we know them. If we do not know the next-of-kin, we send the notice to the landlady where the patient lives.

2671. All that is done by you over and above your strict statutory duty, if I may say so?—Yes.

2672. Have you a form for sending out these notices?—Yes.

2673. Is that form one which has been devised in your own infirmary?—Yes.

2674. Is it a printed form?—Yes.

2675. And does that printed form advise the relatives of the time when the magistrate is to attend?—No, it does not, because that is uncertain.

2676. It would be interesting if you could let us have a copy of the form that you use?—I have not one with me but I will get one for you. There are two forms; one is issued by myself and the other by the relieving officer; one is issued by the relieving officer to apprise the relatives of their duty to attend at my office, and my form sets out the regulations governing the observation ward.

2677. If you will let us have copies of those forms, they will be very useful?—Yes, I will let you have them.

2678. Now the justice has gone round the beds with you and has seen the case papers. What happens next that morning?—He returns to my office and discusses the cases with me.

2679. Not in the presence of the patient?—No.

2680. Is each case taken up individually?—Yes.

2681. Do you express to the justice any difficulties you have in your mind with regard to particular cases?—Yes. In those cases where I am doubtful whether it is necessary for the patient to be sent to a mental hospital, I ask him to suspend his order.

2682. That is to say, putting it in more colloquial language, you want more time to make up your mind?—Yes.

2683. A certain number of cases I have no doubt would be immediately certifiable?—Yes.

2684. Are these dealt with by the magistrate upon your certificate and upon the information you have given and upon his own personal visit to the patient?—Yes.

2685. Have you any difficulty as to the destination of the patient? A magistrate must specify where the patient is to be sent to?—Yes.

2686. Do you find in your experience any difficulty in selecting the public mental hospital?—The vacancy is applied for by the relieving officer and I have no choice.

2687. He ascertains where the patient can be accommodated?—Yes.

2688. Have you had any experience of difficulty in getting accommodation for patients?—Yes, on occasions.

2689. Is that owing to the crowded state of the public asylums?—I presume so, yes.

2690. What is done if there is no place for the patient immediately available?—If there is no place immediately available, some magistrates—I do not know whether they are legally entitled to or not—sign the order.

2691. Earl Russell: Blank?—I think it is practically blank—to a London County Hospital, or something like that, without specifying. Others initial the order and wait for the vacancy to occur and then when the name of the asylum can be entered they sign it, but I do not know that that part of it is my responsibility. Some of them are actually left blank.

2692. Chairman: One wants to know the difficulties that arise in practice?—You do not get your vacancy immediately unless you specially ask for it.

2693. It is really the relieving officer's duty to find out where the patient can be sent?—Yes.

2694. And you find in practice sometimes he has difficulty in getting a vacancy for a particular patient?—Yes, especially if there are a number of patients. They generally remove an urgent case very quickly.

2696. In practice, owing to the crowded state of the asylums, there is some difficulty in obtaining the requisite number of vacancies at once?—Yes.

2697. In such a case is the ultimate destination of the patient sometimes left over until it can be ascertained whether there is a vacancy?—Yes.

2698. Now with regard to the cases which are not clear, you have told us that you adopt an expedient for getting a little more time. With regard to some of the cases, on the other hand, although you have granted a certificate meantime, does the justice discharge right away?—Those that are clearly rational are discharged right away.

2699. Do you explain to the justice that although your certificate states that the patient is of unsound mind and suitable for detention, he is nevertheless not, in your opinion, a case suitable for treatment in an asylum?—Those cases are not discharged. The only cases he discharges right away are those in which I am quite clear the patient is rational. I write a certificate to say that the person is not a person of unsound mind.

2700. Earl Russell: Which is not a certificate under the Act?—No.

2701. Chairman: In that case you and the magistrate are fully satisfied and the patient is released at once?—Yes.

2702. The class of case we are interested in is the difficult case. With regard to the difficult case, you say you get an order from the magistrate but you get him to suspend it?—Yes.

2703. That is rather a novelty to us. What do you mean exactly by that?—It is a suspended order under Section 21, I think it is, which empowers me to detain the patient for 14 days.

2704. We will just look at the terms of that Section: "An order under this Section shall not authorise the detention of a lunatic in a workhouse for more than 14 days." This is a case where a summary reception order has not in fact been made but may be made. And in that case you ask for an order for 14 days' detention really in order that you may have the patient under observation?—Yes. The unfortunate thing is that I have got to certify that the person is of unsound mind in order to do that.

2705. Is that clear?—Yes, I think so.

Earl Russell: I think it is clear because it has to be made in any case where a summary reception order might be made, and he could not make it unless he had the medical certificate.

Chairman: That is quite true. You see, there is another provision (I do not know whether you have it in mind) in Section 19 of the Act, that the justice may make a summary reception order, but may suspend its execution for 14 days.

Witness: That is what I was always under the impression was the procedure.

2706. You referred us to Section 21, but if you look at Section 19, you will see provision is made for suspending the order?—Yes, that is the one I had in mind.

Earl Russell: There is this difference, if I may point it out, that in Section 19 he has actually to make the order and to suspend its execution, and in Section 21 he need not make the order.

2707. Chairman: Section 21 covers a case eligible for an order, but where an order has not been made. It would seem really that there are two ways in which a period of 14 days may be secured; one after the pronouncement of a summary reception order and one without the pronouncement of a summary reception order. Which of these two do you resort to? Have you a summary reception order or not?—Yes, I do get it.

2708. Then it is really Section 19 under which you proceed?—Yes.

2709. You get an order, but ask the justice to suspend it?—Yes.

2710. Earl Russell: Then the patient has had the stigma of lunacy inflicted upon him?—But nobody is aware of it except the magistrate and myself.

2711. And the patient's relatives?—No. If the patient is not removed to a mental hospital, nobody is aware of it except the magistrate and myself. It gives me the legal authority.

2712. Chairman: But still he is a person with regard to whom a magistrate has pronounced a summary reception order, which order he could not pronounce competently unless he was satisfied that the person was of unsound mind, ought to be detained, and was therefore certifiable?—Yes, but I still maintain that the patient cannot suffer the stigma as a result of that order being signed.

2713. Earl Russell: He could not bring an action for slander against anybody who said he was a certified lunatic afterwards?—Nobody would know it.

Lord Eustace Percy: I am a little puzzled about this. If you will look at Section 24, Dr. Baly can himself detain a lunatic for 14 days in the workhouse by merely certifying that he is a lunatic and he is a proper person to be detained in the workhouse, if the accommodation in the workhouse is sufficient.

Witness: Yes, that does not apply to a patient brought in under the Lunacy Act. If a patient is brought in under the Lunacy Act by a relieving officer, he has got to be brought before a magistrate, and I do not think I can apply that Section, can I?

Chairman: But Section 24 also has this feature, that there must be an order.

Lord Eustace Percy: Only after 14 days.

Chairman: An order if you are to detain for more than 14 days. I suggest the 14 days are provided for either under Section 21 or Section 24 (1)), and if you wish to detain beyond the 14 days you would have to resort to Section 24 (3).

Lord Eustace Percy: Sub-section (2) of Section 21 is: "In any case where a summary reception order has been made, an order under this section may be made to provide for the detention of the lunatic until he can be removed. (3) An order under this section shall not authorise the detention of a lunatic in a workhouse for more than 14 days."

2714. Sir Thomas Hutchison: This does not apply to a patient residing in a workhouse for some other reason?—Yes. I was always under the impression that I could not apply Section 24 to these cases.

Chairman: Look at the marginal note; it is called "Lunatics in workhouses." We have hitherto, I think, been led to believe that this is the class of case where you have a person actually in a workhouse who becomes insane, and then you deal with him in this way.

2715. Sir Thomas Hutchison: Brought into the workhouse, perhaps, for some other reason?—Yes, I have always understood that.

2716. Chairman: I am afraid we have heard a great many different views on the interpretation of some of these sections from the various witnesses; they are by no means clear?—They are not at all clear. When I first started this work I thought I understood my position, but the more inquiry I have made from those in authority the less clear I am about it.

2717. The programme of action, if I may so call it, is not very well defined?—No.

2718. However, we do not want to trouble you with questions of legal interpretation. We are anxious to know how you proceed to interpret as best you can the statutory duties imposed upon you, and we are interested in the class of case in which you have some difficulty. You get an order actually pronounced by the magistrate following upon your certificate and his visit to the patient; but you say to him: "This is a case which I should like to have more time to consider; will you suspend the carrying out of your order for a period of 14 days?"—Yes.

2719. And you get an order suspending for 14 days?—Yes.

2721. Does he or she remain in one of your wards under observation?—Yes.

2722. Now is the period of 14 days used merely for observation or is it to any extent used for treatment as well?—It is used for treatment in the case of the sick patients.

2723. Medically sick?—Quite a percentage of these cases are medically sick. Some of them are actually removed from the general hospitals under Section 20 because they are delirious. If a patient becomes troublesome in a general hospital, I not infrequently have him sent down to me under Section 20—sick patients.

2724. Are these people dealt with by all this machinery of certification and the rest of it?—Yes, they are certified. Here again the only person who knows they are certified is myself.

2725. But nevertheless the existence of a certificate is serious. Take the case of a patient who merely has a symptom of an ordinary disease; I understand there are many forms of ordinary ailments, for example, pneumonia or typhoid where you may have a transitory state of delirium; a patient may be violent and try to get out of bed, and so on. Are such cases sent down to you?—They are sent down.

2727. But it is not insanity?—No, it is not.

2728. Chairman: I am rather alarmed to hear that these cases are put through the mill of the machinery for lunacy?—They are put through the mill if it is necessary to use restraint and the patient is demanding to go out. It seems to me quite illegal—I do not know whether it is—to use a padded room in a hospital.

2729. Earl Russell: You would not hesitate to apply force to a patient in high fever who wanted to go out and catch his death of cold, certified or not certified?—No, but those persons sent down to me from the hospital under Section 20 are cases you may class as delirious; they are very restless, very troublesome, very noisy; they could not be kept in any other ward but my observation ward. I think the commonest disease in that class of case is uræmia.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Dr. Baly gave me the impression that he grouped with insanity cases of delirium tremens. I should like to know whether those cases are treated for the time being as cases of insanity.

2730. Chairman: We will ask that. (To the Witness): But let us first take a case in your general hospital. You have a patient suffering from a well-known ailment who develops symptoms of delirium and becomes delirious. It is not an uncommon phase as we know of many ailments that a patient may have to be held down in bed to prevent him getting up. You do not suggest that you require the machinery of the Lunacy Laws to enable a doctor to restrain a person in moments of delirium, do you?—No, I do not think it is necessary.

2731. But in point of fact are patients suffering from some well-defined ailment actually removed from the general ward to the mental ward, merely because in the course of that ailment they become delirious?—A certain percentage are. If they are violent it is the only ward where I can look after them, but they are not put through the machinery of the Lunacy Laws as a matter of fact.

2733. Do you have cases actually transferred from another hospital in a state of delirium consequent upon the onset of some other illness?—I do not think it is quite fair to say delirium in the ordinary sense of the term. They become very restless and they can better be described as mental.

2734. Earl Russell: Toxic?—I have one at the present moment sent from a hospital suffering from uræmia—chronic Bright's disease. The delirium resulting from that condition is the class of case for which this machinery is invoked.

2735. Chairman: If such a case had been transferred from one of your general wards to your mental department, it would only have been because of the greater convenience of dealing with the case there, not in order to use the machinery of the Lunacy Acts?—No.

2736. On the other hand, if a case is transferred to you from another infirmary altogether, do you say that you have, in order to detain that case in your mental ward, to invoke the Lunacy Acts?—The Lunacy Act has been invoked to bring the patient there.

2738. But I think one must be a little cautious about that, because when you sign a certificate, that is a matter of record in your infirmary; and, as Lord Russell put it, if any person said afterwards of this patient of yours that he was once certified, they could obtain an order for the discovery of the records of the infirmary, and there it would appear that a responsible medical man had in fact certified under the Act. There would exist a record, although not disclosed by you at the time, that this person had been certified?—Quite.

2739. You are not the only witness we have had who has found it necessary to have recourse to procedure in the interest of patients, as to the legality of which there might be some doubt. All that may well point in the direction of giving you a better system?—We certainly ought to have some legal right. There ought to be some legal authority for interfering with an individual's liberty, and you have to interfere with the liberty of a patient.

Earl Russell: But not in ordinary cases of sickness.

2740. Chairman: Almost everybody has had a severe illness at one time or another and may quite well have become wandering in his mind, as we say, or as you put it, restless, wanting to get up and so on. The kindly medical attendant who is looking after him tries to soothe the patient and may have to hold him down in bed for a bit. That is not a case which has any relation to the Lunacy Laws?—I do not think it ought to have. It has a relation at present, in that patients are transferred from hospitals under Section 20.

2741. Once a patient becomes certifiable we know that any question of restraint is a matter under the Act, but we are dealing with a patient who receives medical treatment and requires some measure of restraint in his own home. Such a person would not be a certifiable person, surely?—He should not be.

2742. Sir David Drummond: Is it not the fact that in your infirmary you have not sufficient accommodation to treat such a case as uræmia, and so on, in the ordinary wards?—In certain cases that is so. I do not want it to be thought that all cases of delirium are moved to the observation wards; it is only very exceptionally, but a certain number brought in under Section 20 are placed in the observation wards and subsequently transferred to the ordinary wards.

Chairman: I could understand you saying of one case "This is a mental case"; but of another case you would say: "This is a case of Bright's disease but temporarily the patient is upset and, 'off his balance' and requires special precautions." But the two things are quite different. I am again speaking purely as a layman. One would not characterise a patient suffering from Bright's disease as a lunatic.

2743. Earl Russell: Is it not one of the commonest incidents of malaria for the patient to be off his head?—I believe it is. Personally I feel that there should not be this distinction. I look upon a person suffering from a mental affliction as sick in the same way as anybody else and I think you ought to remove that distinction.

2744. Chairman: Of course the trouble is that you have to get power of detention in some cases, and that power of detention against the wish of the patient has to be very carefully safeguarded?—Quite.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2745. It is the old story of the difficulty of accommodating legal principles with medical science. In medicine one understands that there is no difference between the extreme case and the slight case, that is to say, they are all symptoms of a pathological condition; but in some cases it is necessary to interfere with the liberty of the subject and there the law steps in and requires certification. That is the problem, is it not?—Yes.

2746. Just tell us also with regard to the case that Sir Humphry Rolleston referred to, the case of alcoholism—I am afraid you must have a number of cases of that sort?—We do. They are mostly brought in under orders under Section 20.

2747. By a relieving officer or the police?—By a relieving officer or the police. It seems to be a question of luck in many cases whether a patient is taken to a Police Court or brought to me as a lunatic. I had only this week-end a patient brought in as a lunatic and the next morning his condition was perfectly clear—the patient was perfectly sober. The magistrate came and the patient was released the next morning.

2748. But may not a case of extreme alcoholism possibly have the good fortune of being taken to an ordinary general hospital? Supposing a person has reached the stage of alcoholic coma in the street, he may be taken off to St. George's Hospital or any of the other hospitals?—Yes, or he might be brought to me as a sick patient.

2749. Or to your ward by the relieving officer?—Yes, or by the police, or he might be taken to the police station.

2750. He reaches you in a state of either alcoholic excitement or coma, stays the night under your roof, is examined by you next morning and is stated to be a case of alcoholism. It is generally easily diagnosed, is it not?—Generally—not always.

2751. The man has "slept it off," I suppose, putting it colloquially?—Yes.

2752. In such a case what would you do?—It may be important that the man should be released at once; a man may lose his work or suffer very seriously through being detained; it is not my business to punish a patient. I arrange for him to see a magistrate that day; but I not infrequently arrange, if the magistrate is not coming, for the relieving officer in such a case to take the patient to the magistrate. I do not think it is justifiable to call a magistrate just for one person who has got drunk, so I send the patient to the magistrate and he is released.

2753. Sir Thomas Hutchison: Does such a case arrive at your ward with a certificate?—He arrives with a police order.

2754. But how is that police order obtained?

2755. Chairman: He is taken to a police office and I suppose the officer in charge there will give some order?—Yes, he gives the order.

2756. Mr. Snell: Not the police medical officer?—No.

2757. Chairman: The police officer in charge of the charge room; he simply writes out an order and the constable will then take this man to you?—Yes.

2758. He might equally have been taken to the workhouse infirmary, not the mental side?—Yes. Of course if he were refusing to stay or were obstreperous I should have absolutely no power to keep him.

2759. The police would have?—Yes, they would. Of course if they bring a patient into the hospital who is merely drunk, my medical officer diagnoses drunkenness or tells the police to take him away; but there are cases of varying degree where a patient may be temporarily insane from drink, and I think it is quite justifiable that that patient should be put into an observation ward where you have a padded room rather than keep him in a police cell.

2760. It seems to me that this is largely apart from the ordinary lunacy administration altogether?—As far as I am aware it is the only means by which a drunken man in his home can be put under restraint. A man may be breaking up his home; he may be damaging other people; you cannot take him out of his home; the only way you can remove him from his home is by deeming him to be a lunatic.

2760A. Earl Russell: As soon as he is injuring other people.

Chairman: Then you can call in the police.

Witness: But the police cannot arrest him.

2761. If he is screaming and shouting in his room?—I have always understood that they could not arrest—not in his own home.

2762. Although he is doing damage to property?—His own property in his own home.

2763. Would not he include his wife among his own property?—His wife would have to charge him, under those circumstances.

2764. It rather shocks one, I confess?—I have always understood that it is the only means of removing a man from his own home.

2765. To invoke the Lunacy Act?—Yes, I think so.

2766. If that is so, I think we must see that it is put right?—I think it is so. I had patients before the war who used to be brought in once or twice a year under Section 20, and one man I remember particularly well; in the end he died in his own wreckage.

2767. An alcoholic case—recurrent bouts of alcoholism?—Yes.

2768. Of course, it is perfectly true that alcoholism is associated with insanity, and you must have a certain number of cases that must come under the Lunacy Acts?—If it could be done with a clear conscience, it would be the best thing to do, but you do not get those cases until they have got to a very advanced degree of alcoholism.

2769. Earl Russell: You do not get them until they are really useless?—That is so.

2770. Chairman: However, you tell us that you have cases of alcoholism brought to you, which are relegated largely as a matter of chance to your mental department, and when seen by you are diagnosed as alcoholics, and you take steps to get the person released as soon as possible?—Yes.

2771. But they have to this extent been subject to the Lunacy Acts; that having been brought into your mental ward through the machinery of the police or the relieving officer, you cannot by your hand release them without bringing them before a magistrate?—No.

2772. An ordinary person brought to your sick department is entirely at your discretion as to when you shall advise him to go?—Yes.

2773. But such a person brought to you under the circumstances you have described is detained by you until the magistrate grants release?—Yes, and the same thing applies to attempted suicides.

2774. Will you tell us about that class of case?—They are brought to me, in many instances, under Section 20 by the police. Personally, I myself prefer that the Act should be invoked because a good many of these attempted suicides are certifiably insane. I think it is better that the patient should be put under the Lunacy Act by an independent authority—not myself.

2775. We are here rather trenching upon a different region, because there are people who hold that attempted suicide itself is practically a form of insanity?—Yes. After all, if a patient succeeds in committing suicide, he is generally deemed to be temporarily insane, and I think it is more satisfactory that they should all be brought to me under Section 20 rather than be brought to me as ordinary patients.

2776. Of course, one can see here that you are dealing with a very grave and delicate class of case. Suppose an unhappy woman is caught in the act of trying to throw herself over Westminster Bridge, for example: do you have cases of that sort brought in?—Yes. We have cases of people who have actually succeeded in throwing themselves in the river.

2777. Sir David Drummond: Then it is an accident, whether they are brought to Dr. Baly or St. Thomas's or any other hospital?—Yes.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2778. They are not certified. They are brought up before a magistrate afterwards?—Yes.

2779. Chairman: Such a person recovered from the Thames might be taken to St. George's Hospital, for example, put to bed there, might recover all right with good food and with rest, and then simply walk out of the hospital; but if they reach your infirmary, by way of contrast they then find themselves involved to this extent in the Lunacy Acts that they cannot walk out, even although they may have recovered, until a magistrate has passed judgment upon them?—Yes. It is not the invariable practice to issue an order. What decides the police in issuing the order I do not quite know. A cut-throat, for instance, will be brought in to me as an ordinary patient, put into an ordinary ward and treated. I do not think I can ever remember a cut-throat being brought in under Section 20, but cases of attempted gas poisoning and attempted jumping into the river and drowning are frequently brought in under Section 20.

2780. They are hors de combat for the moment?—Yes, they cannot go out; you have got to detain the patients.

2781. Lord Eustace Percy: But every case of attempted suicide is subject to arrest.

Chairman: It is a crime, of course.

Witness: Yes, but I think they have ceased charging.

Earl Russell: Because it is so awkward for magistrates to know what to do with them.

2782. Chairman: One is rather struck by your evidence so far. It seems as if, through the absence of machinery to deal with difficult cases such as you have described, resort has been had to the machinery of the Lunacy Acts in order to get the necessary power to detain such persons in their own interest, to protect themselves and to protect the public against them, although they are not cases that anybody would regard as certifiable cases. Is that a fair representation of the position?—Yes. Supposing an insane person is brought in, having attempted suicide, and I have not got a Section 20 order, how am I to proceed with the case? Arrest him myself in the infirmary?

2783. I am wondering what happens if the patient has been taken to St. George's Hospital or to St. Thomas's?—He may be sent on to me under Section 20 from St. Thomas's.

2784. The patient might be taken there where he would remain a free agent and be treated, but suppose he said "I am going away," and the doctor said "Well you cannot possibly be allowed out just now in view of your state," what would happen to him then?—They have got no right to detain him, have they?

2785. Sir David Drummond: But he is in the hands of the police in nine cases out of ten?—Except that the police do not charge.

Sir Thomas Hutchison: But they have got to look after them.

Lord Eustace Percy: You have only to call the policeman at the corner.

Witness: In which case the police would probably bring him on to me under Section 20.

Chairman: You seem to be the ultimate destination.

Lord Eustace Percy: I wonder whether you could ask Dr. Baly if he could let us have an actual list of the cases which he has received from general hospitals like St. Thomas's, say, within the last six months—I do not mean the names of course—so that we might judge how far they were cases of delirium in the sense of persistent delusion.

2786. Chairman (to the Witness): You have, of course, your case records?—Yes.

2787. It would be interesting to have some notion of the class of cases you have had to deal with. We do not want to put too heavy a burden upon you. Would six months be too much to ask you to take up for us?—No, I do not think there would be any difficulty in tracing the cases* removed from the hospitals during the last six months; they are not a very large number.

2788. We should rather like to have that?—Yes, and their ultimate destination.

2790. Chairman: Now let us revert to cases more strictly under the Act. You have disposed, with the magistrate's assistance, of the clear cases on either side; those who manifestly must go to an asylum, and those who must manifestly be released at once. You have obtained with regard to the remaining cases a 14 days' moratorium, owing to the order having been pronounced but the justice having suspended it for 14 days. During that time those cases are under your observation. Are they always kept in bed during that time?—Not necessarily.

2791. What do you mean by having them under observation; what is actually done?—They are detained in the observation ward. They are seen by myself and my assistant every day, and of course I have the reports of the sister in charge as to their behaviour; they are always particularly examined by myself on each occasion before the magistrate is coming, so that if I can dispose of the cases within the fortnight I do.

2792. What has been your experience with regard to the number of cases dealt with in this way; how many have ultimately had to be sent to asylums, and how many have been found to be cured so that the order, in your phrase, has been allowed to lapse?—A considerable number. I think I have given the number. There were 111 in one year in which the orders were allowed to lapse, but, of course, a certain number of those would be recertified under Section 24.

2793. Let us follow that a little. A summary reception order has been made by the justice; it has been suspended; the patient has been in your hands for a maximum of 14 days; during that time you have observed the case and come to certain conclusions upon it, and if you are satisfied that the case is not one for permanent detention what do you do?—In that case the order lapses.

2794. You do not take any procedure; you just let the 14 days elapse and then out walks the patient?—Yes; or with the magistrate's consent I release the patient before that time. Sometimes the patient is transferred to an ordinary ward, being a case of sickness, or allowed to take discharge.

2795. And passes out of the purview of the Lunacy Acts altogether?—Yes.

2796. Therefore, within the 14 days you may be satisfied that the patient is not a certifiable case although you have certified him?—Certifiable, but not a proper person to be sent to a mental hospital.

2797. A proper person to be released from the operation of the Lunacy Acts?—Yes.

2798. In such a case you can do it with the help of the magistrate, or take the other course; the time lapses and the patient is free to go?—Yes.

2799. Is that in 111 cases in the year?—In 111 cases the orders were allowed to lapse. A certain number of these patients may have been of the harmless type, although desirable that they should be kept in an institution; and, therefore, in the meantime I have applied for a vacancy at Tooting Bec, with a view to getting them to Tooting Bec rather than to the county mental hospital, and when a vacancy arises the patient is recertified under Section 24.

Sir Ernest Hiley: 75 per cent. of the total.

2800. Chairman: Yes, a very large percentage. But apparently they are not all cases which in your opinion ought to be detained?—They are proper persons to be detained, but not persons to be sent to the county mental hospital; rather proper persons to be detained as harmless persons in a workhouse.

2801. But still a person who is a certifiable case?—Yes.

2802. I am rather interested to know how many of these persons during the period of 14 days' observation are found by you to be persons who ought not to be dealt with any further under the Lunacy Acts at all; that is to say, persons who ought to pass out of their operation?—It is difficult to give the figure; I can only give an approximation which I think is fairly accurate.

2803. I regard the person who is transferred to your sick ward as equally passing out of the operation of the Lunacy Acts altogether; but, on the other hand, the person dealt with under Section 24 is still under the Lunacy Acts; he is merely transferred from the operation of the one section to another. Therefore, he is not the class of person about whom you have been satisfied during the interregnum that he ought to be outside the Lunacy Acts?—I should think about 75 per cent. of those are absolutely released; 75 per cent. of the 111, and the remaining 25 per cent. of them are recertified under Section 24 as harmless.

2804. Let us just bring this to a focus. It is obvious then that if there intervened between the time when the patient is first brought under medical care and the time when the certificate is made, a period of observation, a very considerable number of persons would never be certified at all, because during the period of observation it would be discovered that the symptoms had passed, and that the person was not a person who ought to be certified at all?—Quite.

2805. Does that lead you to favour the view that some machinery should be provided whereby patients may be provisionally dealt with, in order to ascertain whether the case ought to be finally certified or not?—Yes, certainly. If there is an objection to the patient being certified in this manner, without any knowledge to anybody—if there is an objection to that, I certainly think you would have to have some other machinery for keeping the patient under observation.

2806. I think you may take it that there is a general dislike to a certificate even coming into existence with reference to any patient which certifies that the person is of unsound mind, even although you may take every precaution to prevent it becoming public?—Yes, but you would have to have a certificate of some kind.

2807. That may be, but we have been considerably impressed with the desirability of some period of probation or trial intervening between the case first coming under the cognisance of the authorities and the pronouncement of what I may call the sentence upon the case?—Quite.

2808. If such a period were available to you without any certification, but under some proper safeguards, it would look as if quite a large number of cases reaching you would never be certified at all?—Quite a large number.

2809. Sir David Drummond: What proportion of the 75 per cent. were acute cases that had to be removed from the home—that is to say, they could not be left?—That is difficult to say.

2810. That is an important question?—It is an important question, but I am afraid I cannot give the figure.

2811. A considerable proportion of these people were people who could not be kept at home?—I think the original removal was perfectly justified.

2812. Acute cases?—Yes.

2813. Lord Eustace Percy: So that from your point of view, the scheme for a probationary period would be no good unless it was possible during that time to keep the patient as much under detention by force, as he is now kept if he is certified?—I think it would certainly be necessary to have power of detention during that period—very necessary.

(The Earl Russell at this point took the Chair.)

2830. Earl Russell: There are only one or two things that have occurred to me on what you have said already. The first was as to the legal position.

2814. Chairman: I suppose you may have very acute cases, but cases as transitory as they are acute, and during the acute period obviously forcible detention may be necessary?—Yes. I had a case only this week-end where the patient was certainly in a condition of acute mania, a puerperal case, and the patient had to be in the observation ward and in a straight jacket, and was in fact certified.

2815. Is that a transitory phase?—Yes, it had passed within two days. I always suspend those cases in the hope that they are going to recover within 14 days.

2816. If you had, on the one hand, some means of detaining such a case in its own interest, pending ultimate certification, then it seems to me you could protect the interest of the patient physically and at the same time socially prevent the stigma of certification?—Yes.

2817. That would be desirable, would it not?—Very desirable.

2818. And you have in point of fact tried your best under the existing regime to accomplish the same result?—Exactly, thinking in my innocence that I did no harm in certifying a patient when nobody knew it but myself; but I had no other method of doing it.

2819. Then you find there are deficiencies in the existing code, when you endeavour to deal as you would wish to deal with quite a large number of cases that reach you?—Yes.

2820. Lord Eustace Percy: Might I ask whether you have any views as to the length of time for this probation. Are these 14 days really sufficient for proper observation?—Not in all cases. There is one view of it; if you prolong their probationary period beyond the 14 days, we should certainly have to have what I consider most desirable, namely, proper means of treating mental cases in the infirmary—proper means and proper staff.

2821. Chairman: You have alluded to the fact that observation in your case is not accompanied by treatment in the medical sense?—I have not the means or the staff.

2822. Therefore no doubt, although you will alleviate as far as you can by nursing and attention, you would not describe yourself as treating the cases from a medical point of view?—That is so. Of course the guardians would say that they ought not to come to me.

2823. Therefore if they are to be kept there for a longer period than 14 days you would really be converting yourself into a temporary asylum where you ought to have means of treatment as well?—Yes.

2824. Even during the 14 days? Take this very case you have spoken of, puerperal mania. Surely the case requires some treatment during the 48 hours of the acute mania?—It is a question of the restraint which is used. Of course that is treatment; but if we were going to treat patients beyond 14 days I should require a special staff anyhow to advise on the treatment, if not actually to treat.

2825. For one thing you would have more cases to deal with?—I should want bigger accommodation and I should want specialists attached to my staff.

2826. Does the justice in your experience ever call for further medical assistance beyond your own certificate?—During the last year there were only two cases where I asked the justice to call in a specialist.

2827. Did the suggestion emanate from you?—The suggestion emanated from me.

2828. But you have never had a case of a justice saying "Well now, Dr. Baly, I would like to have a further opinion upon this case"?—I cannot remember one.

2829. Lord Eustace Percy: Have you ever had a case where a justice refused to make an order?—A justice has asked me to bring the case before him again before the patient is moved. I have had that.

Legally you are a workhouse, are you not, or a workhouse infirmary?—Yes.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2831. And therefore you get all the powers under Section 20?—Yes.

2832. And technically you are a medical officer of the union, I suppose?—Yes.

2833. So that gives you the power?—Yes.

2834. Then there is the question of the senile dementeds you spoke of. Of course it is the case sometimes, is it not, that without being insane, and still more without being certifiably insane, some people prefer to live in a state of filth and squalor that others would find intolerable?—That is true.

2835. You could not, of course, certify them on those grounds?—No; but I do look upon a person who is in a state of extreme neglect as being essentially of unsound mind; I mean cases which are almost incredible.

2836. Would it be better to deal with them by compulsory powers of cleansing under the Public Health Act, if they are not certifiable?—That class I think is certifiable. When I put on a certificate that a person is admitted in a state of extreme self-neglect I look upon that as being a condition of unsound mind.

2837. There are cases one has seen in the newspaper occasionally in which a woman has kept innumerable cats and kept her house in a state of filth. I have seen no suggestion in those cases that the person was insane; it was merely that their habits were offensive to their neighbours?—It is a question of degree.

2838. Those cases would be better dealt with under the Public Health Act rather than under the Lunacy Acts?—Yes.

2839. You might take compulsory powers of disinfection and of cleansing in extreme cases?—Yes.

2840. Of course it is an interference with the privacy of the home, even if an undesirable privacy?—Yes.

2841. I notice in your précis you say something about the cost of a second certificate. We had a witness before us who suggested that in all these pauper cases a second certificate would be desirable, and I tried to get from him some figures as to what the cost of a second certificate would be; he could not tell us. Can you tell us what it would be?—It varies; the fees paid vary in different parishes. The minimum fee paid is half a guinea; probably quite a common fee would be a guinea.

2842. So that a second medical opinion would add from half a guinea or a guinea to the cost of every certification?—Yes.

2843. The same witness told us that on the one certificate he had never had any difficulty in making up his mind. Is it your own experience that a second certificate would be useful in many of these cases?—I do not think so. In very few cases I think a second certificate necessary.

2844. There have been only two cases in the year in which you have thought it desirable to ask for it?—Those were cases in which I did not feel justified in certifying, but the friends wanted certification. I really called in a second opinion, not so much for my own satisfaction, but to protect my guardians in the event of the friends being right and the patient possibly committing murder after leaving the infirmary.

2846. I just want to turn to Form 8. You have to certify that the patient is "a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment." You do not have much difficulty with the second part of the certificate if you are satisfied as to the first part, do you?—No; that is why I say it is quite right to certify and suspend the order. My difficulty is in deciding whether it is necessary for the patient to be sent to a mental hospital.

2847. But you still think he ought to be detained under care and treatment?—Yes, I think I am right in certifying him.

2848. You are not saying very much more than you would say about any sick person, that the patient would be better for care under detention and treatment?—Quite.

2849. I did want to ask you about a part of your evidence which rather struck me, and that was as to the presence of relations at the examination before the justice. We have had two classes of evidence before us. One was from a relieving officer, who said that in all cases he did everything he could to have the relations present when the justice saw the patient. The other was from a justice, who said that in the cases he was acquainted with they practically never had the relations present. I understand you have given us two reasons why you think the relations should be present?—Yes.

2850. One reason is to give the history of the case, and the other is to express any wish as to the disposal of the patient?—Yes.

2852. I have no doubt you are discharging the whole of your duty, but the magistrate is interposed for the express purpose of representing the public; and not the patient's medical interest, but the public's interests and personal liberty. Do not you think it would be desirable that when the magistrate is in effect signing an order which deprives a person of his liberty, some relative or friend of the patient should if possible be present to urge anything, if there is anything to be urged, against that order?—I am not sure that I see the necessity for it, assuming that I am acting myself bonâ fide in the patient's interest.

2853. Of course, I quite agree it makes a great deal of difference if you yourself have seen the relatives, but suppose no relative has been seen, and the first thing they hear of it is that the patient has been certified. You would not approve of that?—No; I certainly think the relatives should be apprised, and when their presence can be obtained it should be obtained.

2855. But they might give further information, or the magistrate might ask them questions on your certificate, and develop it, or they may give information of another kind, that the patient is perfectly quiet, and that they are willing to look after him at home?—I have never understood quite clearly in my mind what is the function of the magistrate. Is it the magistrate's duty to say that the patient is of unsound mind or not, or is it his duty to see that everything is in order? In the case of a private patient I do not think he sees the patient.

2856. He does not have to do it before the reception order is signed, but that fact has to be stated, and the patient has a right to demand to go before a judicial authority if he chooses?—Quite. I did raise that point in my précis by saying that I thought the position of the magistrate might be more clearly defined.

2857. The magistrate is there, and of course he is in a difficult position; he is not there to contest a medical certificate; he is there partly to see that everything is properly done, and to decide, after the medical certificate, whether the person should be deprived of his liberty or not?—Yes.

2858. Miss Madeleine Symons: You say, I think, in paragraph 22 of your précis that you often try to get an order suspended where the patient is suffering from physical infirmity as well. Then you go further, and say that you are of opinion that any treatment of patients in a specialised mental institution is a bad thing. I was wondering whether you would care to develop that point?—My point of view there is that I think all special institutions are undesirable, that you will get your patients of all kinds much better treated, if they are in a general institution capable of dealing with all forms of sickness, and that is especially so in the case of mental patients. They are sent to special institutions for mental diseases; I take it that the staff are all specialists; the patients must require treatment for other conditions besides their mental condition. I am also of opinion that if mental cases were treated in a general institution, with general physicians on the staff, we are likely to obtain more knowledge of mental disorder than we are if the patients are sent to a special institution; I feel that very strongly; besides, there is the tremendous advantage, from my point of view, of removing the stigma of the certificate. From what I can judge from the attitude of friends, that is very real, and if you cannot remove that stigma, no reform is likely to meet the desire of the public, as I see the public—the friends of the patients.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2859. Mr. Snell: You said there were only 11 beds available for men. What happens to the men patients who require treatment, if there is inadequate provision for them? There are 11 beds for men, and 40 for women, which leads one to suppose that there are some men who cannot get proper treatment because of the lack of accommodation in the ward?—That male ward of mine is, in fact, generally overcrowded.

2860. Is there any difficulty in getting accommodation of the right kind, for such patients as you want to dispose of, in other institutions?—No, I do not think there is any difficulty in sending them to mental hospitals. As a result of my lack of accommodation a greater proportion of men are transferred to mental hospitals from my institution than women.

2861. Is the social status of a patient considered in the selection of a mental hospital?—There is only one differentiation I know of as regards social status, and that is that at one of the London hospitals they have what they call a private side, and any patient who is likely to be suitable for the private side of that mental hospital is sent to that particular one, even if they have not got a vacancy.

2862. Would you say that the quality of the treatment is satisfactory—whether a patient is poor or well off, he gets adequate medical treatment?—I am not in a position to express an opinion on the treatment in mental hospitals at all.

2863. Then you said that the relieving officer had a good deal of initial responsibility for admitting or confining patients. I would like to know whether patients are in any way prejudiced by the fact that the relieving officer has actually detained them; does that count, do you suppose, against them?—I do not think it does to any extent, although I do have it given to me in the history that the patient has been detained in other observation wards in other parts of London; that may prejudice the patient to a slight degree.

2864. I would like to know whether, on the next morning, when the patient is seen by you, he is assisted at all by the presence of friends or relatives who might speak for him?—No. I see the relatives first, and then I see the patient away from the relatives afterwards.

2865. Would it not be likely that excitement or fear of a patient would show him at his worst when being medically examined? I have been medically examined myself, and I think it does make some difference to your pulse-beats, for example. Is that natural nervousness allowed for?—Yes, we certainly discount that.

2866. I have not a doctor's knowledge of diagnosis, naturally, but as a layman I was a little alarmed to find that a part of your decision was based upon what the man said. You said: "I get the patient to talk, and put him at his ease, and this is my main method." Is that quite satisfactory? If people's sanity were to be judged by what they say, I wonder how many of us would be at large. A man in a state of excitement, or after some sort of mental storm, might be irrational in his speech without being permanently so?—I quite agree, but what I meant by that was this: If you ask the patient questions you very often get unsatisfactory answers; whereas if you can put the patient at his ease so as to reduce that excitement, and assure the patient that you are acting on his behalf, that he is your patient—if you get him to talk, you very often find that the delusions will be discussed by him, whereas if you simply put a question to him to answer, you would get nothing out of him at all.

(Mr. Macmillan in the Chair.)

2867. Mr. Snell: I want to ask you, Dr. Baly, how many of your staff are trained in mental nursing?—There are six male attendants.

2868. Who are trained?—Yes.

2869. In regard to one point of your evidence, you say cases are quite frequently due to domestic trouble. Is a part of this domestic trouble due, say, to overcrowding or to unemployment or social conditions?—It is certainly due to unemployment, I am sure.

2870. That would induce a mental condition which would be a temporary condition, assuming the social conditions were better?—Yes, I am sure about that.

2871. Then you said, I think, that you always tried to get the opinions of relatives before seeing a magistrate. Do you think sometimes relatives, because of the special conditions with regard to a patient, might not be anxious for him to be detained, and is not that a thing which ought to be watched?—Yes, that is so. Relatives, however, very often want patients to be detained, and where relatives and a patient contradict one another, I try to get from the patient the name of someone who is independent.

2872. Often, you said, physical trouble might arise out of their condition. Are those patients treated medically and restored to physical health before their mental condition is decided upon?—That is not always possible. Time is too short in many cases.

2873. Supposing a person, for example, has a high temperature, and may be irrational and violent, is the judgment as to his mind taken under average conditions or on the fever conditions?—No. If I diagnosed correctly, the mental condition is due to physical illness, and I try my utmost to keep the patient in an infirmary. It is possible under Form 8 to certify the patient unfit for removal.

2874. Would a person found by the police in the street suffering from chronic alcoholism run the risk of being certified as a lunatic?—A certain number do become certified. There is a recognised condition, I think, of alcoholic insanity.

2875. But the insanity is a secondary symptom, is it not?—It is a secondary symptom to the alcoholism.

2876. Suppose by some legislative or other means, a man could be kept sober, the condition of insanity would not arise?—I am afraid I do not follow you.

2877. Chairman: There could not be any alcoholic insanity if there was no alcohol?—No.

2878. Mrs. Mathew: Is yours a very overcrowded district?—Yes, in the neighbourhood of the infirmary it is.

2879. Do you think insanity is a result of increased overcrowding?—I cannot say I have any proof that insanity is on the increase, but I do think a number of cases of mental disorder are the result of overcrowding, but chiefly unemployment.

2880. Would you consider 14 days sufficient, or would a longer period of observation be desirable?—I think it is desirable that we should have power to detain mental cases in the infirmary for a longer period.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2881. Sir Humphry Rolleston: If, when brought to a receiving home by either the relieving officer or by the police, the individual appears to be absolutely normal, your assistant medical officer is, I suppose, according to the existing state of the law, unable to discharge the patient straight off; so that if some mistake occurs on the part of the police or the relieving officer, the patient has to stay there three days?—Yes. The patient has to be admitted to the observation ward. In the case of a woman, it is possible for a medical officer to classify the case, and I have power to detain a case for three days, but there are cases when I have caused a release the next morning.

2884. In your evidence you suggested, and gave reasons, that it might be advantageous both from the point of view of the physical health of the insane and also for their reputation after their release, that the distinctions in the treatment of the insane should be abolished, and that is looking at it with anxiety for the future of present insane patients. But have you considered the practical difficulties there would be on the one hand of taking such a step as that, and, on the other hand, the disadvantage to the ordinary patient in a hospital? For instance, do you suggest you would have an entire block labelled "insane," or would you have the patients mixed up? Have you balanced the interests of the insane with the interests of the people under your charge?—Yes, I think I have. My view is this, that a very large number of those who under existing circumstances have to be certified and, furthermore, have to be sent to an institution labelled as mental could quite well be treated in the ordinary ward of a hospital with or without certification. A certificate of some kind would only be necessary when you are detaining the patients against their will. Secondly, there is another class of patients whom it might be desirable to put into a separate ward or a separate portion of the ward, provided they were of a class which would not injure the other patients by their proximity; and you would only have to separate those who are actually dangerous, just as we have to separate patients who are infectious. There are many advantages in my view in treating a mental case in a general hospital. First of all, the mental condition may be dependent upon some physical disease, and it seems to me the staff of the general hospital would be much more likely to detect that physical disease and treat it than could be expected from a specialist on mental disease. Secondly, the mental condition may be complicated by physical disease, and here again the staff of the general hospital would much better look after that patient than the staff of a special hospital. Then if patients could be taken to a general institution on account of their condition, I think they would be treated earlier. The fact that they have to go to a special institution deters them from seeking treatment, and I can imagine a patient in the earlier stages of the disease coming willingly into a general hospital, whereas, if they were told that they were to go to a hospital for nerves or mental disease, they would be afraid. That is my point.

2886. You have thought it out?—Yes. There are 1,300 persons chargeable to the guardians on account of illness or sickness, and there are 1,300 suffering from mental disorders.

2887. Sir David Drummond: You referred to a special case where a poor woman was admitted to hospital and you were advised to put her under restraint in a straight jacket. May I take it that is exceptional treatment?—A straight jacket is very rarely used, and is not used in an ordinary manner. It is used by my staff as an aid to restrain the patient, and the patient is not tied down in it. There is less physical exertion to the patient to have a straight jacket in the manner we use it than without.

2888. It occurred to me that perhaps your staff were not quite sufficient in numbers; that is to say, if you had abundant help you would not require such aid?—That is so to an extent, that we are always short of a nursing staff, but in the cases we use it for, as a matter of fact it is less injurious and harmful to the patient in the manner adopted.

2889. You referred to a special examination in the case of people who were violent. What exactly were you referring to?—I was referring to the examination of every case brought in under the Lunacy Act with a view to noting every injury received before treatment. We are bound to examine the patient on admission to mark every sign of injury, and again on transfer to a mental hospital, the patient has to be examined and the injuries noted, so that when a patient is admitted severely bruised, they can trace whether the injury was caused before or after admission and fix the responsibility.

2890. But practically the same examination applies to all?—Yes.

2891. With reference to your practice of certifying people who are suffering from mental symptoms arising from general disorders, do you really think that is the only way you can retain them. You know it is not the common practice throughout the country, do you not, to certify cases of that kind, but they are put into wards and treated. I take it you have not the accommodation for the purpose?—We have very poor facilities for isolation accommodation, which is one of the details which my Board propose to overcome by means of amalgamation. We have no isolation wards attached to the place at all.

2892. To my mind, it is rather an alarming statement to make that people suffering from chronic disease of the heart and so on have to be certified?—It is not every case which has to be certified; it is only a small percentage.

2893. I am referring to mental cases?—They are all mental cases, but from the point of view of certification, if their insanity is due to some known physical condition, I always do my utmost to retain the patient in the infirmary and not transfer him to a mental hospital whether the insanity is due to a mental condition only or not.

2894. Sir Ernest Hiley: Referring to the 111 cases in your table "certified and the order allowed to lapse," that is in round figures, 25 per cent. of the total number of patients certified in the year?—Yes, that is so.

2895. And those certificates were allowed to lapse at the outside at the end of 14 days?—Yes, there were a few, a small percentage of cases, where it is necessary to re-certify in order to retain the patient longer in the infirmary. If, for instance, an insane patient is brought into the infirmary, but his physical condition would not justify his travelling as far as the mental hospital, I certify the patient insane, but unfit to travel.

DR. A. L. BAILY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2896. Notwithstanding that, in 25 per cent. of the cases, you say the patient was discharged certainly as regards his mental condition in about 14 days?—Yes.

2897. And in those cases where he was not absolutely discharged you keep him in the infirmary for medical treatment?—Yes.

2898. In every one of those cases you made a certificate?—In the 111 cases.

2899. Had you communicated that certificate to the patients' relatives, or was it one of those you filed in the office?—I would communicate it to no one except the magistrate.

2900. Have you ever thought what your position is in making a certificate of that sort?—I have always viewed it in this light—if at any time in future that patient or his friends brought an action against me for wrongful detention, I was covered.

2901. Notwithstanding the fact that you would not communicate it to anybody and in 25 per cent. of the cases the man was able to be discharged within 14 days at the outside?—Quite.

2902. You have never been advised, have you, as to your position in making a certificate of that sort?—Yes, I have. I have asked advice, and in my previous evidence I said I thought I knew more under the Lunacy Act than I do now. But I have been advised I was all right as far as that was concerned.

2903. And that you would be protected?—Yes, I imagine so, because it is quite easy to see a patient is temporarily insane.

2904. Supposing you were not an officer of a public institution, but a private practitioner, would you still be protected in giving a certificate of that sort?—I imagine so.

Mr. Jowitt: Why do you think you would be protected under the Public Authorities Protection Act?

2905. Chairman: Surely it must be a mistake. It is not the Public Authorities Protection Act; that Act limits the time within which action may be brought against public authorities?—I imagined, at any rate, I was protected.

2906. Chairman: Yes, but protected by the provisions as to immunity which this Act contains?—Yes.

2907. Sir Ernest Hiley: Because you were acting as an officer of a public authority?—No, I think under the Lunacy Act I am protected as a medical man.

2908. Are not you referring to Section 330 of the Lunacy Act, which protects people who are supposed to be acting in good faith and with reasonable care? The second sub-section deals with it, but of course your point would arise in this way, that this protection is only given to persons acting in pursuance of the Act, but persons acting without the Act would not be protected. However, you have been advised about that?—Yes, I have been advised, but as to the quality of my advice I am not certain.

2909. Do your Board of Guardians know that this is your practice?—I do not know that they do.

2910. Sir David Drummond: Is the fact that 75 per cent of these persons are discharged within 14 days any reflection on your diagnosis?—I do not think patients are brought to the infirmary without some reasonable cause.

2911. But it seems to be a very large number, does it not?—Yes.

2912. Sir Ernest Hiley: I see by your précis, paragraph 19, you say: "I am of opinion that any medical practitioner giving a certificate of any kind ought to be protected as is an expert witness giving evidence on oath." What protection are you referring to there?—I believe I am right in saying that an expert witness giving evidence on oath is protected in an action. I am certain of this, that as far as my own neighbourhood is concerned, there is scarcely a private practitioner who is willing to have anything to do with the Lunacy Acts if he can get out of it.

2913. Chairman: Why is that—is it because of the complication of the Act or the responsibility under the Act?—I think it is because of the actions which have been brought against doctors.

2914. Do they show a reluctance to participate in its administration?—Very strong.

2915. Because of the apprehension that they may get into legal trouble?—Yes. I had a case not very long ago of a patient who was removed at the instance of a private practitioner, who gave a certificate to remove the patient to the observation wards, and I saw the patient. Meanwhile, the officer got into touch with the friends, and it was found out that the patient had means, and therefore should have been put into a private institution. I referred the friends to the general practitioner who had been in charge of the patient, who refused to certify—he refused to sign a certificate under the Lunacy Act.

2916. Why?—Because he said he could not certify that she was insane.

2917. Sir Ernest Hiley: I see you point out the position of the medical practitioner in dealing with Poor Law cases, and you say it should be more clearly defined "further that it ought to be sufficient protection for the public if steps are taken as far as possible to see that the medical practitioners giving certificates under the Lunacy Acts act bonâ-fide and impartially." Have you ever had any doubt on that point at all?—As to what?

2918. As to the protection under the Act?—I have never had any threatened action against myself.

2920. Lord Eustace Percy: I see that of your cases about 20 per cent. come in through the police?—Yes, 90 out of 450.

2921. I think you also say you make a point so far as possible of making both the relieving officer and the police in such cases act on a certificate of the medical practitioner?—It is not my responsibility, but the relieving officer in Lambeth does endeavour to get a medical certificate. But in the case of a police officer he does not have a certificate—the police surgeon I think, is not called in. But that is not my responsibility.

2922. You do not happen to know whether the person detained is usually taken to the police station first?—I suppose he is?—Yes, he is generally taken to the police station first.

2923. Can you tell us whether you have noticed any ill effects in the process of taking people who may be mentally unsound to a police station, and examining him or her there?—I cannot say I have noticed it, but I should have thought on general grounds that it is unfortunate that a mental case should have to be taken to a police station, my view being that a mental case is a sick case.

2924. But you have no definite evidence?—We have no definite evidence.

2925. If the 111 and the 149 cases are taken, it appears that a good deal over 50 per cent. of the cases brought to you under Section 20 should not have been brought, from the point of view of the lunatic—they have been erroneously brought to you in fact?—I agree it would be advisable if there was some other means of bringing those patients to the institution, but there are no means.

2926. In relation to that, in the latter part of your evidence, you mention the Mental Deficiency Act which is rather outside our reference, and you rather indicate that under Sections 36 and 37 it would be possible for you, if you liked to do it, to get over some of the gaps, so to speak, in the Lunacy Acts by using the machinery of the Mental Deficiency Act?—Yes, I have at the moment a patient from prison sent to me whom I have referred to the Mental Deficiency authorities. In the meantime, he is in fact certified.

2927. May I frame my question in this way. You say you yourself have tried to have as little as possible to do with Mental Deficiency cases?—Yes.

2928. But do you know whether generally speaking in workhouses and infirmaries the machinery of the Mental Deficiency Act is in fact used to fill up the gaps in the Lunacy Acts?—It is in fact used. Whether it fills up the gaps it is difficult to say.

2929. Is it possible under the Mental Deficiency Act in practice to certify a case which is uncertifiable under the Lunacy Act, and to reach your end by that means?—Yes, I believe it is possible to certify a patient under the Mental Deficiency Act who could not be certified under the Lunacy Acts, if that is what you mean.

2930. Chairman: I am interested in the general suggestion you made in answer to Sir Humphry—you thought that there should be no distinction, you said, between hospitals for one kind of ailment and hospitals for another kind of ailment, and that mental illness was simply one manifestation of sickness. But has it not been found in practice desirable to have specialised institutions to deal with particular forms of illness. We know of cancer hospitals and epileptic hospitals. Do not you think the concomitants of mental disease are such as to make it desirable to have special treatment?—My own view is that a special institution of any kind is much better as a department of a general institution than as an isolated unit.

2931. Is that on the ground of the stigma which may be associated with the special institution?—No, not on that ground only—on the ground of general treatment, I think it is better for a patient to be under the staff of a general institution than a specialist.

2932. You are aware that there is a strong view that mental illness is such that it would be desirable to have practitioners in this work specially trained. Do you think it desirable that people suffering from a particular class of mental ailment should be treated along with all the other patients in a general hospital by a staff which has no special knowledge?—Yes, provided they have the assistance of a specialist consultant.

2933. Then you would invoke the consultant who would be a person not constantly in the institution, to come and give advice to the staff who had merely ordinary qualifications in the matter?—Yes, because there is nothing to prevent some members of the resident staff having special training.

2934. Is it not the case that it is an incident of mental disease that you must have special forms of treatment—for example, the curative effects of open-air treatment and farming are found to be very great. You could hardly have a farm associated with a city general hospital, could you?—No, but we have convalescent homes for our city hospitals, and there is no reason why you should not have a general home to which patients could go. In fact, in many cases brought to me, probably a convalescent home would meet the case.

2936. I am rather exploring what seemed to me to be the difficulties of your view. I think you will have the assent of us all in this, that one wants to diminish the difference between mental and other illness. Brain disease is like any other disease, but it has the feature of disturbing the responsibility of the citizen. To go a little further, do not you think again the symptoms in many cases of mental illness are such as to render it undesirable to associate them with the ordinary rational patients of the surgical or medical class which enter the hospital?—Not necessarily all of them. I think you could divide mental cases into three classes; and quite a considerable number, including the patients as to whom I allow the orders to lapse, could be treated in a general ward without harming others at all. There would be a section to be separately treated in a separate ward, and there would be still another section of incurable cases who might be treated in a separate block or if necessary in a separate institution. But you never remove the stigma if you put them into a special institution, and I think you could do a great deal towards that if you keep them in a general institution.

2937. But some form of warrant would be necessary, because these people would be retained against their will in the hospital. If it is the character of the place of residence which gives the stigma, the asylum taint, as it is called, would not the hospital attract that in turn?—Surely if the certification is an official document, it is not so likely to cause a stigma. Take for example what is being done at the time. In the case of the aged, at the present time there is at Tooting Bec a very large number of people certified as insane, and you cannot get there unless you are certified. They are shortly going to admit the old patients uncertified into a home for the aged. Now supposing that home for the aged has got certified and uncertified patients mixed, no one will know who is certified and who is not.

2938. Then it looks to me that your point is, you object to the segregation of mental cases and treatment apart—you would have them lumped with all other cases?—Yes; I think that is the only way of overcoming the stigma.

2939. Your motive is to get rid of the idea of the stigma?—Yes, and also, I think, their treatment would be better. I know nothing about the treatment in mental cases at the present time, but it seems to me to stand to reason that patients who have got a general staff in charge of them must receive better treatment than patients who have a special staff only—because, after all, surgical conditions may arise in the insane, and if they are under the care of a general staff, surely it must be better.

2940. They may get better treatment if they have surgical or medical ailments, but much worse treatment if there are mental disabilities which they are there for?—No, because if you had a general hospital equipped to deal with mental cases as well as others, there would be a mental specialist attached to the hospital to treat the patients, and I think with the conjunction of a general man and a specialist we are likely to find out more about a case of mental disorder than the specialist himself.

2941. We will hear what the specialists say about that; but I suggest for your consideration, if we are able to devise some method of eliminating the element of stigma from asylum residence, these specialised institutions afford the best means of treating this class of case, and that your point about the general health of the patients might well be met by arranging for the specialised staff calling in the aid of surgeons or physicians from the general hospitals in the district to treat patients who require such treatment. That is done, as we know, in cases where a patient develops appendicitis, and the medical attendant, who may not have performed the operation for years, invokes the assistance of another surgeon?—But surely the invoking of the assistance may come very much later when the diagnosis has to be made by a specialist.

DR. A. L. Baly, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

to detect what a mental specialist would put down at once as a case of insanity?—Of course, there are a large number of cases in general hospitals who are uncertified, and if there were a mental specialist attached to the hospital, there would be more persons certified.

2943. May I suggest your experience has been confined almost to a floating population, that you are having a constant stream of people through your wards, and you are not dealing with them for a long period?—No, and that is why I say that if power were given to detain cases for a longer period, I should have to ask, and would ask, for proper accommodation and special consultants.

2944. But for the moment it seems to me the people you meet with in your mental wards are in your hands, either for three days or for three days plus fourteen days, or an additional period if you have them re-certified, but in any event are they there for any prolonged period?—No.

2945. So that you are really a sort of clearing-house through which the cases pass; you do not profess to provide any treatment?—No.

2946. Nor do you profess to have experience of dealing with cases over a long period of observation?—No.

2947. With regard to what you call re-certifying, I am a little puzzled to know what is the reason for that. You have an order justifying detention for 14 days, which you obtain quite correctly. When that expires, do you ask the justices to give you another order?—Yes, I have done so in a few cases.

2948. Can you suggest to me any authority there is for a series of orders of that sort?—I do not know whether I could name the authority, but surely if the patient has been certified, and the order has been suspended and has not been acted upon, the patient would become a free agent, and if it is necessary to take that freedom away, the procedure would be to repeat what has been already done.

2949. You see it would repeat 14 days' orders ad infinitum?—Yes, you could do so.

2950. I doubt very much if that was contemplated. I suggest that the 14 days' suspension is intended to enable a decision to be reached as to whether the case should be discharged into the world or sent to permanent detention?—The cases in which I have used it are cases which are unfit for removal. Therefore, the order having expired, I must make another.

2951. By unfit you mean physically unfit. But in that case the patient ought to be removed, ought he not, to the general wards?—Not if he is insane.

2952. But that begs the question. If he is discovered to be insane during the time, then you would have a certificate; but you would not require to go to the justices again. There is provision made for keeping him until you can send him on, is there not?—Is there?

2953. In Section 19, Sub-section (2) of the Act of 1890 it says: "If a medical practitioner who examines a lunatic as to whom a summary reception order has been made, certifies in writing that the lunatic is not in a fit state to be removed, the removal shall be suspended until the same or some other medical practitioner certifies in writing that the lunatic is fit to be removed."—Then I have acted on the safe side in bringing the matter periodically before a magistrate. I did not know I could obtain an order under which I could keep a patient for an indefinite period.

Earl Russell: You can keep him until you certify that he is fit to be removed.

2954. Chairman: Have you any special association of doctors in charge of workhouse infirmaries?—Yes.

2955. Because you speak of having received some legal advice. Does your association obtain legal advice as to your powers and duties?—No. I can always get legal advice from the Medical Defence Union, but the advice I have obtained has been from various Lunacy Commissioners.

2956. With regard to your nursing staff, have you an adequate staff to cope with the cases which come to you at present?—I do not think any institution has an adequate staff of nurses at the present time.

2957. That is a sweeping statement. You do not find yourselves efficiently staffed?—You cannot get them. I cannot get the number of nurses we are entitled to have.

2958. When you say that you cannot get them, do you mean that the financial resources of your institution will not run to them, or that the class from whom they are drawn provides inadequate recruits?—I do not think the nursing profession is attracting a sufficient number of nurses.

2959. Then it is not a question of financial stringency?—No, except that I suppose if you pay enough you would draw them.

2960. No doubt, if you offered attractive terms you would bring more people into the profession. But what I mean is, if you have felt the want of additional staff, have you approached your authority in order to get additional nurses?—Yes.

2961. And have you obtained their sanction to do so?—We obtained sanction to increase the number of the staff quite recently, but so far we have not filled the vacancies.

2962. Why not?—Because we cannot get the staff.

2963. On the terms you can offer?—And recently the terms have been improved.

2964. So that it is not a case of the administrative body starving you of nurses, but the difficulty of getting nurses on the terms you are able to offer?—I think if I were to ask for all the nurses I thought I would require, the administrative authority would object.

2965. One can believe that, because everyone wants to be perfect in his own sphere; but your demands have been acceded to, and your difficulty has been to get the personnel?—Yes.

2966. Do you think that is due to the terms which are offered?—I think it is due to the remuneration of the nursing profession when they are trained. I think they are inadequately paid throughout, and it does not attract sufficient numbers.

2967. You speak of it as a profession. What sort of applicants present themselves to you to be taken on as nurses?—They are very variable; a good many may come from the provinces.

2968. But what have they been doing before—what qualifications have they for taking on this work?—I do not know that they have any particular qualification.

2969. Do they start as probationers?—They start as probationers.

2970. And they are placed under responsible nurses who have been with you?—Yes.

2971. Just as when nurses are taken on in a hospital?—Yes, exactly the same.

2972. Will you tell us the scale of remuneration, dealing only with your Poor Law infirmary?—Yes. The untrained probationers who are coming to learn their profession are paid £105 spread over three years. That is for women.

2973. Mr. Jowitt: How do you mean, spread over three years?—It is £30, £35 and £40, paid in three years.

2974. And their keep?—And their keep.

2975. Chairman: At what age do they come?—21. When they have got their certificates, the trained sisters receive from £70 rising to £90; that is the sister in charge of a ward.

2976. Sir Thomas Hutchison: With uniform?—Yes, everything found.

Mr. Snell: How are the men recruits obtained?—The present men were partly recruited from the R.A.M.C. in the war.

2977. Lord Eustace Percy: Does not service in your infirmary qualify for a certificate?—Yes.

2978. And they are entitled to be registered?—Yes, and they can, if they like to stay on, get their Central Midwives' Board certificate, and a few get the Incorporated Society of Massage certificate.

2979. Miss Symons: Would they, once they had obtained a certificate in your infirmary, be eligible for nursing anyone?—Yes, they are trained nurses, and are registered as such.

DR. A. L. BALY, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

2980. Chairman: There is another aspect of their life I should like to ask about. What amenities of life have they? Have they social rooms or anything of that kind?—Yes, there is a nurses' home.

2981. In the building?—Yes, in the building, with the usual recreation room and smoking room.

2982. For the ladies?—Yes.

2983. One has to cater for new developments nowadays?—Yes, and they have a tennis court, not a very good one.

2984. And the hours of labour?—The hours of labour are 55 a week, I think.

2985. And what vacations?—Three weeks when they are probationers, and the trained staff have three weeks too, but if they have been with us five years they get a month.

2986. Earl Russell: Are these pensionable appointments?—Yes, they have an option when they first come whether they will go on the pension scheme.

2987. Chairman: Is it a contributory scheme?—Yes.

2988. Will you tell us exactly what you feel about your own staff—I am not asking about individuals, but are you satisfied generally with the efficiency of the staff?—I am satisfied with the general efficiency of the female staff. As to the male staff, I have found them a great deal better since I put them in charge of a sister. I put a sister in charge of the male observation ward, with male attendants to assist her. I feel more secure with her in charge than I did when there was a man in charge.

2989. How have you reached that conviction?—I do not know how I reached that conviction exactly, but I never felt, when I had a man in charge of that ward, quite secure that they treated the patients as they should always treat them.

2990. Do you think women are better as nurses of the insane?—I have no experience of the treatment, but I feel more satisfied with my ward with a woman in charge of it than when I had a man.

2991. Is it because you can place more reliance on her?—Yes.

2992. She has a greater sense of responsibility?—Yes.

2993. Is it a case of the individual woman, or is it your general observation?—I think it is a general observation. I have had several women now who have taken their turn. Of course the sister cannot always be in my observation ward, especially as I have only one on the male side, so she is in charge of the receiving ward on the same floor.

2994. You prefer to delegate your responsibility to a woman rather than a man?—Yes, I do.

2995. In your own experience?—In my own experience.

2996. Is there no liability to friction on that account?—I have had none at all.

2997. Is the scale of pay different for the men and women?—Yes, it is. The men are non-resident to begin with, and so they are paid accordingly.

2998. What do the men get?—I am not quite sure. I think the juniors get about £3 5s. a week, and the seniors somewhere about £4 a week.

2998A. And they get their meals, I suppose, while in the institution, and live out otherwise?—They live out otherwise.

2999. Do they get uniforms?—They get uniforms.

3000. I want to ask you what are the subjects which are obligatory for the purpose of examination for L.R.C.P. and M.R.C.S. in matters dealing with mental diseases? You have been through the usual medical curriculum?—I have.

3001. Where did you graduate?—The University College Hospital, London, and did part of my work at Cambridge.

3002. In your curriculum, what lectures did you attend in connection with mental disorders?—I attended a course of lectures at a mental hospital, given by a mental specialist.

3003. Was that obligatory for the purpose of your degree?—Yes.

3004. Was it a half course?—I forget how many I attended, but I had to sign up as having attended a course of lectures on insanity by a specialist.

3005. Apart from the lectures which you attended, had you any clinical work?—No; the lectures were given at a mental hospital, and we were shown patients.

3006. Mr. Jowitt: There was no examination?—No, there was no examination in my time.

3007. Chairman: On the subject of examination, had you to pass in insanity among other subjects?—I think questions were asked on the subject.

3008. But there was no separate paper?—There was no separate paper.

3009. It was not one of the examinations?—I remember certain questions about the certification of lunatics.

Sir David Drummond: May I suggest that this is a general question with regard to the qualifications of medical men, and you are questioning the witness with regard to the examination of the two Royal Colleges. Would it not be possible to consider the qualifications of medical men as a whole, and have the subject gone into by a witness who can speak for all the bodies. In asking these questions we are only inquiring into the witness's qualifications?

Chairman: We are to have a witness who can tell us about the curricula of all the examining bodies.

These questions were put with a view of ascertaining the medical qualifications of a person who could sign a medical certificate.

But we shall have a witness later on who will tell us the extent of training which each graduate undergoes before he begins to practise.

Thank you very much, Dr. Baly.

(The Witness withdrew.)

DR. J. DUDGEON GILES, O.B.E., M.D., called and examined.

3010. Chairman: You are a Doctor of Medicine of Edinburgh?—Yes.

3011. Are you Medical Superintendent of Salford Union Infirmary?—Yes.

3012. Is that a Poor Law Infirmary?—Yes, it is a Poor Law Infirmary.

3013. Is it an institution distinct from the work-house of Salford?—It is separated from the work-house.

3014. By separation do you mean locally?—It is under a separate Poor Law Order, and is separated by distance—it is a separate institution.

3015. In that institution do you deal with all cases of infirmity and sickness of pauper patients?—We do.

3016. To what extent have you opportunities of dealing with mental cases?—We have about 180 beds.

3017. How many wards?—Three wards.

3018. Which of them are male and which female?—There is one male ward with about 70 beds in it, and for females there are two, one with 70 and another with 30 beds.

3019. Are these three wards under the same roof with the rest of your wards?—Yes, they are part of the hospital.

3020. In addition to the wards, have you any accommodation, or do you include under wards, rooms where patients have to be confined alone—a padded room or anything of the sort?—They are close to the ward in each case.

3021. How long have you been at this institution?—Nine years.

3022. As medical superintendent?—Yes.

3023. Were you there before in any other capacity?—No.

4 November, 1924.]

DR. J. DUDGEON GILES.

3024. When you first went there, had you any special experience of dealing with insanity?—No. What I had was learnt in Poor Law—three resident Poor Law appointments.

3025. Had you had some experience as a general practitioner before?—I had not.

3026. You had always been in the employment of some Poor Law authority?—I was always doing hospital work.

3027. And when you came to be medical superintendent of this infirmary you found there was a mental side to it?—Yes, as there had been in places I had been in before. I had been chief medical officer of two such before I came to Salford.

3028. How many patients altogether have you in Salford?—Just under 900.

3029. And how many of these would one find in the mental ward?—We have about 180 beds, but some of them are vacant. Perhaps 150 we average altogether.

3030. Will you tell us, as shortly as you can, how you work out the provisions of the Lunacy Act in the administration of your infirmary on the mental side?—By far the majority of the patients come in on a three days' certificate or relieving officer's order. We practically never have a justice's 14 days' order case at Salford, as it happens. Again, the majority of these cases so admitted are subjected to a further 14 days' order for observation. A considerable number are also admitted direct on the 14 days' order of the medical officer or sent up from another ward in the hospital where they have developed mental symptoms.

3031. Transferred cases?—Yes. At the end of the 14 days' under Section 24, Form 10, we make it a practice in all cases which are not fit for discharge, that is to say, discharge from the Lunacy Act altogether and from the mental wards, of putting them under permanent detention, unless they are suitable for an asylum.

3032. We have heard from Dr. Baly that he resorts frequently to the suspension of the summary reception order in order to give him the 14 days required for observation. In some cases of dubiety do you resort to that?—No, we do not.

3033. You go direct to Section 21, and get a 14 days' order under it?—Direct to the permanent detention order.

3034. Then you go direct to Section 24?—Yes.

3035. This is really a section expressed negatively, that no one is to be allowed to remain in a work-house unless certain facts are certified by the medical officer?—Yes.

3036. You have got the patient in your infirmary on the mental side for three days; before the three days expire you certify in the terms of Section 24, and then, that being done, you may detain for 14 days?—Yes.

3037. And you must not detain for more than 14 days without getting a special order?—We get the special order during the 14 days, or at the expiration of that 14 days, and put them on a detention order, unless they are certifiable for removal to an asylum.

3038. Do you find that of the people brought in on the three days' order many need detention under Section 24 for a further period of 14 days for observation?—Yes; 55 per cent. of the patients admitted in that way are detained for 14 days.

3039. Will you state your percentage of results?—Eighty per cent. of the patients coming in come in under Section 20.

3040. These are three days' order people?—Yes, three days' order people. Then 55 per cent. of the patients thus admitted are placed under a further detention for 14 days.

3041. That looks as if 40 per cent. of all your patients came under a Section 24 order?—Yes.

3042. Are some of the patients discharged within the currency of the three days?—Yes. I find about 1.7 per cent. are discharged within the three days.

3043. Rather less than two out of 100?—Yes.

3044. On what grounds are those people released?—I take it these are cases which Dr. Baly was talking about—delirious, or with a slight mental confusion which is cleared up quickly, or where the physical disability is greater, and where one transfers them to an ordinary ward for treatment.

3045. Would there be alcoholic cases included?—There might be, but not many.

3046. Then those cases leave your mental wards without any certification at all?—Yes.

3047. Do you take them before a magistrate before disposing of them?—No.

3048. In that you differ from Dr. Baly; you regard yourselves as entitled to discharge them within the three days without bringing them before a magistrate?—Yes.

3049. Then they pass out of your hands?—Yes.

3050. Then you are left with a residue of 98 per cent. to dispose of, and of those you tell us a substantial number are detained for 14 days. What about the others, in whose cases you do not get a Section 24 order. You say 80 per cent. come under Section 20; 55 per cent. of that 80 per cent. are further detained for 14 days under Section 24. How do you dispose of the others?—I am afraid I have not worked that out very clearly.

3051. I confess I had a little difficulty in arriving at the disposal of the patients. You have provided us with a table at the end of your proof?—Some of the 35 per cent. left would be certified and transferred to mental hospitals straight away. Some would come under that heading. I do not think any would come under the permanent detention—they would probably all be detained for a 14 days' observation, and there would be a very few who had died.

3052. And some, of course, have been discharged, as you have explained?—Yes, that is a very small percentage.

3053. Earl Russell: Is this correct—358 out of 2,180 die? That is one in seven. Do they die in the 14 days?—No, that is spread over the whole five years.

3054. Lord Eustace Percy: Is the last figure for 1923 accurate, that there were 475 cases, and 218 discharged within 17 days?—Yes.

3055. That is roughly half of the admissions?—Yes.

3056. Chairman: I observe they are discharged in the care of relatives?—We always discharge them in the care of relatives.

3057. Does that mean that they may be certified cases, but cases in which relatives are able to take charge of them?—No; it means they are fit to go out.

3058. Because one knows provision is made for actually certified cases being handed over to relatives, where the relatives are able to look after them?—That does not apply to those cases.

3059. When you say discharged, you mean discharged because they are no longer appropriate to be dealt with under the Lunacy Acts?—Yes.

3060. Earl Russell: Do you mean this figure 63 "died" in 1923 to be out of 475?—Yes.

3061. It is a very large number, is it not?—The percentage works out at 15 per cent. of admissions during the five years—15 per cent. die during the time they are under detention.

3062. Chairman: The table is rather difficult to follow. There must be some overlapping, surely?—Yes, I quite admit that; it was done while I was away by my clerk, and I have not had an opportunity of making it quite logical since I have been back.

3063. What I would like to see would be a table showing the cases reaching you in the course of a year, and what happens to those cases, and how they were dealt with and disposed of. Some within three days would leave altogether, and you hear no more of them?—Yes.

3064. Some again would go to asylums, there again passing out of your province?—Yes.

3065. Some would be detained under 14 days' orders and for observation by you during that period, and in consequence of that observation they would be discharged or sent to an asylum. One would like the analyses made out in that way?—I admit this is not a clear statistical statement. I have not had time to go over it properly and make it as I would like to. I sent it as a rough idea of what happens.

4 November, 1924.]

DR. J. DUDGEON GILES.

3066. Perhaps in the meantime you will give us what is of value—your own experience which you can speak to. Do you ever have such re-certification as has been referred to by Dr. Baly?—No, practically not. If one order lapses without any definite step being possible, we discharge the patient altogether, and try him for a day or two. If the symptoms are still definite, then we take the matter up de novo, probably by issuing a medical officer's certificate for 14 days' observation in the lunacy wards.

3067. So that you do not have a continuous series of orders such as seem to be resorted to by Dr. Baly?—No. The only case I have known where an order has been suspended is where a patient has been certified for removal to an asylum, and where for physical reasons the order has had to be suspended, pending the recovery of the patient or otherwise from some physical ailment.

3068. In your case the population in your mental wards is constantly changing?—Yes, that is so.

3069. You will have nobody in your wards who has been there longer than the maximum of 17 days?—No, we have a considerable number who have been there many years, who have been there on permanent detention. There is a background of chronic cases all the time, and a series of floating populations always passing through.

3070. So that of those who come in, some pass into the class of those who are permanently detained, as they may be in a workhouse infirmary under Section 24 of the Act?—Yes.

3071. That requires, does it not, an outside medical certificate?—Yes.

3072. And you get that in these cases?—Yes, and I should add here that none of the staff of my hospital do any certification beyond the 14 days. All the further certification for further detention or removal is done by an outside medical man in addition to our own medical officer's certificate.

3073. Then that is one of the ways in which the cases coming into your hands are disposed of—by permanent detention?—Yes.

3074. And therefore you have always a background of these cases?—Yes.

3075. What influences you in deciding that the case is one for permanent detention?—They are mostly senile cases, or cases of mild chronic dementia which are not likely to give us any trouble, and are fairly well in health.

3076. Is not there another feature one should bear in mind too—are there not cases in which the prognosis is more or less hopeless—that is to say, it is the class of case which you regard as chronic, which would be probably as well dealt with in your mental wards as they would be in an asylum?—Yes.

3077. Have you any facilities for the treatment of mental cases in your establishment?—Not very much. For ordinary observation we have, but not for anything beyond that.

3078. Are those cases which you relegate for permanent detention cases which do not require treatment in a medical sense?—I think one may safely say they are.

3079. Then as regards the passing through population, are those all persons who are awaiting disposal in one or other of the methods provided?—Yes.

3080. We are interested to know the extent to which that interval of time results in persons leaving your wards without certification at all—that period of observation must result, I take it, in a number of cases never reaching certification at all?—Yes; there are a good number who never reach the stage of permanent certification.

3081. They reach you on a three days' order, and after that, to justify detention for the 14 days, there has to be, has there not, a certificate?—Yes.

3082. Is that your certificate?—Yes, that is the medical officer's 14 days' certificate.

3083. That is a certificate of insanity, is it not?—Yes, I take it that it is a certificate of insanity.

3084. Is the person described as a certified person? You see, the terms of the certificate are that he is a lunatic?—Yes.

3085. Before you can obtain this 14 days' observation period, you have first of all to make up your mind apparently that a case is one of insanity?—Yes, and that there are sufficient symptoms to justify detention for further observation.

3086. A little further than that, is it not?—Yes.

3087. Does it not seem putting the cart before the horse—first of all certifying that a man is a lunatic, and then putting him under observation to see whether he is or not?—Yes.

3088. You have experienced, as others who have preceded you in the witness chair have experienced, embarrassment owing to the way in which the programme of events is set out in the statute?—Yes, that is so.

3089. Then I take it you would be an advocate of a system which allowed you a period of observation before certification?—Yes, undoubtedly.

3090. Would it be necessary, having regard to the character of the case we are dealing with, that some power of restraint would have to be possessed by you during that interval of time?—Yes, I think that would be necessary, both on account of the patient's own efforts and also of the efforts of the relative. One has to say often: "You cannot take this man out; he is under the Lunacy Act, and he is not like a man where you can say, 'I will take him out.'" We have the power to say that patients may be detained for observation.

3091. And at present you arm yourself with an authority to detain, by granting a certificate that a person is insane and ought to be detained?—That is so.

3092. At the same time you recognise the desirability of having an opportunity of studying the case, and making up your mind whether it really is a case for which there should be a permanent order or not?—Yes.

3093. You tell us that a number of the cases subject to a 14 days' order actually recover in your hands, and are sent away?—Yes.

3095. Have you thought out yourself as to how some system of provisional detention might work in dealing with the rate-aided patients who come under your care?—I do not know that there is anything more necessary than an alteration of the wording as you suggest, so that the certificate is not so worded that you certify them actually as lunatics, but really only that you want them to be under observation for a period.

3096. Would you be in favour of what I have called the programme—that is to say, the series of steps which the statute lays down, being simplified and unified?—I certainly should.

3097. Have you found embarrassment in reconciling the different sections of the Act dealing with pauper patients?—Yes; it is a difficult Act to understand, and what one has done is to take the apparently easy and simple way of relying on practically what I have suggested.

3098. Then I take it you would welcome a simplification of the code which would give you a more uniform method of dealing with cases?—Yes.

3099. And you would regard it as essential that any amendment of the code should provide for some provisional method of detention, preferably without certification?—Quite.

3100. Lord Eustace Percy: Taking these 218 cases which were discharged, were many of them well enough to consent to coming into the infirmary and staying there?—At the beginning, do you mean, of the period?

4 November, 1924.]

Dr. J. DUDGEON GILES.

3101. Yes.—That is rather a difficult question to answer from memory. I should think a pretty big proportion of them would be able to give their own voluntary consent to come in for observation.

3102. Do you find the person who is brought in in that kind of state objects very often to staying?—No, not a large proportion of them object.

3103. I am asking, of course, because there always will be a tremendous difficulty in providing for compulsory detention, and I am wondering how far the compulsory power is really necessary?—I think it is. One finds a good deal of difficulty with the relatives especially in the lower class of society; the less educated they are the more difficult it is to deal with them. I dare say perhaps I was wrong in saying the bulk of the patients are in a proper state to ask them for their consent or otherwise. However quickly they may clear up, probably on the day they come in they are very excited, and cannot be properly examined.

3104. Does that condition, do you think, arise from the method in which they have been brought to you by the relieving officer?—No, I do not think so to any extent.

3105. Chairman: I suppose that is one of the difficulties in dealing with this class of malady; and it is very difficult to value the consent of a patient?—Yes. As the patients come to us now we get a certain number of cases of neurasthenia or nervous breakdown, and at that stage a patient is not in a state to give a proper valid consent to being put under observation or treatment, with a view to definite mental symptoms coming on.

3106. If there is no power to control or retain, the consent which has been given you may equally be withdrawn at any moment?—That is so. You may have a patient whose symptoms you are just beginning to find out who decides to go off, and you know that will involve in the near future another and worse breakdown, whereas a week or two of observation will clear them up definitely.

3107. They wish to go away peremptorily, and so destroy the benefit they have received?—Yes.

3108. Although you might be able to get consent from a number of patients, you wish to have the power retained because a patient might withdraw his consent at any moment?—Yes, and the first consent should be a consent for a definite period of time—limited but definite—and during that period a patient should be at the disposal of the medical officer.

3109. It always must be a matter of the value of that consent, and the difficulty is to place any value on the consent of such a patient at all?—I was thinking at the time rather of the pre-mental conditions. When cases come in and are mental at the time of coming in, the consent is valueless, but I am thinking of what might happen in the future, where you could get the consent from a patient before the actual mental condition had arisen.

3110. Then you are looking forward to this: If provisions were made for treatment without certification of cases, it would encourage many cases being brought forward for treatment at a much earlier stage?—That is so.

3111. Do people delay bringing in cases for treatment or detention because of the present bogey of certification to which the patient would be subject?—Yes, I think perhaps some people are influenced in that way. There is a general feeling of dislike at having anything to do with an asylum or with the Lunacy Act.

3112. Sir David Drummond: How would you classify the majority of people who are discharged within 14 days?—From memory I find that question a little difficult to answer, but I should think they would be mostly cases of mild melancholia, and some of them senile cases—cases which sometimes clear up and the patient can be sent to an ordinary ward, and then there are a few puerperal cases which clear up within a week or so.

3113. There are no alcoholic cases?—No, not a great many.

3114. Chairman: I should like to ask whether you yourself have felt in administering the law that there are any difficulties as to the existing arrangements to which you would like to draw our attention; because we want to understand the practical conditions. Have you any observations to make for our assistance on that matter?—I do not think so. I think I have put down in my proof everything I wish to say, and I do not think there is very much to add.

3115. Apart from the Act of Parliament, have you found in your administration that you have been able to do good work to your own satisfaction and unhampered?—Yes. I think we have worked under the existing system pretty well.

3116. But what you would like, I take it, is that we should simplify the system for your legal guidance?—Yes.

3117. And also improve the system by providing for observational treatment without certification?—Yes.

3118. If the system were simplified and new provisions were made, would you think yourself adequately equipped to deal with the situation?—Yes, I think so.

3119. Mr. Jowitt: Will you turn to the table at the end of your proof and take the year 1923. There you give a figure of 475 new cases admitted, 153 permanent detention cases under Section 24, 156 certified and transferred to mental hospitals, 63 died, 64 were transferred to ordinary wards, 25 were discharged within three days to the care of relatives, and 218 were discharged within 17 days. You will let us have an elaboration with regard to those figures as you promised?—Yes.

3120. 218 cases, you say, were discharged within 17 days. I take it that is 218 cases out of the 475 new cases admitted, which is a percentage of, roughly, 50—do you follow that?—Yes.

3121. Have you formed any opinion from your long experience that in certain cases relatives are anxious to put on one side people belonging to them?—I have found that kind of thing very little, and there are very few cases where I have even suspected any inclination to put people on one side.

3122. But have you come across cases where that has occurred?—Yes, I have, but very occasionally.

3123. Can you give us any percentage figure at all?—No.

3124. Would it be something like half-a-dozen times in the course of your experience?—I should think only half-a-dozen times within the last five years.

3125. That is your impression?—That is my impression, out of the 2,180 cases given in the table.

3126. It is quite negligible?—Yes, I think so.

3127. Do you find among the poorer classes that there is a great horror and a feeling of stigma attaching to a case of mental disease?—Yes, and that is one argument in favour of having an observation ward attached to a general hospital; but they willingly consent to come to our place, the Hope Hospital, although they are much opposed to the idea if you say they must be certified and sent on to an asylum.

3128. Do you know why it is that the poorer classes regard this mental disease with a greater horror than they do an ordinary physical disease?—No. I do not.

3129. But it is the fact?—It is the fact, and it is not confined to the poorer classes, because we get a good many of the lower middle class and the middle class people with whom it is just as strong.

3130. And that, you think, would be alleviated by treatment in a ward of a general hospital?—Yes. As far as my observation goes, I do not find myself in accord with Dr. Baly further than that.

3131. The practical difficulty in combining the two things together is that you think it would be undesirable?—Yes. In fact, I should like to see the permanent detention cases taken out of hospital once they have become definitely mental cases, and I would rather they were not detained in a general hospital at all. In saying that I do not wish to include the senile cases, because many of them are just as well off, if not better off, in our hospitals than they would be in an asylum.

DR. J. DUDGEON GILES.

3132. Chairman: One was rather struck with the statement that the asylums are very fully populated at present, and they are, of course, specialised institutions where curative means are, or ought to be, available. Do you not apprehend that if you have a large number of these chronic cases occupying beds in these highly specialised asylums, they might further aggravate the shortage of accommodation and make it difficult to get treatment for the cases which are more hopeful?—Quite. Of course there are difficulties whichever way you look at it.

3133. Mr. Jowitt: And if you have people suffering from mental diseases in the general wards of the hospitals?—We could not do that administratively.

3134. Do you suffer from the same difficulty with regard to assistants as Dr. Baly?—No. We have been pretty successful in getting female nurses, and for the last couple of years we have had a very satisfactory male staff as well. We have a male staff and a female staff and the idea of putting a sister in charge of the male staff has not been thought of at all at our hospital.

3135. And your staff is as large as you can afford?—It is quite adequate, I think. On the male side we have a head attendant and three charge attendants who are all trained men, and the others we have trained ourselves.

3136. What medical staff have you got under you?—There are four resident doctors in addition to myself.

3137. Have you special facilities, if you so desire, for getting any outside assistance you may want?—Yes, the guardians would make no difficulty about that.

3138. And do you in fact?—No, not in relation to mental cases, because there the specialist is at a mental hospital, and it is not easy to get the staff of another hospital to help him.

3139. Mr. Snell: If the period of observation were increased, would the numbers of curable cases be possibly increased also in your opinion?—I think on my figures it probably would be the case because, as I was saying, after the 14 days under the medical officer's certificate we immediately put a patient on permanent detention, but many of these cases are not detained for more than two, three, or four weeks. A great many are brought before the Committee formally, and are discharged within a few weeks of their being put on permanent detention.

3140. Is it right to assume that, while a proportion of the cases may be accurately diagnosed in the 14 days, there is a proportion of cases that ought to have a longer period assigned to them?—Yes, I think there is no doubt about it.

3141. Have you in your mind any period of extension of the observation stage as being desirable?—I think 28 days would be desirable, though perhaps not in every case, but the period may be laid down as not exceeding a month, so that you could have a month during which you would have provisional control.

3142. During the period they are under observation, of whatever kind it may be, do the patients receive any treatment in the event of their being out of physical condition?—Oh, yes; they would be treated medically all the time.

3143. Supposing a case of acute neurasthenia, would treatment for 14 days help the patient?—It might help him, but a month would be better.

3144. You think the patient might respond sufficiently to treatment?—Yes, and there is one recommendation which I put forward in my précis, that it should be made compulsory on the authorities and institutions receiving patients under Section 20 to make the accommodation for these short-term cases quite separate from the wards allocated for the treatment of permanent detention cases. At present we have to treat the short-term observation cases in the same ward in which are confined the permanent detention cases.

3145. Chairman: That is an undesirable state of things, I should think, because you bring the mild cases which may be cured altogether into contact with the depressing surroundings of the chronic cases?—Yes, that is so. The Commissioners might ask, why have you not asked the guardians to do this, but I think if one had the authority of a recommendation of the Commission behind one in making such a request to the guardians, it would be done. It could be done, although like most poor law hospitals, we are short of room. If pressure were brought to bear and representations were made, I think it would be done.

3146. Of course one sees this difficulty, that if you have only one male ward available to you, in which your chronic male cases are confined and into which is being introduced a very different class of case, those other cases of acute mania might develop into melancholia, or something of that sort, so that it would be somewhat unfortunate if they should all have to be in the same ward?—Yes, and that is why I recommend that provision should be made for separating them.

3147. But to put the chronic cases amongst those which are not chronic you think is not desirable?—Yes, but here I suggest that we should be in consultation on the spot with the local mental hospital, so that we can work out a system of better dealing with the observation cases as well as the permanent detention cases.

3148. Of course it is quite impossible for you in the poor law infirmary to have special wards for special cases?—Quite, but more could be done than is being done if the job were tackled, I am sure.

3149. Mr. Snell: Is it at all likely that any system could be devised for caring for those people who have been under observation, or would it be possible to reduce the number of certified cases?—Yes, I think it might be.

3150. How far is the objection to treatment in a mental hospital due to general antipathy to Poor Law institutions, do you think? You said that your experience was that the antipathy existed equally among middle-class people as among the poor people. Is there a decided antipathy to Poor Law institutions because it is associated with the Poor Law?—I think that that feeling is dying out, and what I said was that, though they willingly come into our place for observation, they are much opposed to being sent to the asylum. It is a Poor Law question, but the prejudice is dying out in localities.

3151. Mrs. Mathew: I want to know what you meant by the phrase "trying them out" which you used some little time ago. Do you mean letting them out on trial, or what do you mean?—We have no authority for that, really, under the Lunacy Act, but I do not quite remember what the context of that remark was.

3152. I think you were talking about the 1-7 per cent., and you used the words "trying them out"?—Very often within the three days a case is transferred from the mental ward to another ward in our own hospital in order to test a patient's condition before actually deciding.

3153. Chairman: And that occurs within the three days?—Yes, sometimes it does.

3154. Sir David Drummond: Did you hear Dr. Baly say that at Lambeth the only means they had of detaining some of these cases of general disorder for mental treatment was by certifying them?—Yes.

3155. That is not the case with you?—We do not find that difficulty. In cases of delirium which are sent from the general local hospital, as far as we possibly can if the patients are at all manageable, we treat them in the ordinary wards. Occasionally we do have to send them up to the mental wards if they become violent.

3156. If you had the staff you desire, you could treat them in the ordinary way?—No, it is not a question of staff. We could put on special nurses if necessary, but some cases are such that you cannot manage them in an ordinary ward, and I have always gone on the principle that you cannot put a man into the mental ward at all without certifying him in some form or other. It is very rare, but occasionally we do get a case where a man is mentally afflicted to such an extent that you have to treat the mental symptoms as predominating for the time being.

3157. Lord Eustace Percy: With regard to poor law treatment, you said you have a certain number of neurasthenia cases coming into the general wards. I suppose those cases which come in voluntarily are really indistinguishable from cases which come into your mental wards?—Yes, they often are.

3158. Do you find that these neurasthenic cases which come to you voluntarily are willing to stay for the full time which you think necessary to keep them under observation, or do you find any reluctance on the part of the patients to stay?—I think it rather depends on the nearness of the neurasthenia to actual breakdown.

3159. In reply to questions put to you, you stated that the reason why people were so reluctant to have mental treatment was not because of the stigma of the Poor Law and you said that the feeling was dying out, but do not you find some reluctance especially on the part of the poor to mental examination?—No, I do not think so.

3160. On the whole, do you find, unless the mind is very near the border line, that a patient is prepared to remain in the institution?—You can usually persuade him without using any formal method of detention, but at the same time our hands would be very much strengthened if there was some simple form of power to detain without certifying.

3161. Granted that a sort of clearing house and a place of observation is necessary in connection with a patient's general mental condition and arrangements for treating that mental condition, do you think that a Poor Law infirmary is the best agency for it?—That depends very much on the locality and the local reputation of the Poor Law hospital, does it not? In some localities I think it is true to say that Poor Law hospitals have such a reputation amongst the people that they will go there willingly. I know it is so in Salford, and any other branch services like a mental observation branch attached to Hope Hospital would be welcomed amongst the general population of Salford.

3162. I know the reputation of the hospital, but I was rather having regard to the mental side. Do you regard it as being sufficiently equipped on the mental side as to become a sort of clearing house?—No, it is not at present. If we were going to do that, real pressure would have to be brought on the guardians to provide for staffing a ward for the purpose of carrying out different things.

3163. But you do act as a clearing house now?—We do, but the conditions are not satisfactory.

3164. I notice on your 1923 figures you have only 170 beds and 153 permanent detention cases. Do you only have 17 beds to do all your clearing house work?—No, those figures are deceptive, but we have not many more than that number.

3165. In that case your process of distinguishing between cases for permanent detention and cases going out must have been very defective, must it not?—No, I cannot admit that. There is not, however, enough room and there is no segregation there which there should be between the two classes of cases.

3166. Chairman: I think one can see why you wish to get rid of the chronic part of the population; you wish to have more room for dealing with the other cases?—Yes.

3167. You do not have Poor Law mental wards provided for the curative treatment of your cases, do you?—No. Medical treatment we can deal with, but we have no definite system of mental treatment.

3168. All you can give is a bed in which the patient can lie quiet and warm?—Yes, but not always quiet.

3169. But you could at least give a patient shelter, warmth, and a bed and a certain number of remedies, hypnotics and so on, to quieten him, but beyond that you are not able to do anything to cure him, are you?—Practically not.

3170. Would the number of cases which recover without certification be largely increased if this period of observation were accompanied by all the facilities and appliances for some curative treatment?—Yes.

3171. And if the period were 28 days instead of 14 days?—Yes.

3172. And you think that there might be a still larger number of persons who might escape certification altogether?—Yes, I think so.

3173. We are much obliged to you

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Mr. HAROLD SENIOR and Mr. GEORGE USHER, called and examined.

3174. Chairman: Mr. Senior, you are President of the National Association of Masters and Matrons of Poor Law Institutions?—(Mr. Senior): Yes.

3175. And, Mr. Usher, are you Honorary Secretary of the same body?—(Mr. Usher): Yes.

3176. I think, Mr. Senior, you are Master of the Southampton Poor Law Institution?—(Mr. Senior): Yes.

3177. While you, Mr. Usher, are Master of the Hartlepool Poor Law Institution?—(Mr. Usher): That is so.

3178. And are you here this morning both as representing your Association and also to give us the benefit of your own experience as Masters of Poor Law Institutions?—Yes.

3179. I think before we discuss any questions of general policy it might be helpful, Mr. Senior, if you were to tell us a little about your own institution. We are anxious to know the character of the class of institution with which you deal, and the arrangements that are made in it, before we come to general questions. You are the Master of the Southampton Poor Law Institution?—(Mr. Senior): Yes.

3180. Will you tell us what is the character of your institution, and what organisation you have there; first generally, and then how you deal with mental cases?—The institution will accommodate 630 people—that is the whole institution. The component parts are the able-bodied and the infirm—both men and women. We have a nursery in connection with the institution for 50 children; and then there are the mental cases. We have accommodation for 150 mental cases.

3181. Are your inmates drawn from the parish?—They are drawn from the Southampton Union.

3182. What area geographically does that represent?—About 80,000 acres.

3183. Then we are specially interested, of course, in your provision for mental cases. Are the mental cases under your charge segregated from the other cases?—Quite.

3184. And accommodated in separate quarters?—In separate quarters; a separate block entirely. We have one block entirely for the accommodation of mental cases, men and women; but for the daily accommodation we have to encroach upon a block that is partly used for other people.

3185. Are the mental cases under your charge permanent residents with you, or are they what we may call a floating population passing through your hands?—They are chiefly permanent residents under detention.

3186. Will you tell us generally what class of mental case you have as permanent residents?—The permanent cases are, of course, under detention orders issued under Section 24.

3187. I was thinking of them from the point of view of their disabilities. Are they chronic cases?—Yes, chronic cases chiefly; you might reckon that 90 per cent. of them are chronic cases.

3188. Probably cases of senility?—No, chiefly the imbecile class and moral perverts; there is a certain section of those. We have certain senile dementia cases, but the majority are idiots, perverts and imbeciles.

3189. Generally, I suppose, a class of patients who, while suffering from mental disability, are not troublesome in their conduct?—That is so; they are not at all troublesome. They are all quiet cases, and their mental condition is such that they do not improve.

3190. They are not cases which could hope to benefit from treatment?—No. Whenever there is a case that could hope to improve under treatment, we try and get that treatment by sending to another institution.

3191. Then in the case of these unhappy persons your function really is to make their lives as comfortable and as happy as you can?—Yes, that is the chief point.

3192. A certain proportion of your cases, on the other hand, are cases that have come to you from the relieving officer and pass through your hands?—Yes, we get a good many, of course, which are very transitory, from the ships—from the immigration authorities.

3193. With regard to those who are under permanent detention, we understand, from what you have told us, how you are situated, but with regard to those new cases that come in to you through the relieving officer, either from the ships or from the police, as the case may be, how do you deal with them? What provision have you to deal with them, because they will be all classes of cases, and not merely chronic cases?—Of course they come in under the three days' order as a rule, and occasionally under a justice's 14 days' order. They are put under observation in the ordinary way, put in bed, and we have just one receiving ward.

3194. For both sexes?—No; I mean one for male and one for female cases, but we do not segregate any of the classes until they have been with us for several days. All the males are put into one ward.

3195. Is the observation ward distinct from the wards in which your chronic permanent residents are?—In the same block, but a distinct ward.

3196. So that you have provision for treating those cases that come in to you, apart from your general lunatic population?—Yes, quite apart. You can consider that the men in the receiving ward are there merely for a short time.

3197. They are under the transitory orders?—Yes.

3198. Then they are brought, I suppose, before a magistrate, and disposed of?—Yes, either by discharge, or a permanent order, or to the mental hospital.

3199. Do you find that of the cases which are brought in to you in that fashion a large number are discharged without any order for their permanent detention?—Yes, quite a good number.

3200. What is the maximum period of observation which you apply?—17 days.

3201. That is the 3 plus 14 days?—Yes.

3202. And within that period of 17 days do you find that a substantial proportion of the cases either recover or are found to be such that they can be safely discharged?—Yes, a fair number. There is a difficulty with regard to that. It appears to me that the period should be extended. We have found a case where the doctor has not come to any decision; the patient has made some improvement, but not sufficient to discharge him, and yet he feels that by a longer observation the patient might completely recover; yet he has to deal with him in those 17 days.

3203. Then you would be well disposed to a prolongation of that transitional period?—Yes; say from 14 to 28 days.

3204. Do you think that in the course of a month the magistrate and you would be able to come to a definite decision on most cases?—Yes, I do, and probably it would prevent certain of the cases having to go under a permanent order.

3205. And such cases would avoid certification altogether?—Yes.

3206. In your observation ward are you able to do more than house the patients, and keep them in quiet and comfortable surroundings; have you any provision for treatment?—Not for special treatment; it is merely an observation ward.

3207. Do you find it necessary to restrain some of the violent patients who come in?—Occasionally; very little; we do it as little as possible. It is done under the instructions of the medical officer.

3208. You would be able to give them medicine, I suppose?—Yes, under the doctor's instructions.

3209. Is he a resident doctor?—No; he visits twice a day.

3210. But beyond providing them with the shelter of this ward, and the attention of the doctor, and some medical treatment, you have not any provision in your wards for treating these patients during this transitional period of 17 days?—No; that is the ordinary treatment.

3211. What we have in mind is this: Whether even a larger proportion might not escape certification if the provisional period were always available for treatment as well as merely for temporary detention. You have not the facilities for that, of course?—No, we have no facilities for that at all. We do the best we can with our rather limited accommodation.

3212. Do you find that your accommodation is adequate for the present system?—Personally, I feel that we should have more classification; just another room for classification.

3213. I suppose that these cases that come into your observation ward will be of all classes of mental disturbance?—Yes.

3214. You may have violent cases, or you may have depressed cases?—Yes, that is my point. I feel that there are cases of violence that might go into the observation ward we have, but there are cases of neurasthenia, and of men who are of a quieter type, who might be put in a separate ward to their benefit.

3215. Do you think that the association of all the different classes of cases in one compartment in your institution may be detrimental?—I think so, yes. I am only the Master; I am not, of course, a medical man.

3216. Your practical experience as one conversant with these people is very useful to us. What staff have you for dealing with your mental cases?—We have an average of 65 male cases, and I have a staff of 11 attendants. We have a similar number of female cases, and a similar staff, 11 female attendants.

3217. Do you find that your staff is adequate to cope with the work?—Quite.

3219. Are some of your attendants really probationers learning their work?—Yes; certain of them are trained attendants, and the remainder are men who come in from any other kind of work. If they are not suitable they are dismissed; if they are suitable, it takes them a year to get into the job, but if they had proper training they would be able to give better attention to the patients.

3220. Of course, one recognises, as in nursing generally, that experience can only be obtained in such institutions themselves?—Yes.

3221. Therefore I suppose you must have always a class of probationers who are learning their duties?—Yes, that is so; one must have that.

3222. I should just like to conclude the account of your institution by asking you about the remuneration that your staff receive?—The chief male attendant is paid to-day £3 8s. 6d. a week; the assistant attendant £3 3s. a week, with uniform; they work 56 hours a week, and live entirely off the premises.

3223. Do they get their meals during the day on your premises?—Yes, I arrange that during their period of duty they get half an hour allowed for one meal.

3224. Do they mess, so to speak, in your institution?—They bring their own food. We give them accommodation to get the food; but they live entirely off the premises, and no food is provided for them by the guardians. The female attendants are under a different principle. Three of the attendants do live entirely on the premises, but owing to the lack of accommodation the remainder have to live out. They are paid at the rate of £50 per annum, with an allowance of £21 for accommodation. The three who live in get £50 a year and very excellent food, and all found. In the case of the women who are off duty we give them a limited ration, because they are away for a certain time, and we allow them 1s. a day in lieu of part rations.

3225. With regard to the diet which the patients receive, both those who are permanently with you and those who are passing through your hands, how do you deal with them? Have you a satisfactory diet?—We have an excellent diet.

3226. Have you ever had complaints about it?—No, never. If a person requires extra diet—milk, or fish or any special food—he gets it.

3227. You have no trouble with your Guardians in making such provision?—Not at all; they will give anything that is required.

5 November, 1924.]

MR. HAROLD SENIOR and MR. GEORGE USHER.

3228. Can you give us perhaps a little more detail with regard to the diet? What does it work out at per head?—The cost per head throughout the institution is about 4s. 6d. a week; that is for the patients' dietary. You must understand that is entirely uncooked food at a contract price. They have meat, of course, every day; a hot dinner every day, with pudding four or five times a week. For breakfast it is very plain food; a good margarine, and bread, coffee or tea, and in winter I give them three or four times a week a little porridge and milk to start with, in addition to their ordinary diet.

3229. Can you tell us what is the cost of maintaining an inmate per week?—I believe the exact cost is 16s. 8d. per week, including the whole of the overhead charges; we have no loans, of course. That is, food, clothing, lighting, heating, staff, drugs, and so on.

3230. Earl Russell: And what per week does the asylum charge if you send patients to the asylum?—I believe the present charge is about 22s. at Basingstoke.

3231. Chairman: Then I think, Mr. Usher, you might be good enough to tell us generally about your institution, on the same lines as Mr. Senior has told us?—(Mr. Usher): Yesterday we had 640 inmates all told; that includes a hospital with 360 beds; there were 310 patients in the hospital, which included the lunatics. We have two separate wards; I mean the lunatic wards are a part of the hospital, and under the superintendent nurse. It is a big institution, and I am charged with the whole institution, the hospital as well as the lunatic wards and the remainder of the place. There are about 140 in the house, mainly infirm people, male and female. Then we have the school buildings loaned to the Northern Counties Feeble-Minded Committee, and I think there are about 200 mental defectives in the school buildings. I am the superintendent of the mental deficiency blocks.

3232. Then do you have, as Mr. Senior has, a considerable resident population of mental cases?—Yes.

3233. Do you also have the experience of a number of people coming to you through the relieving officer who have to be disposed of under the Statute?—Yes.

3234. Do you agree with the view expressed by Mr. Senior that a longer period of observation might be desirable?—Yes, I think it is very desirable.

3235. Has it been your experience also that after a short time in your observation section a number of the patients recover, or are seen to be unsuitable for detention?—Yes, I should think quite 50 per cent. of the cases.

3236. As high as that?—50 per cent. of the people who come in under temporary orders are cured.

3237. Therefore, if the period were prolonged, do you think that the percentage might be even higher of those whom it would be found unnecessary to certify?—Yes, slightly higher. I mean it would obviate the necessity of some of them going to an asylum.

3238. Of course, on the other hand, I suppose one should take this into account, that you will not have facilities for treatment any more than any of the other Poor Law institutions, and that some cases, by being delayed longer in the observation ward, may be deprived of the advantage of treatment which they would get by a speedier transfer to an asylum?—We are urging that in small houses where there is no suitable accommodation, the temporary cases be sent to an institution allocated for the purpose in the district.

3239. We will deal with the others a little later, but I am anxious to get your own actual experience with regard to your own institution. Can you give us figures to correspond with Mr. Senior's figures as to the wages, cost per patient, and cost of diet?—We have probably 40 certified under Section 24—20 males and 20 females. We have only four attendants to the male side; we have three attendants at the female side, but they get considerable assistance from the probationary nurses. It has always been argued that it is very essential that nurses should have experience in dealing with mental cases, therefore we have always made a point of using the probationary nurses in the mental wards.

3240. Do you find the staff adequate for your purpose?—Yes, considering the kind of patients we have; I mean they are mainly imbeciles.

3241. Does the same staff deal with the observation cases that are brought in under a three days' order?—Yes.

3242. Those cases, of course, will exhibit every type of mental derangement?—That is so.

3243. Do the same nurses deal with those cases as deal with the chronic cases?—Yes.

3244. Have you an observation ward in which these cases, brought in under a three days' order, are dealt with apart from the inmates generally, or from the chronic cases?—We have a side ward, but all the cases are not put in there for observation; it depends upon the kind of case, and how bad they are. If a man is suffering from acute mania he is put in the side ward.

3245. Do you find that you have to accommodate in this side ward cases of very varying degrees of insanity?—Yes, but in the main acute.

3246. Do you exercise your discretion as to whether you set apart a particular case for this ward, or allow the case to be among the others?—The doctor does. You asked about the salaries. I think my colleague's officials get a trifle better pay at the male side. I think our head attendant gets £3 7s. 6d. a week, and the other attendants £3, but we beat him at the female side. The two charge nurses at the female side—they work alternate day and night duty—get £70, and the juniors £60.

3247. Do they live in or live out?—They live in, and all found.

3248. Including uniform?—They have £6 allowed for uniform; they buy their own.

3249. Then what about the dietary?—Are you speaking of the officers' dietary?

3250. No; first of all, the patients'?—They are all dieted by the doctor. None of them has able-bodied diet. An ordinary imbecile has infirm diet. Then we have a resident doctor and three visiting doctors, so that the patients get daily attention, and they are dieted many of them individually.

3251. Have you an overhead figure of cost per day or per week of the food?—I am afraid I have not, but our institution, I think, is rather on the low side, for food and other things too.

3252. You have not taken out any statistics to show us the amount expended?—No: I am afraid I did not anticipate the question.

3253. We are just taking advantage of your presence here to-day to get some information. Do you think the diet is satisfactory?—Yes.

3254. Have you had complaints about it?—Never.

3255. Can you tell us the cost of the maintenance of an inmate, per week?—Complete maintenance, under 13s.

3256. Mr. Snell: Including overhead charges?—Yes, I think that includes everything but loan charges.

3257. Chairman: Do you know what the asylum charge is?—24s.

3258. The asylum to which you send on your cases?—I think at present it is 24s.

3259. We are much obliged for these details about your own institutions, and we now pass to more general considerations. I think you represent your Association here this morning, and your Association has 1,200 members?—Yes.

3260. Which represents 96 per cent. of the masters and matrons in England and Wales?—Yes.

3261. Is there a considerable diversity in the Poor Law establishments throughout the country in accommodation?—Yes.

3262. I suppose they will vary with the districts?—Yes.

3263. Are some of the institutions quite small?—That is so.

5 November, 1924.]

Mr. HAROLD SENIOR and Mr. GEORGE USHER.

3264. Then the variation will be from quite small, possibly rural, institutions, up to fully equipped urban institutions?—From six inmates to 3,000.

3265. That gives us a good idea of the range. But do mental cases find their way to all those institutions?—No, not to all of them, but to most of them. I have now in mind two Unions, where in one case practically all the temporary cases go to the workhouse or the Poor Law institution. In the very next Union none of them goes; they send them direct to an asylum. To my mind that is to be deprecated, because quite a number of cases improve or get better, and there is no need to send them to an asylum.

3266. Do you mean that in some Unions a case under a three days' order does not pass through your hands at all?—That is so.

3267. Does the relieving officer get the case consigned direct to an asylum?—Yes.

3268. On a magistrate's order?—Yes.

3269. In such a case the relieving officer must necessarily have made arrangements with the asylum beforehand, I should take it?—I do not know that it is necessary. If he get a case signed up, they have sufficient accommodation to take him at any time.

3270. The relieving officer will get knowledge of a case, take the case to a magistrate, or get the magistrate to visit the case, and, having got the order, will present himself with the patient at the institution and ask admission?—Yes, that is right.

3271. What would happen if the patient were violent meantime?—Do you mean in the conveyance to the institution?

3272. Earl Russell: No; from the moment he began to think of certifying to the time he is actually conveying him to the asylum, there may be at any rate 12 hours, and possibly 24, and if the man is violent during that interval, how and where is he confined?—That is left to the relieving officer. I have already said it is desirable to send him to an institution, but I take it they have a magistrate pretty well at command and they have all the facilities for getting the case certified quickly.

3273. Chairman: The relieving officer would take charge of him, I suppose, until he got him into the asylum. Where he would keep him if there is any delay is a little obscure?—In some places the relieving officer and workhouse officials have assistance from the police. Usually, I think you might say, the police are very helpful.

3274. Earl Russell: You mean they would keep him in the cells, if necessary?—No; they go to the house and help with the case.

3275. Chairman: If it were a case of a man in his own home who had gone suddenly mad, somebody would be left with him, is that what you mean?—Yes.

3276. Either a constable, while the relieving officer was trying to get the magistrate, or some other responsible person?—I do not wish to commit myself any further than the knowledge I have. I go round and get the information. We get quite a number of these people, and it is absolutely impossible to treat them and cater for them, because we have not trained people to look after them, or the accommodation; but in the very next Union they get none; they send them straight to the asylum.

3277. That is rather a new feature—cases not passing through Poor Law institutions at all, and therefore not coming within your cognisance. That does occur in some instances?—Yes.

3278. I wonder if you could instance a Union in which that practice is observed?—I will give you that information privately. It is a matter of complaint from one master of an institution, and he would not expect me to use it at a public inquiry.

3279. If we desire the information you can give us an instance of such an institution, because we want to inquire about the case. Perhaps you might communicate with the Secretary about this?—Yes, certainly.

3280. As you have told us, the institutions throughout the country vary greatly in size, in equipment and in accommodation, but generally mental cases find their way to those institutions, whatever be their equipment, for a time?—Yes.

3281. In small institutions, what is done with a mental case if there is no special accommodation, no observation ward or other special accommodation, for dealing with such cases?—The patient is taken, say, by a police constable, without an order. The very fact that the police constable takes the case is enough for the master; he admits him. In some cases the master is left there with the patient. He may be an old man, 60 years of age. In some cases the master is the only male officer in the institution and he has to do the best he can with him. I have one case in mind where they get quite a number of three day and 14 day order cases, and only last spring there was a Ministry of Health inquiry because the master and the porter were charged with roughly handling a lunatic, while neither of those people had any special instruction or experience in handling lunatics; both of them were totally unfitted for handling a case of that kind. Fortunately the case was not proved against them, or the master would have lost his post and lost his pension, and certainly it would not have been his fault, because he is not capable of dealing with a man of that kind. You get in very acute cases, or cases suffering from delirium tremens, and they really need skilled men to handle them. To go and land them in a workhouse where there is only a master and a porter is very, very unfair to the patient.

3282. Accordingly, is it your view that some of the Poor Law institutions throughout the country are unsuited for the reception, even temporarily, of mental cases?—All the small country houses. I have no small country house in my mind that is suitable to receive a case under Section 20 and Section 21.

3283. On the other hand, as matters stand at present that is the only institution to which they can be taken in a case of emergency?—That is so.

3284. Do I understand that your Association is in favour of some provision whereby only such Poor Law institutions as are certified by the Board of Control as being fit and proper for the reception of mental patients should be utilised for this purpose?—Yes, we think that is a very urgent need.

3285. But can you help us practically? Such a requirement might rule out a considerable number of the smaller institutions, might it not?—I do not know that it need do so, but if it does, take a step further and allocate one institution in a given district, and use it exclusively for mental cases.

3286. I follow. Otherwise the practical difficulty that was pressing itself upon my mind was this, that if you ruled out a number of small institutions in rural districts, because you could not there have officials capable of handling the cases or suitable accommodation for the reception of the cases, then there would be no place to which such patients could be taken, and they might have to be removed to a considerable distance, which again has drawbacks, as you know, from the point of view of the relatives and others?—Yes, but in these days of quick transport, if you are 60 miles away it is not very much, is it?

3287. Then your practical suggestion is this, that in each district—we do not know what size the district would be—there should be one Poor Law institution which should be selected and equipped for the purpose of dealing with these cases?—Yes.

3288. And that they might all be relegated to that institution?—Yes. Of course, that will be determined by the number of patients who could be removed from the asylum as almost cured, and by the number you had in the district. I mean you could not say, "One institution for a county." The whole thing would have to be thought out.

3289. It is obviously a problem of local administration of some difficulty, but apparently your Association is satisfied that a certain number of the Poor

Law institutions in this country, through no fault of their own, are inappropriate for the reception of mental cases, even temporarily?—Yes.

3290. On account either of the smallness of the accommodation, the unsuitability of the accommodation, or the inevitable lack of experience on the part of those in charge?—Yes.

3291. Lord Eustace Percy: Might I ask whether there are many institutions in the country outside, say, county boroughs which would be suitable under your proposed arrangement? Do you think the Board of Control would be able to certify many Poor Law institutions in this country outside county borough institutions?—A few; not a lot.

3292. That would make the process of disposing of lunatics very difficult, would it not?—I do not see how it can be tackled without allocating separate institutions.

3293. Chairman: I take it you would contemplate that one institution in each area would be selected as the reception house, and that that institution would then, if necessary, be equipped for the purpose, and special accommodation provided in it. I suppose that is your idea?—Yes.

3295. Chairman: With regard to cases brought to these small institutions, suppose it was a chronic case, and therefore perhaps a case inappropriate to send on to a mental hospital, a case which might quite suitably remain on in the workhouse; are there in some of these small institutions, of which you have spoken, to be found one or two cases of that sort living with the rest of the inmates?—Yes, and I think it is desirable. When I am speaking of a small Poor Law institution not being suitable for the lunatics, I am only referring to those under Section 20 and Section 21. Under Section 24 a lot of people are very much happier in Poor Law institutions than they would be in any other institution.

3296. We must bear that distinction in mind. In these Poor Law institutions do you think that the chronic cases, that is to say, the old person whose mind has gone, or the imbecile, or cases of that sort, hopeless cases, are quite well looked after?—Yes, excellently.

3297. Your recommendation does not apply to that class of case?—No.

3298. In such small institutions do the chronic mental cases just live with the other inmates?—Some of them; it depends upon the degree of insanity; many of them live in the house, and some of them are very popular, too, and very happy. By living in the house they get more liberty. There has been a great change during the last 10 or 15 years in dealing with this class of patient. A master takes upon himself more risk in letting a male case go out for a few hours, so long as he is quite safe, and not dangerous to himself or anyone else.

3299. I can quite understand that that class of harmless case would probably be happier—supposing it was an agricultural labourer, for instance—in his own district, in the little poor-house of his own area?—Yes.

3300. Where he would be among people whom he knew, and would, as you say, have a certain measure of liberty?—Yes.

3301. You do not condemn, then, the small rural institution as a proper place for that type to remain in?—No.

3302. When you are recommending your reform, it really applies to those cases which reach the poor-house for the purpose of classification and ultimate disposal?—Yes, but there would have to be some give and take, because you would not be able to run an institution unless you had some permanent cases also. I take it that if you wanted the Lunacy Acts amended to enable this idea being carried out, and you allocated an institution in a district, you would want it on up-to-date lines, with probably a medical officer; you would want to do things properly. I suppose the idea is to improve the lot of the lunatics. I do not suggest that you could keep the institution to wait and receive the cases under Section 20 and Section 21.

3303. May I suggest this to you, because one is anxious to avoid duplication of institutions. Would it meet the case if the asylum properly so-called had a department where uncertified cases were received for the purposes of observation and disposal, without this intermediate institution which you have figured?—I would prefer the other.

3304. Is that because of the unfortunate associations with the asylum?—Yes. People say there is something very, very terrible about the stigma of a Poor Law institution, but I think you will agree with me that the stigma of sending a friend to an asylum is ten times worse; and to avoid that, this kind of intermediate institution, or a home of rest, or give it whatever name you are disposed to give it, I think would be preferable to sending them to a branch of the asylum.

3305. Then you contemplate that this intermediate place might be not only what I may call a clearing house to which the people might be brought in order to have them observed and ultimately disposed of, but also a place of permanent residence?—The asylums are already overcrowded; it is a well-known fact that many of the patients in asylums are harmless, and they would probably be more comfortable in such an institution; at any rate, it would be a convenience to the State to transfer them from the asylum to such an institution as this.

3306. Then we should have chronic harmless cases really housed more or less fortuitously in the three classes of institutions: first, the case you figured, in a little country Poor Law institution; some of them in the intermediate place; and then you would find some of them in the public mental hospitals?—I do not know that there is any reason why they should not be.

3307. You do not favour the idea of this reception house, this intermediate place, being simply a clearing house in which observation of cases might take place with a view to their ultimate disposal; if it were a chronic case, sending it back to its own Poor Law institution, or if it were a case for the asylum, sending it on there?—I do not think it is practicable to have a place allocated exclusively for cases under observation under Section 21, but if you take the cases from the asylum under Section 25, and put them in an institution of this kind, then you could run the place all right.

3308. Would not this institution very rapidly attract to itself very much the same reputation or stigma as the asylum, because it would be known that so-and-so had been taken to this place; it would be a place exclusively dealing with persons mentally disturbed, either temporarily or permanently?—It is an intermediate state, between the Poor Law institution and the asylum, so that it would get that degree of stigma. The stigma would not be so bad as going to a lunatic asylum.

3309. In giving us your views just now, are you expressing the views of your Association?—Absolutely.

3310. Lord Eustace Percy: Might I ask whether, in the view of the Association, it is essential that this new sort of intermediate institution should be a public institution, or has the Association contemplated the possibility of having it, for instance, as a department of one of the general hospitals in the district?—No, I think it should be a public institution. I do not see why you should not make some arrangement with the Poor Law authorities, and take one of their institutions in each district. I do not see why it should not still remain under the Poor Law.

MR. HAROLD SENIOR and MR. GEORGE USHER.

3311. Chairman: I think we quite realise the undesirability of imposing upon a small institution the burden of dealing with these cases where they have neither the equipment nor the experience to deal with them. The problem of how it should be met is, of course, rather more complicated, in view of the existing organisation, but we appreciate your views. Then does your Association also advocate, as Mr. Senior has done, the lengthening of the period of preliminary detention?—Yes.

3312. What is the period which you regard as desirable for the purpose of arriving at a final determination on a case?—28 days.

3313. Have you considered the point I made a little while ago, that so lengthened a detention in a preliminary place, such as the workhouse ward, might deprive the patient of the benefit of the special treatment which he receives in an asylum, and which might hasten his recovery?—It depends very largely upon the kind of institution. If you are dealing with the large institutions, which, of course, if you carried out our recommendation, you would do—take the doctors there; I say they are almost experts; and in our institution we have a very capable doctor who has been dealing with these cases for 40 years; he ought to be an expert now.

3314. Then we must complete your story by adding this: You would contemplate that in such an institution, set apart as an intermediate institution, you would be able to have such equipment as would afford opportunities for curative treatment during that interval, as well as observation?—Yes.

3315. In that way you would obviate the objection I was suggesting, that the patient might be merely observed instead of cured?—Yes.

3316. Have you found yourself a little embarrassed by the existing code of lunacy law as to the programme, that is to say, the periods which are prescribed by the Acts?—Yes.

3317. Do you desire that, if possible, the scheme should be made more precise and clearer?—Yes. If you do not mind, my colleague and I arranged before we came in that I should deal with the first two pages of the précis, and that he should deal. I think it was, with the part commencing on page 3 of the précis.

3318. Then you would rather that Mr. Senior should give us his views with regard to the purely legal topics?—Yes.

3319. Then, I think, Mr. Senior, if you will be good enough to give us your views with regard to any emendations of the sections under which you work, we should be glad to have them?—(Mr. Senior): In the first place, with regard to Section 20, the three days order, there is some difference of opinion as to what should follow the three days order. If at the end of the three days it is decided to make a summary reception order, and send a man to a hospital, there can be a suspending order made by the magistrate for 14 days. On the other hand, the medical officer of the institution can detain a man for a further 14 days under Section 24. There appears to be, as I say, a difference of opinion as to what should occur. We suggest that there should be a three days' order; to follow that, there should be the magistrate's 14 days order; in every case the magistrate should visit the institution and see the patient; we urge that, for the sake of the protection of the patient, and to cover the medical officer. Instead of having a 14 days order, we suggest a period of 28 days. Then, following that, should be either discharge, of course, or a summary reception order, or a detention order in the institution under Section 24, as at present. We feel that the procedure is not quite clear, or that there are different readings of the order in the various areas.

3320. If one looks at Section 14, in the first place, Mr. Senior, the relieving officer must, within three days of a case coming to his knowledge, give notice to a justice?—That is so.

3321. Then, on notice being given to a justice, the justice must require the patient to be brought before him within three further days?—That is so. The patient is then visited by the justice; that is done in every case. As a result of that visit the magistrate cannot give a 14 days order; it is not legal for him to do so. That is my reading of the Act at present.

3322. Of course, when the magistrate has had the case brought to his notice by the relieving officer within three days of the relieving officer knowing of it, he must then within three further days dispose of the case, unless advantage is taken of some of the later provisions of the Act?—Yes.

3323. And within the three days he may dispose of the case by making an order right away?—Yes, on the suggestion of the medical officer.

3324. He may call in a medical practitioner, and, having seen the lunatic, may dispose of the case at once?—Yes.

3325. But in your practice do you find that many cases are so disposed of at once, within the three days allowed to the justice?—Very rarely indeed. The usual practice is that after the three days order the man is immediately put on a 14 days order by the medical officer under Section 24. Then comes a period of observation, and before the end of what would be 17 days definite action is taken.

3326. Then no certificate is issued by the justice in such a case? It is a sort of 14 days remand really, without a certificate?—That is so, on the medical officer's signature only.

3328. Have you contemplated the operation of Section 19, under which the justice who makes the order may suspend its execution for a period not exceeding 14 days?—I know that can be done, but it rarely is done. As a matter of fact, I cannot remember a single occasion when that has been done at Southampton, and we send a large number to the mental hospital.

3329. Suppose the justice made the order, but suspended its execution under Section 19; what authority would you have for continuing to detain the patient in your workhouse?—The justice under those conditions can give an order for detention for 14 days—the suspending order.

3330. He may give directions as to the proper care and control of the lunatic, and those directions would be your authority, I take it?—They would be my authority.

3331. But in practice has it come to this, that you regard the prolongation of this period as so valuable that you resort to the 14 days order in most cases?—In practically all cases, I might say—99 per cent. of the cases.

3332. Why do you do that? What is the object of resorting to this expedient?—That is the medical officer's business, because he can come to no decision within the three days.

3333. It is really to enable the justice to come to a more deliberate opinion, and the medical officer also to come to a more deliberate opinion, upon the case?—That is so.

3334. Then the real upshot of this evidence is that you regard the period of three days, which is the statutory period, as too brief a period to enable a considered judgment to be arrived at on a case?—Usually quite inadequate.

3335. Earl Russell: Might I put this point? If the relieving officer has once given notice to the justice under Section 14, is not the justice bound by the mandatory provisions of Sub-section (3) of Section 14 to proceed to action and see the lunatic within three days?—Yes, and he does so in every case.

3336. Then he must make some order?—He makes an order, but that order is not given to me. I do not accept it, because it is not legal. That appears to be a difficulty. Why should not that be legal? According to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown it is not legal.

5 November, 1924.]

MR. HAROLD SENIOR and MR. GEORGE USHER.

3337. Chairman: Then you do get a 14 days' order to detain him?—He is detained by the medical officer, and not by the magistrate.

3338. He is detained under Section 24?—Yes.

3339. The magistrate, as Lord Russell has pointed out, must require a relieving officer or overseer to bring the alleged lunatic before him, and then under Section 16 he has to call in a medical practitioner and examine the lunatic; then by order he has to direct the lunatic to be received and detained in an institution, if he is satisfied. Now how do you, so to speak, accommodate those provisions with your 14 days' order?—It clearly says he must be received into an institution, but he is already in an institution.

3340. Yes, "received and detained in the institution named in the order." We do not want to embarrass you with legal questions, because they are very difficult.—They are very difficult to understand sometimes.

3341. I am rather anxious to bring out the difficulties which the persons who have to administer this Act feel in working it out.—Yes. May I explain very briefly what occurs at Southampton, whether we are right or wrong? A person is received into an institution from a police constable or relieving officer under a three days' order. Notice is at once given to a magistrate by the officer to visit this man. The magistrate in every case does visit, and he signs a certificate saying that he has seen the man, and in that certificate he orders me to detain that man for a period of 14 days.

3342. Then he becomes at that moment a certified lunatic?—Undoubtedly.

3343. There really has been a summary reception order pronounced in such a case?—Yes.

3344. Now just go on. What next?—But that order is not given to me; it is filed by the relieving officer, and my power for detaining that man for a further 14 days is under the signature and the certificate of the medical officer.

3345. Then is your institution not the institution to which the justice of the peace in this certificate has destined the patient?—Yes, it is.

3346. Because, if so, would not the reception order justify your continuing to detain that patient?—But then it is against the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. I had this case up many years ago. There was some litigation owing to my detaining a man after he had been previously admitted to the institution on a three days' order, and I wrote for an opinion.

3347. Earl Russell: But if the justice has made a summary reception order he must have named in it a place to which the lunatic is to be taken. What place has he named?—The workhouse.

3348. And yet you say you cannot receive him?—Yes.

3349. Chairman: Was that opinion taken by your Association? It could not be taken by your Association, because of course the Law Officers' opinion must be obtained by the Government, but was it obtained at your instigation?—A copy was sent to me, but it was obtained before.

3350. It was given in 1901. I think we can study that at leisure. At any rate, you have been advised that after three days you cannot detain, even although a justice has pronounced an order?—That is so.

3351. We will examine the legal aspect of that. What we want to get from you is your practical working. You get a 14 days' order?—From the medical officer. I detain under a 14 days' order, which makes a total detention of 17 days, but before the expiration of that period the medical officer must come to some definite opinion; he must either discharge, send the patient to a mental institution, or detain him in the institution under a permanent order. That is the mode of procedure in most places, I think.

3352. Does the justice intervene again?—Under Section 24 (3). Of course, the patient cannot be detained without his signature.

3353. For that you require a justice's order. But take the case of a patient who, during the currency of the 14 days, is to be sent, as the medical practitioner advises, to a public mental hospital; does the justice intervene again?—Certainly, in every case. Within 17 days the justice would see the man twice; he would see him before the end of the first three days, and he would again see him for the purpose of sending him to a mental hospital.

3354. Does he pronounce another order?—Yes, the summary reception order for the asylum.

3355. Earl Russell: With the name of the asylum in it instead of the workhouse?—Yes.

3356. Chairman: That is the way you work it?—Yes.

3357. Then almost in every one of your cases there must be really two orders by a justice?—Yes, in practically every case.

3358. First, one order under which the patient is detained in your workhouse for 14 days; then, if the patient is sent to a public institution, a second order designating that asylum as the place for his reception?—Yes. May I say that I do not detain under a justice's order in the first place at all? There is a three days' order given. I may be wrong, but I am taking my own reading, or the opinion that has been given to me. The magistrate within three days visits the patient and signs the order.

3359. What do you call that order?—It is a 14 days' order which is illegal, according to the opinion given here by the Law Officers of the Crown, so I take no notice of it; but the magistrate has done his duty by seeing the patient. Then the doctor signs a 14 days' order in the institution. Then he gives notice, if he wishes the man to go to a mental hospital, to the relieving officer, and the necessary order is made by the doctor's certificate and the magistrate's certificate, and the patient is again seen by the magistrate. (Mr. Usher): There is another procedure. A man is brought in by a constable or by a relieving officer on a three days' order under Section 20. The magistrate does not see that man at all necessarily, but he is put on a 14 days' order under Section 24 by the medical officer. That is in accordance with the authority of the Law Officers of the Crown, given on the 30th July, 1901. That is the reason for our Association wishing that you should make this more explicit.

3360. Under Section 20, of course, no one is to be detained for more than three days?—That is right. The custom is that after that three days the medical officer of the institution puts them on a 14 days' order under Section 24.

3361. And neither Section 20 nor Section 24 seems to require the intervention of the magistrate?—According to the Law Officers of the Crown, no, but according to the lay reading of the Act, yes.

3362. Well, I suppose it is for us to compose those differences. At any rate, you have made conspicuous to us the practical difficulties which you have experienced in working the Sections of the Act, and have therefore made your case to us for simplifying, if possible, this part of the code.—(Mr. Senior): That is so.

3363. That is really the object of this evidence?—Yes.

3364. It is always well, when you attack an existing code, to tell us what you wish substituted for it.—(Mr. Usher): We feel that the method of procedure should be as follows: A three days' order should be made in the usual way, as now; the magistrate would be informed by the relieving officer.

3365. In every case?—In every case he should be informed. The magistrate would visit the case, and, if necessary, I mean if the man were not discharged at the end of the three days, or not sent to a mental hospital within the three days, he would give an order for the man's further detention. We suggest 28 days.

5 November, 1924.]

MR. HAROLD SENIOR and MR. GEORGE USHER.

3366. Would you suggest a special medical certificate as well, to justify that order for 14 days' further detention?—Certainly; I think that would be wise, for this reason: It is at the instigation of the medical officer that that is done, and he wants to have the man under observation for a further period.

3367. The justice would take the doctor along with him in this matter?—Yes.

3368. Then you would get a much simpler code, if you had first of all the three days' order?—Yes. The three days order is of assistance in bringing in the case of a man who is taken suddenly ill mentally; he can be brought to the institution; it saves time.

3369. But during those three days he should be brought before a magistrate, and a medical certificate should be obtained. A medical examination should take place, and he should then be disposed of by the magistrate, I suppose in one of three ways: he might either be discharged at once, or he might be so manifestly a case for relegating to an asylum that he might be sent direct on the order; or thirdly—and this is the point you are making—the magistrate should be empowered to say, "This is a case which ought to be observed longer by the medical practitioner; I pronounce an order for the further detention of this case for 14 days."?—Yes, that is so. We suggest 28 days.

3370. Then that would bring the legal provisions into conformity with what you seem to have in practice carried out?—Yes.

3371. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Might I ask whether it is proposed that 28 days should be substituted for 14 days, or whether it should read, "14 days, or, if there be sufficient need, for 28 days."?—Yes. I should say for 28 days, for this reason: A man can be discharged under Section 81, and that should be made a little more clear and easier to be done. May I just point out that Section 81 says that the guardians may discharge? My association feel that the medical officer on a certificate should be able to act for the guardians in that case, on that question of discharge. If that were so, the man could be discharged at any time within the 28 days by the medical officer.

3372. Chairman: When you say you recommend 28 days, it is 28 days as a maximum period of detention, without prejudice to the possibility of the patient being discharged at any time during the currency of that detention order, provided he has recovered and the fact of his recovery is duly certified by the medical officer?—That is our point.

3373. Of course it would never do to detain a person on a 28 days order who, on the third day of his detention, had become perfectly well again?—That is why we suggest that, as the guardians meet only once a month, it is impossible for the guardians to discharge in that case. That is why the medical officer should be able to act in place of the guardians.

3374. I was just going to suggest that that might be met in this way, that in the event of a case subject to a 28 days order recovering during the currency of the period, the medical man might at once give a certificate that the patient ought to be discharged, should present that at once to the justice who had given the order, and the justice then, taking into account the medical certificate, would at once discharge the patient. It would be a 28 days order with liberty to apply, so to speak, as we say in the Courts, during the currency of the order?—Yes; the justice should take some responsibility with the medical officer.

3375. The justice is the proper person to release him from that order, if he is satisfied from the medical certificate that the cause for detention has ceased?—Yes. (Mr. Senior): Is not this somewhat unnecessary? When it is a matter of releasing him, who knows better than the medical officer who has been in touch with him daily? There is a difference between an ordinary patient in a Poor Law infirmary and a patient in an asylum. The magistrate would not come up and see; it is only a matter of form; is it not an unnecessary matter of form? That is the view we take of it.

3376. I am not sure that it is not desirable that it should be brought to the notice of the justice that the person, with regard to whom he has been advised that a further period of detention is desirable, ought now to be released because of his recovery. It rather appears to me to complete the procedure. A justice is always available, I take it?—Not always. Supposing a justice went away for a fortnight, you would keep the man in during that time. My Association do not see the need for it. We think that the doctor's opinion, by reason of his being in touch with the case every day, ought to be enough.

Earl Russell: Of course, in a public asylum the concurrence of two Visitors is a formality, almost invariably, but still it does introduce a public authority.

3377. Lord Eustace Percy: May I ask if it would suit the witness if the procedure was similar to that in the case of an asylum? If the order could be signed by two guardians instead of by the Board of Guardians, would not that meet the case?—(Mr. Usher): I do not know that that would meet it; we should have to send for the guardians; they may be on rota, as they term it. If we wished to have them we should have to send for them.

3378. Chairman: Do you think the medical practitioner would wish to take the responsibility of discharge? He might feel that it was a case that he should bring before the justice?—We cannot speak for the medical faculty, but personally I am quite sure that our medical officer would take the responsibility. He would know very well if there was any doubt as to the man's surroundings.

3379. You have brought your suggestion before us, and we shall note it and consider it, with the arguments you have put before us. Now, Mr. Senior, are there any points of procedure to which you wish to direct our attention?—(Mr. Senior): With regard to the three days order, we feel that it should be clearly stated that the date upon which the order is made should not count as one of the three legal days. A man may come in at 11 o'clock at night. If that is to be counted a day it makes the period of observation rather short.

3380. What you would suggest is something like this: "Three days to run from midnight on the day of his reception"?—Yes, that is right.

3381. You merely want the compartment of time more precisely defined?—Yes.

3382. Have you any other suggestions?—With regard to Section 24, relating to people under permanent detention orders, we feel it would be for the protection of the patient—we do not wish to say that men are kept in an institution unnecessarily—we feel it would be better if there were some method of revision similar to that under the Mental Deficiency Act.

3383. What provision have you for visitation of the mental cases permanently resident in your institution?—The medical officer has to submit a statement every quarter, and the Visitors sign the book. The medical officer would naturally suggest the discharge of a man if he thought it necessary.

3384. Are the guardians required to visit?—They visit really on their rota; there is no necessity for them to visit—not to discharge, or anything of that kind.

3385. How often do the guardians visit?—They are round the place continually. They are supposed to visit every week. They have a rota on our Board.

3386. Do the guardians see the actual inmates themselves?—Yes, they go round; that is their chief duty, and they pay attention to that, but they are not able to decide, without the medical officer there, whether a man should be discharged.

3387. But they would be open to receive any complaints on the part of the patients?—Yes, they listen to any complaints, and talk to the patients—visit them, and so on.

5 November, 1924.]

MR. HAROLD SENIOR and MR. GEORGE USHER.

3388. Do the guardians ever draw the attention of your medical officer to the case of any particular patient?—Do you mean for discharge?

3389. Yes.—Never; they never have done so in Southampton.

3390. But they would deal with any other complaints?—Yes, they would deal with them, if it were a question of diet, and so on. I am afraid it is looked upon by the guardians, if a man asks for his discharge, as being part of his delusion, very often. There are men in the institution who are detained, and every day they say, "I want to go out." I do not think it is necessary always to draw the doctor's attention to that fact, because it is part of their delusion, really.

3391. That, of course, is one of the difficulties?—That is one of the difficulties.

3392. Now, on this question of a periodical revision of a case, to whom do you consider that that function should be delegated?—Really, to a rota of justices.

3393. Not the guardians?—No, not the guardians. There should be some outside authority brought in in conjunction with the medical officer. It has been suggested that some of these cases should even be seen by another medical man, as under the Mental Deficiency Act.

3394. Lord Eustace Percy: Do you couple with this recommendation any idea that the medical certificate under which a patient is detained at a Poor Law institution should be communicated to the Board of Control, or to some authority, as in the case of an asylum?—That is not part of our suggestion.

3395. At the present moment it is communicated to no one?—To no one at all.

3396. Chairman: So that the Board of Control is not apprised of the detention of this particular case?—No. The Commissioner of the Board of Control, when he visits the institution, asks to see the order relating to a particular case, if he wishes; in fact, he sees the whole lot as a rule, just runs through them to see that they are in order.

3397. Does the Board of Control visit your institution?—Yes.

3398. How often?—Not less than once a year.

3399. You see, one must safeguard institutions against spending most of their time in receiving deputations. One has to consider that point of view. At present you have the medical officer, who is constantly there taking charge of the cases?—Yes.

3400. Then you have the guardians, in the course of their ordinary duty, coming to the institution and moving about among the inmates. Then you have the Board of Control's representative at least once a year coming to your institution. Is it your suggestion that there should be yet a further body taking cognisance of the cases?—As the magistrate makes the order, it would appear that he should have some interest in discharging the man.

3401. Earl Russell: I should have thought that the guardians, who are there constantly, and know the patients by sight, would have been the natural people to review the cases?—Of course, that is a matter for the Commission; but there is the point that the magistrate makes the order, and it would appear that he would be interested to know what had become of the case.

3402. Lord Eustace Percy: Has the guardian on the rota any right to see the certificate?—They have the right, but they rarely bother about that kind of thing. (Mr. Usher): It seems to us a terrible thing for a man to be on a permanent detention order, a man incarcerated in a lunatic ward for ever and ever, and we think it is a very desirable thing that he should come systematically before the authorities. I am quite certain that in many institutions guardians do visit periodically, but in many institutions they do not, and the point is to get these people brought before some authority so that it is ascertained whether or not they are fit for discharge.

3403. Chairman: Then you do not regard the medical officer's quarterly report upon the case as a sufficient safeguard?—I should say in large institutions it would be quite all right; I am not here to criticise medical officers. The point is that it should be fixed that periodically these people are examined with a view to their release, if possible.

3404. Earl Russell: These people do not get a periodical report to the Board of Control, do they?—The medical officer sends a quarterly list.

Earl Russell: Not a report like the one year and two year cases?

3405. Chairman: I think not. (To the witness): Then your real contention is that a case which is being permanently detained in a Poor Law institution under a justice's order should, over and above the quarterly reports by the medical officer, be brought up for revision periodically by some quasi judicial authority?—Yes.

3406. Either the justices or possibly the guardians, or at any rate some authority?—Yes, as is done with the mental defectives now.

3407. You wish a reconsideration or revision of the case at stated intervals by some person in conjunction with the medical officer?—That is right.

3408. So that the medical officer might confer with some independent body of that sort at periodical intervals?—If an appointment could be made with the medical officer and the magistrate, that would meet the case.

3409. Sir David Drummond: You referred to the Mental Deficiency Act. A medical man accompanies the magistrate in that case?—Yes.

3410. He is there—the medical visitor, you know. Do you suggest that the medical man and an independent medical man should accompany the magistrate?—No, because the cases are very different. Many of your mental defectives are simply moral cases, moral defectives, young girls and boys. They are very much more important than these imbeciles, and the probabilities of improvement and the like are quite different. I do not suggest that an independent doctor is necessary, but I think that a magistrate and the medical officer of the institution should examine the case together; it brings the case to their notice, so that these people are not left without some effort on their behalf.

3411. Chairman: It would ensure that such a patient had at stated intervals an opportunity of expressing, so far as he was able, his wishes and his complaints, if he had any, to an authority?—Yes.

3412. It would necessarily bring him into contact with authority?—Yes.

3413. Lord Eustace Percy: Is there in your view any difference between the Poor Law institutions and the public asylum such as makes it desirable to have a different kind of visiting authority? You are suggesting something which is neither the guardians nor the visiting committee of the public mental institutions?—It may be an improvement on either.

3414. Why do not you suggest that the mental ward of a Poor Law institution should be visited by the visiting committee of the asylum?—Of the guardians, do you mean?

3415. Yes?—It would be very bad taste on our part, the servants of the guardians, to criticise the way in which they carry out their duties.

3416. I mean the short answer is that you do not think the visiting committee of the asylum is a satisfactory body in all respects?—I do not say so. I am not dealing with asylum cases at all, but with Poor Law cases, and I say that in very large institutions the thing is quite all right, but in some institutions the visitation is not probably what it should be.

3417. The visitation of a Poor Law institution?—Yes; in many institutions the guardians do not systematically visit the people.

3418. That is hardly my point. My point is this: You have in a county a visiting committee which is visiting the public asylum?—Yes.

3419. If you wished to have a review of cases in the Poor Law institution, why do not you suggest that that visiting committee's functions should be extended to visiting the Poor Law institution as well as the asylum?—I do not think that is desirable.

3420. Chairman: Why not?—I do not think the guardians would care for it. The guardians may say, "If they come to visit our cases, why do not we go and visit theirs?" It may create some feeling unnecessarily. I do not think it is of that importance, because we are not suggesting that 50 per cent. of these people under Section 24 are going to be released, or something of that kind, but it is in order to give them a feeling that somebody outside is looking after them.

3421. Earl Russell: It is rather your point that it should be somebody who is not a guardian?—Our feeling is that it should be a justice of the peace. I certainly would not bring the asylum people into it. A justice of the peace and the medical officer of the institution.

3422. Chairman: We have your suggestion, Mr. Usher. Now, Mr. Senior, I think you wish to say something about the case of children?—(Mr. Senior): Yes. We receive into our Poor Law institutions quite a number of children; I mean the type of children who are not mentally deficient, but beyond that stage—the idiot class—and they as a rule have to be kept in the same wards as adult patients. We do not consider that that is a good thing.

3423. Are these cases not dealt with under the Mental Deficiency Act?—They are cases that are beyond the stage of that Act. I have a child in the institution now, a little boy of six; we have been trying to get him away for quite a long time; we have tried three separate institutions; they will not take him; we have to keep him at our institution. Of course, he is growing older, and we find that he picks up the habits of the adults. He has enough sense to do things that are probably bad. The children pick up the degrading habits of the older people, and we find that does no good. But to get that child into another institution appears to be almost impossible, and we feel that there should be some special institution set on one side, or a part of some other institution set on one side for the reception of this class of children, and they should be kept separate, not with the adult patients.

3424. Miss Madeleine Symons: I suppose the same difficulty arises in your observation wards; I mean presumably you have to admit children or young persons into this single observation ward?—No, we do not. With regard to children I have another ward where they are put. We do not put them with the violent cases that are received in the ordinary way; we try to deal with the children a little bit differently from the adults.

3425. Would that be true of most of the Poor Law institutions?—I should think not, because they have not the accommodation.

3426. You mean there may be cases where they do have to admit them to a general observation ward? Yes, many cases.

3427. Chairman: As we know, the Mental Deficiency Act has not been put fully into operation yet in this country?—That is so.

3428. If it were, would not such a child readily find a place within one of those institutions, It seems to me to fall into that category?—Yes. The guardians at Southampton and other guardians have great difficulty in getting such a child into an institution.

3429. Probably because there is not yet complete equipment?—Yes. We ask that some arrangements should be made. This is not a new thing. We have had to send cases to an asylum, and we feel that is not the proper place for them.

3430. That was really the justification for the passing of the Mental Deficiency Act, to provide institutions for such cases, but they have not yet been brought into being through the country, and probably that is the reason why you are experiencing this difficulty.

3431. Lord Eustace Percy: Is not the point of the witness that these cases are not suitable for the mental deficiency colonies that do exist?—That is so; they are too far advanced; they are unimprovable cases.

3432. Chairman: I have great difficulty in seeing how they could refuse to receive them as not falling under the category of mentally deficient. Under the Act of 1913 the first class of defective is: "Idiots; that is to say, persons so deeply defective in mind from birth or from an early age as to be unable to guard themselves against common physical dangers."—That is so, but nevertheless the difficulty is still there, that we cannot get this class of case away.

3433. Sir David Drummond: Does that apply also to Mr. Usher?—(Mr. Usher): No. I think we have to take this view of it. There is limited accommodation for mental defectives, and this grade is naturally the last they will take. You have to bear in mind that the cost of treating these cases must necessarily be higher than the cost of treating other grades of cases, and probably it might be a question for the Government to consider the advisability of giving a bigger grant, or doing something to urge upon mental deficiency committees to cater for these cases.

3435. Eleven years during which development has necessarily been paralysed by even more vital matters?—Yes.

3436. Now you also advocate, do you not, the desirability of notifying the relatives where any case is to be dealt with by the justice?—(Mr. Senior): Yes, just from the point of view of protection, or to give them an opportunity of objecting to the order, or they may have something to say upon the matter.

3437. Assisting in the matter?—Yes.

3438. Then you regard Section 81 of the Act, the discharging Section, as requiring some amendment, I think?—Yes, from the point of view I have already mentioned, that it states that the guardians only can discharge these people from the institution; and, having in view the fact that the guardians only visit once a month, it seems rather a long time to keep a patient under control unnecessarily.

3439. Does this relate to persons who are only temporarily with you, or does it relate to persons who are permanently with you?—Section 24, permanent cases. An opinion has recently been given on that. The Board of Control gave an opinion in July of this year, and this is their last paragraph: "Until the actual moment of discharge a person, whether detained under Section 21 or Section 24, is detained as a lunatic, and the power of discharge is apparently in each instance with the guardians." Those are cases under Section 21.

3441. And it has been suggested that possibly in addition it might be necessary for a justice of the peace to intervene, but we will leave that aside. With regard to the permanent cases, do you think that there is the same urgency for discharge, because one would assume that, the case being a case of permanent detention, the exact moment of recovery might be less easily ascertained; it might be a case gradually improving?—(Mr. Usher): The difficulty is that all over the country the procedure is different. In some very important institutions the patient, under Section 24, is discharged by the master on the recommendation of the medical officer, and in other institutions the cases have to come before the guardians. It seems to us that to hold a case up is very hard. A man may be put on a 14 days order, and because he is not cured at the end of 14 days, and the doctor has not decided what shall be done with him, he may put him on an order under Section 24. Perhaps in a week he makes up his mind that the man is fit for discharge. It is very hard lines if the man has to be detained for another week, until the guardians meet.

3442. Earl Russell: Do they not sometimes act by a committee, who could act in the meantime?—The Act says, "The guardians." We think that the medical officer, who is in touch with the case daily, is quite qualified to judge as to when a case should be discharged.

3443. Chairman: Of course, another view might be this, that as the patient finds his way into the institution upon an order of the justice, coupled with the doctor's certificate, so also he might make his exit from the institution on the medical certificate, coupled with an order from the justice?—There is some little difference, because a justice does not in practice see a case that is certified under Section 24, but he does under Section 20 or Section 21. An independent medical man signs the order.

3444. Earl Russell: Would "any two of the guardians" meet your point?—We think that the medical officer would meet the point in such a case. (Mr. Senior): It would appear that if the medical officer recommended the discharge of a man to the guardians, they would naturally discharge the man.

3445. Chairman: Naturally they would act upon the skilled advice they received, but the Legislature seems to have contemplated that it was desirable that this matter of discharge should not repose merely in the hands of the medical officer, but should also, formally at least, be in the hands of some lay authority?—(Mr. Usher): Perhaps you will be good enough to consider this point, and bear in mind that we feel very strongly that the medical officer's signature should be enough to effect the man's discharge.

3446. We take it from you that you are anxious to facilitate the means of discharge, and we must consider by what means that can be achieved, if the existing system is not satisfactory. You have expressed your views to us on that?—Yes.

3447. Then you allude to a difficult topic in your précis—the case of attempted suicides. What have you to say about that?—(Mr. Senior): I am giving my own opinion, because there has not been an opinion expressed by the Association. I take it that there are many different causes of attempted suicide. It may be a case of domestic or business trouble; it may be a case of a mental disorder. Would not an examination by a real mental expert be the best thing to get over the difficulty? The mental expert to be called in, if a man is to be brought to a Poor Law institution, in each case; the man to be examined, and the man should either be detained or discharged as the result of that examination.

3448. Do you think it requires an expert?—I do. (Mr. Usher): My point is that we do not know where we are. Some cases are brought in under an order, and some are not; that is the difficulty.

3449. Earl Russell: Do you mean: "Here is a suicide: do what you like with him"?—Yes. These people demand to go out, and we have no power to detain them. (Mr. Senior): May I cite a case? I have in mind a case that occurred about two years ago. A man came to the institution, having attempted to commit suicide. After about seven days the man was apparently quite rational, and the doctor discharged him. Within an hour and a half that man committed suicide by going on to the railway and a train passing over him. The police do not take action in many of these cases.

3450. Sir David Drummond: They do in other parts, you know?—Not to-day, Sir David. I mean if a man is brought to the Poor Law institution because he has attempted to commit suicide, we are informed if the police are going to take action, and we should not discharge under those conditions except to the police.

3451. Chairman: Is he brought to the mental department?—All those cases are sent down to our department. We have a separate infirmary four miles away from the main institution. (Mr. Usher): In our case, if a cut-throat comes in—we get quite a number of them—they are put in the general ward, because they want skilled nursing, and a lunatic attendant may not be a skilled nurse.

3452. The question seems to be whether you are automatically to treat a case of attempted suicide brought to you as a case of insanity, and bring it under that code, or whether you are to treat it as a surgical or medical case in the ordinary ward of your infirmary, if you have one. It is very difficult to say. Is the medical officer of your institution not then in a position to classify the case, and say, "This is a case for the mental side," or, "This case will be all right in the general ward"?—(Mr. Senior): In a case of attempted suicide there has been some cause for the attempted suicide, and my experience is that they are difficult to read—difficult to get at the cause. If a man is determined to commit suicide he has sufficient sense to keep that to himself. He will hide that fact to get away from the institution to commit suicide, and that is why I think some expert should be brought in to examine such a man most carefully.

3453. Would it not meet the case if all attempted suicides brought to you were dealt with under the Lunacy Act by this period of observation which you propose of 28 days?—It would be an improvement upon the present system, because there is no system at the present time.

3454. Detention for 28 days of an attempted suicide case would enable observation to be made of the case, and deliberate consideration of whether it is a case of insanity or not?—Yes, probably the ordinary medical practitioner could find out in that time. (Mr. Usher): I do not think there are any experts in suicidal cases. I rather think, in practice, it would not work out well to wait for experts. You generally find the coroners say that, if they happen to die, they were insane, and they were in the same frame of mind if they happened to recover as when they committed the act. But all we are concerned about is that it should be uniform; they should be treated as lunatics. If these people want to go out when they are so far recovered, and they are not under order, the master has no power to keep them in.

3455. If we see fit to recommend a provisional period of detention of 28 days without certification, then it is not necessary for you to make up your mind whether or not the case is one of insanity, but the case might be detained for that period, with liberty to apply, in the mental department. That would meet your difficulty, would it not?—No, I do not think this Commission should recommend that they should be put in any department. I think that it should be left to the medical officer to deal with the case on its merits, because some lives might be lost if they were left in the mental ward, whereas if they were put into the general ward they might be saved. It is a matter of touch and go all the time.

3456. You want, first of all, to be directed as to which category these cases are to go into?—Yes, for our own safety.

3457. Do you suggest that all attempted suicide cases should be classified as mental cases?—Yes: you might have a special order for them—something intermediate between a lunacy order and an ordinary order. We do not want to brand them as lunatics, but at the same time we do not want to run the risk of litigation.

3458. I think you have already given us your views as to the training of staff. You recommend that we should delete the word "workhouse" where it occurs, and substitute "Poor Law institution"?—Yes, and may we add to that the word "pauper"—a very distasteful word. To my mind "rate-aided" is almost as bad as the word "pauper." If we steer clear of anything in that line it would be an advantage. Either an "assisted" or a "district case" I think would be very preferable, but "pauper" is certainly objectionable.

3459. Then you also have a suggestion that cases of senile dementia should be dealt with by a special certificate?—Yes, that is very desirable, because you never think of putting an old "granny" under a

5 November, 1924.]

MR. HAROLD SENIOR and MR. GEORGE USHER.

lunacy order. We have nothing now but a lunacy order under Section 24. They are not responsible for their actions; they are in their dotage, and some of them demand to take their discharge, and if they demand to take their discharge we have no power to keep them. That may be very risky indeed; they may go out and something may happen to them because they are not responsible for their actions. There ought to be something less drastic than a lunacy order, so that the medical officer can detain them until he is satisfied that their friends can look after them.

3460. You see, we must take care not to introduce fresh complications in an endeavour to simplify matters, and if you are going to have different grades of orders we may get into difficulties of classification which may embarrass you very much?—We have this actual difficulty.

3461. How do you deal with it in practice?—We have to take risks, and after what has happened we want to obviate that.

3462. Do you mean you let people out?—Here is an old man in his dotage, and he has demanded to take his discharge. The doctor feels he is not really capable of taking care of himself. It is hard lines to put a man like that on a lunacy order, but if we had some other means of detaining him without making a lunatic of him it would be very preferable. We have the fullest sympathy with these old people, and it seems very cruel to make lunatics of them when it is simply senile dementia that they are suffering from. (Mr. Senior): I think we all have that difficulty. I have a case of an old lady of 96. We had an infirm ward in our main institution; we closed it, and sent the people to the infirmary. This old lady did not wish to go; in fact she said, "I will take my discharge." She was not fit to take her discharge, and I had no alternative but to put her into the mental ward, and she is there to-day.

3463. She is not certified?—No. That is rather a difficulty. She does not now wish to go out, because she is down at her old home.

3464. Miss Madeleine Symons: I wonder whether, following on what you have said about the old people, you experience the same difficulty with temporary cases. We heard yesterday that there were some cases, possibly sent from the hospitals, where temporary mental difficulty was due really to physical disease—sometimes cases of pneumonia. Do you find it so difficult that in those cases you sometimes have to certify them in order to keep them?—Yes. I really had a note to mention such cases, but I felt diffident about doing it. There are such cases as you mention; people suffering from physical illness which temporarily creates mental trouble. We are compelled to put them under a lunacy order for a short time, and it would be well if that could be obviated. After all, if a person has been under a short order under the Lunacy Act it has rather a bad effect on him later in life. People know about this thing, and they object to dealing with a man who has been a lunatic. It would be good if some other order could be made to keep a man for a certain time without being under the Lunacy Acts. Quite recently a man came to my place; he had been a soldier in the late war; he said: "I am feeling funny in my head, and I want to be taken care of." I took him in, put him in the mental observation ward without an order, and within a week the man was discharged, quite better. He had had some slight neurasthenic condition in the Army, and he had had some slight mental disorder, and this was a recurrence of it, but he soon recovered in seven days. It would be rather a pity to put such a man under the Lunacy Act if you could avoid it. We try to avoid it by keeping a man under observation without any power to detain.

3465. Then on this question of training, I wonder whether you could give us any idea of the proportion of attendants in the Poor Law institutions in your Association who are trained?—I am afraid I could not give you any figures, except with regard to my own case. Practically in all cases the chief attendant would be a trained, qualified man, but the assistant attendant, as a rule, has no qualification whatever. Out of 11 men, I have four who are really qualified attendants; the rest have merely got their experience in our own place. After a man has been there two or three years he is equal to the occasion, to meet the situation as far as the Poor Law institution is concerned.

3466. Can they take the mental nursing certificate after they have had a certain experience in your institution?—No, there is no arrangement of that kind. We wish that something of the kind could occur, that a man after a probationary period could undergo some examination, or go for further training in a fully equipped mental hospital, get a certificate, and then return to a Poor Law institution. I think the patients would be better looked after by the trained people.

3467. Earl Russell: Mr. Usher gave us some figures of the percentage of the patients who recovered in the 17 days, and who were able to be discharged without proceeding for an order. Could you give us similar ones for your institution?—(Mr. Senior): Yes. Last year, up to the year ending 30th September, we received into the institution local people, 277 patients. These are people discharged within, say, three days. Shall I go through the figures?

3468. Chairman: Could you make a table* for us and hand it in?—With pleasure.

3469. We will use it as an appendix to your evidence?—Yes. The figures relate entirely to Southampton, of course.

3470. If you would tabulate them for us we should be very glad?—I have a note with regard to the aliens admitted under the deportation law. They were 29 during the year. Only two of those went to the asylum, and the rest were taken away by the shipping companies—taken to their own country.

3471. Earl Russell: I want you to elaborate a little what you say in your précis about the importance of the next-of-kin or other known relative being given an opportunity of appearing before the justice. You take a strong view, do you not, that they should always have that opportunity?—Yes.

3472. We had evidence from one justice, who said that he practically never saw the next-of-kin, and did not inquire if there were any, and the medical officer did not tell him. Therefore they had no opportunity to protest. You do not think that is desirable?—I think they should have an opportunity in every case.

3473. Then we had evidence from Dr. Baly, who said that the next-of-kin should be apprised, and when their presence could be obtained it should be obtained, but they were not generally present when the justice was present. Do you think it preferable that they should see the justice and have an opportunity of saying what they want to say?—I do. The usual practice is that we say the patient has been transferred to the mental hospital.

3474. That is after they are certified?—Yes.

3475. I understood you to mean that you thought it desirable that they should be present at the justice's inquiry?—That is the point we make, but I was just quoting the present procedure.

3476. Sir Thomas Hutchison: In answer to the Chairman you told us about the male attendants. What about your female attendants?—The same thing applies. Of our female attendants there are seven of them who have had previous experience.

3477. Trained nurses?—They are trained in that particular work; the other four are local people who have just had their experience in our own institution.

3478. Probably wanting to go on in the nursing service afterwards?—Yes, if they can get patients.

3479. Mr. Snell: I would like to ask Mr. Usher, is the National Association of Masters and Matrons of Poor Law Institutions representative of the whole of the masters and matrons, and can it speak with authority?—(Mr. Usher): Yes.

* See Appendix XII.

5 November, 1924.]

MR. HAROLD SENIOR and MR. GEORGE USHER.

3480. Chairman: You represent 600 institutions, and 96 per cent. of the masters and matrons?—Yes, and may I say that every member of the Association has been written to on the subject and had an opportunity of expressing his views, and after these views had been got together an executive meeting discussed them, and this précis is the result.

3481. Mr. Snell: Thank you. In your evidence you suggested that what you call small country houses were not suitable for the reception and treatment of mental patients. Have the nurses or attendants in these small country houses had any special training in mental cases?—There are no attendants in some country houses. In some of them there is simply one man—the master of the institution—and in most of them there are only two—the master and the porter. They have their ordinary duties to do during the day, and a case of acute mania or delirium tremens may be taken in, and may be three or four days, very violent, and want attention. Another very strong point there is this: I have seen brought into our institution a man suffering from delirium tremens, and he was dealt with by three big, powerful men. They handled him roughly, but they had no alternative; they did not know how to handle him. As soon as they handed him over to our attendant, who did not weigh more than 10 stone, he could handle the man himself, because he was a trained and skilled man.

3482. So that except for the supervision of the doctor these patients are without any skilled treatment?—That is so.

3483. Is it your belief that if trained attendants and nurses were available it would be an assistance to the recovery of the patient?—Yes.

3484. You suggested, I think, that in order to avoid the stigma of the asylum and to give the right cases the best chance, there should be intermediate places, homes of rest, or some other name, which would be used, I suppose, for patients who might respond to treatment—not necessarily permanent cases?—Yes; I think I said cases sent from the asylum under Section 25; cases that are now in the asylum and quite harmless would be just as well in an institution of this kind, and probably better than in an asylum.

3485. Earl Russell: You want a nucleus of chronics?—Yes.

3486. Mr. Snell: I think Mr. Senior suggested that all those who are detained should come periodically before a proper authority with a view to release if their condition justified it, and that the certificate of the medical officer immediately concerned would be sufficient. I would like to ask whether in his judgment it is not desirable that there should also be an independent doctor associated with this revision? Is there not a danger, for example, when once a doctor has made up his mind that a case is permanent, he might fail to bring to that case an open mind?—(Mr. Senior): I do not think so. I think the institution medical officer is in close touch with the cases. He is not anxious to detain the cases any longer than necessary, and probably has in mind the question of accommodation; but, apart from that, I believe he would take a fair view of the thing, and would not keep a man a day longer than is necessary.

3487. You think there is no danger of a medical officer taking the case of a permanency for granted?—No, I am quite sure of that.

3489. They are not straightway put on cases that are under observation; they are not left in charge of mental cases?—No, never.

3490. How much are the probationers paid?—Our scale commences at £2 15s., rising to £3 3s. per week.

3491. How much are the women probationers paid?—They commence at £40 per annum, and rise quickly to £50, with uniform and everything found. In using the term probationers you mean the people who are not qualified in any way. We do not term them as probationers in the mental ward; they are merely people without experience. In an institution of our kind there is no question of training for a certain period.

3492. What I really wanted to know was whether the probationers are expected to take charge of the wards where the mental cases are, either by night or by day?—In my own case a man or a woman would not be expected to take charge of any ward under, say, six or nine months' experience.

3493. About how old are the women when they come to you to learn?—It is rather a difficult question to answer; they are all between 30 and 40, except the chief attendant, who is rather older there. May I say again they are not probationers; they are assistant attendants, and they are women of about 30 years of age; we do not take them under 25.

3494. Then I wanted to know about their diet. Are they fed like the inmates, or are they fed on a slightly better diet?—A better scale of diet.

3495. Have you calculated the cost per head of that diet?—Yes; to-day it is about 13s. 6d. per head. You are speaking now of the attendant?

3496. Yes?—Yes, I am correct then. The cost of provision for feeding an officer or an assistant attendant, or an attendant of any kind, is about 13s. 6d. per week.

3497. As against 4s. 6d. for the inmate?—Yes, that is the cost.

3498. Do you think for the wages that are paid you would be likely to get skilled or trained attendants, or would you suggest a higher scale of salary?—I think that the scale we pay is rather a low one, but, fortunately, we do get good attendants for our money; we have a very good lot to-day in spite of the fact that the pay is low. My own opinion is that a person with any training at all ought not to commence on such work as this under £50 a year and have everything found.

3499. At what age would you suggest?—About 25. We do not think they are physically fit very often to deal with the situation and their nerve is not equal to it, before that age.

3500. Have you got such a thing as a voluntary service? I mean are the nurses expected to give voluntary service on, say, the seventh day of the week?—No.

3501. Never?—Never. If they do any extra work by taking the case to the mental hospital they are paid extra for it.

3502. Under what order do the attempted suicide cases come into the workhouse?—Very often under no order at all. They are brought in by the police very often; sometimes under a three days' order, but sometimes they are brought to us as being a place of safety for observation, and they bring them under no order, but as a rule they are placed under an order by the medical officer.

3503. Sir Humphry Rolleston: When speaking of your own establishment at Southampton you said there were no facilities for treatment. Supposing, as must not uncommonly happen, particularly when an acute case comes in, the patient absolutely refuses food. He must either be forcibly fed or left to drift, or sent to another establishment. I presume that in an emergency like that he would be forcibly fed?—No, they are always sent to another establishment.

3504. I should like to return for a moment to a subject we have discussed a good deal, and that is your recommendation of altering the period of the order from 14 to 28 days. I want to ask you whether there are not some disadvantages as well as the advantages you have shown, in making that change. If you make it 28 days there must be a tendency to a more leisurely procedure, and a more leisurely procedure would entail the disadvantage of further overcrowding of Poor Law institutions. It prolongs the possible period for which a patient is retained in the infirmary, and it is a matter of expense, of course. What I should like to put to you is that one of two alterations should be made to meet your wishes; either that it should be 14 days which can be prolonged if it is absolutely necessary to 28 days, or that there should be some other machinery of prolonging the time after the 14 days have elapsed?—My experience is that the procedure is taken in proper course. I do not feel in recommending this that there is any danger of a person being detained any longer than is necessary by extending the period up to 28 days. For instance, with regard to the question of a man going to a mental hospital, if within five days the doctor said he would have to go, he would go. He would not keep him in the institution for any longer period.

3505. I think you explained that before. But would it not be better to have 14 days, and then to have a power of prolonging that 14 days for another 14 days?—That would meet the situation of course quite well; that is, to preserve the present 14 days and then to have the option of a further 14 days. I think that would meet our recommendation quite well.

3506. Just one other point. Would it not be better if all suicide cases were, so to speak, under the legal authorities unless and until they were referred to the mental division? I mean there are a good many cases of suicide in which there is no real reason to think that the patient is insane?—That is the difficulty.

3507. Should they not be under the control and care of the police until they are referred to the medical officer as possible cases of lunacy?—If I may ask a question, where would they be controlled?

3508. The police would sit by the man's bed?—Where there are trained attendants I do not think that is necessary.

3509. You have got trained attendants?—Certainly. That is one reason why we suggest this centralisation of areas. (Mr. Usher): That is for a large institution. We must differentiate between a large place and a small institution. We have said in our précis that, until some arrangement can be made to make provision for these people who now come to small institutions, it should be an obligation on the police to render assistance. You can quite see the danger of a lunatic being planted in a place with no able-bodied man to look after him. I have heard of a master having to get a tramp out of the tramp ward to assist him to look after a lunatic. Well, it is a disgraceful state of affairs.

3510. If they were under the legal authorities that would be met?—Yes. (Mr. Senior): Of course our point is that a violent case is often lumped on to a small institution and the police leave at once and leave the master, a young or old man, and one or two women about the place. It is not fair to the place or to the officers. That is our point for centralisation.

3511. Sir David Drummond: I think you scarcely understood the drift of Miss Symons' question with reference to the certification of people who are delirious. Miss Symons instanced pneumonia, and you said you certify it. Do you really mean that you certify a patient suffering from pneumonia?—We have cases from outside the institution on a three days' order, and it has been found later that they have been suffering from pneumonia, and that pneumonia was the cause of their mental condition. They are at once sent to the hospital then.

3512. If you recognised that pneumonia was the cause of the man's mental condition you would not certify him?—No, certainly not.

3513. Or in the case of chronic heart or kidney disease you would not certify because the man had delirium?—No; our hospital is four miles away. They send a man down to us suffering from mental trouble. It is very often a case of a difference in the medical opinion. We have to deal with the situation as it is.

3514. If you recognised the cause as physical you would not certify that man?—No, and we should get the patient back to the hospital as quickly as possible.

3515. Do you seriously suggest that the opinion of an expert would be of much service to you in deciding whether a man who had attempted suicide would in future recur to it?—Well, Sir, my colleague says no. I have got my own opinion. Some time ago a woman was sent from India, was landed in our mental ward; the friends came along and said they had had trouble with her before, and it was certainly a mental case. Our own medical man could not come to any decision. He called in a doctor in the town who is a retired medical superintendent of our mental hospital, and certainly an expert, and he examined the patient and was with her for three hours and came to the definite conclusion that she was not a mental case. That woman might have been sent to the mental hospital. The woman was erratic in her manner of speaking and behaviour, but the mental expert said she was not a mental case. She was taken away by her friends, and I have heard nothing of the case since.

3516. Was she an attempted suicide case?—No, but in a case of attempted suicide it appears to me it is most difficult to come to any conclusion as to the mental condition of the patient.

3518. Have you thought out a combination of unions?—It is rather difficult to explain an area, but I had in mind, for instance, the Sussex district where there are four Poor Law unions and none of them is equipped to receive mental cases. It would appear that one of those institutions could quite easily be set on one side for the reception of the patients from the whole of that area, which is quite a small area having in mind the transport facilities of to-day.

3519. And you think the relatives would have a proper opportunity in a case of that sort of keeping in touch with the patients?—If you put one institution in the centre of the district it would not be more than 10 or 12 miles away. That is the kind of area we suggest. (Mr. Usher): I am afraid in the main there would have to be larger areas than this. I have in mind Hull which would take in four or five unions round there, a matter of 40 miles. I quite appreciate the fact that it is rather a long way for friends to go, but it is better than things are arranged at the present time. I mean it is so absolutely necessary to alter the state of things that obtains to-day; if the friends have to submit to some little inconvenience it is worth it.

3520. You think there would not be any inconvenience in rural places like Devonshire or, we will say, in Settle in Westmorland?—Yes, I think there would. I have been labouring the point of small workhouses, and I had in mind Devonshire and Cornwall; I have been round there this year. May I give you one case? There was a Master in a workhouse. I said, "Where do you put your temporary lunatics?" He replied, "I will show you," and he showed me a small room. I asked, "Where do you put your women?" He said, "Here. Supposing we had a man here under a 14 days' order and a woman brought in under a 14 days' order, we should have to decide which was the worse of the two before putting them in the room." You will see the reason for labouring this point when I tell you how very difficult it is. (Mr. Senior): We do not suggest it is easy to combine the areas, but there is the necessity for something being done, and I think that the patient should be thought of rather than the friends; they will have to take the inconveniences with it; there are means of transport to-day which there were not ten years ago.

3521. Really the County asylum is probably more convenient and more available than any other institution?—That may be so in many cases. (Mr. Usher):

5 November, 1924.]

MR. HAROLD SENIOR and MR. GEORGE USHER.

But we want to obviate the need of taking the case to an asylum.

3522. That was your point; you would have some other institution?—Yes.

3523. Lord Eustace Percy: Mr. Senior, did I understand you to say that the institution in which your mental wards are is four miles from your infirmary?—That is so.

3524. That is to say, that your mental wards are in the workhouse, as it were?—That is so. We have a general institution so-called and an infirmary which is four miles away.

3525. So that really your mental wards are in the non-medical section of your institution?—That is so; we have no resident medical man; he visits twice a day.

3526. Is that common in Poor Law institutions in England?—Yes, there are a good many places where that occurs; we are probably further away than most cases. The intention was to remove the remainder of the institution some day to the infirmary, but we cannot afford to do it. I do not know of many such cases, except in some of the London places; Marylebone Infirmary is quite at a distance from the institution. I know of that one case. (Mr. Usher): I should think there are more mental wards away from the hospital in big institutions than in them. I think ours is an exceptional place, where the mental wards are really part of the hospital.

3527. I suppose you would agree that the separation is very desirable?—Personally I prefer it very near as part of the hospital; it works very well in our union; you are under the eye of the doctor and the superintendent nurse all the time.

3528. If you have a large floating population passing through your mental wards, how does your medical superintendent manage to do his work at the infirmary four miles away and also do his observation work in the mental ward?—(Mr. Senior): In our case it is not the same medical man; we have a separate medical officer who visits only and is not resident. It may be necessary for him to come four times a day, but his regular visits are twice a day. If a patient comes in and requires his attention, the patient receives his attention as soon as the doctor can be got at.

3529. In most Poor Law institutions where there is a permanent population in the mental wards that permanent population is relatively small—relatively I mean to the numbers who are passing through for observation?—In the case of Southampton the permanent cases to-day are roughly 58 men and about 60 women, and the total population for the mental wards was, I think, 61 on the male side and 65 or 66 on the female side.

3530. I think you told us you had about 270 a year passing through?—Yes.

3531. Those 270 patients, your temporary population, are practically subject to no inspection from outside at all, because the Board of Control representative only comes about once a year?—Yes.

3532. Practically you have a large temporary population which is never inspected by any outside person whether administrative or medical?—They are inspected by the guardians, of course.

3533. By no one else?—By no outside authority.

3534. Have the guardians any control at all whether a case is passed on to the mental hospital or kept at your institution as a permanent detention case or discharged—have the guardians got anything to say in the matter at all?—With regard to the question of their being sent to an asylum or being detained, not at all. The medical officer acts for them in discharging people under any section in the institution.

3535. So that to put it graphically, the medical officer, with the justice of course, is deciding whether the case shall be sent to the mental hospital, costing the guardians 25s. a week, or whether it shall be kept permanently detained at the institution?—That is true. (Mr. Senior): We think those cases should not come into it.

3536. Chairman: I have been asked to put this question to you. Have you any view as to whether relatives should be present at this periodical revision of the case that you contemplate by a medical officer?—No, I should suggest not.

3537. Have you any view as to the authority under which such intermediate institutions as you have figured should act—which branch of Local Government?—I think it would still have to come under a joint committee of guardians who would have to pay.

3538. As a Poor Law institution?—Yes.

3539. As part of the Poor Law organisation?—Yes, I think that would be better. (Mr. Usher): Before you leave the other point, although we do not suggest that the friends of the patients should be there at the revision, yet we think, as is done under the Mental Deficiency Act, a report should be given of the home surroundings, because that must have a great deal to do with whether the patient is discharged or not. (Mr. Senior): That is a case of after-care, of course.

Chairman: Thank you very much for your assistance and the evidence you have given us.

(The Witnesses withdrew.)

(After an adjournment.)

MR. L. WHITEMORE, J.P., called and examined.

3540. Chairman: Are you a Justice of the Peace for the City of London?—For the County of London.

3541. Have you been appointed a Judicial Authority in the County of London under the Lunacy Acts?—Yes.

3542. I understand you have had considerable experience as a judicial authority in dealing with petitions for reception orders in the case of private patients?—Yes. First of all I should like to say—I am only speaking for myself, not for any of my colleagues—I find the greatest trouble we have is the division of the Act into two parts. There is considerable trouble over what is known as the three-day order dealing with Poor Law cases, and it seems to me that Section 20 is on all fours with Section 11. Section 11 is for private cases and for dealing with emergency orders, and Section 20 is the same for the Poor Law cases. Personally, I have always understood the legislature to mean that the same was implied by Section 20 as by Section 11.

A relieving officer goes to see a patient under Section 21, and he has knowledge, and he finds the condition is such that he must bring him in under Section 20, so that precisely the same rules apply. I think Section 21 is applicable to Section 20 as to Section 11; that is to say, he is to give notice to the justice within three days.

3543. Then your point is that there is an unnecessary duplication under the Act?—Yes. I find the Act is divided into two parts, and if it could be so altered so as to make it the same, it would be most desirable. But first of all I should like to say in passing that the justice has to make an order that the patient should be examined.

3544. We are anxious to keep distinct the procedure under the two systems—the pauper system and the private patient system. We have had a good deal of evidence from justices and others as to how they deal with pauper cases. Where I think you can assist us is as to how the justices deal with private cases. We have not had much information on that hitherto, and we should like you to give us your view as to the present system of dealing with private patients. Will you tell us how you are brought into action in the case of a private patient?—I have had to deal with them in three different ways. First of all, a case has gone in as a Poor Law case, and then the friends wish to proceed by petition for the patient to go to a private asylum. Then I have had petitions independently of that in the first instance; and then again I have had to deal with patients already moved under Section 11 for removal to an asylum, and there we have a petition again. In all cases a petition is presented giving the full facts of the case, and in all cases you see the patients, except when they are removed under an emergency order.

3545. There is no obligation to see private patients?—No, that is the point I was making; I think it undesirable that any justice should make an order unless he sees the patient.

3546. Do you yourself in practice ever see the patients?—I always see them. I have never made an order without seeing the patient.

3547. What benefit do you derive from seeing the patient—how does it assist you in your duty?—You have the medical certificate to start with, and then you converse with the patient, and are able to draw some conclusion as to his mental state.

3548. You have two medical certificates before you?—Yes.

3549. And do those certificates suggest to you points which you can follow up?—Yes, and then I like to see the patient alone and have a conversation with him.

3550. Do you find that patients in practice have much to say to you?—Some have and some have not. Some will scarcely speak to you; others, again, are very communicative indeed.

3551. But do you get satisfaction to yourself in discharging your duties from information you obtain from the patients themselves?—Yes.

3552. And you find that of assistance; and you recommend that in all cases the patients should be actually seen by the certifying justice?—Most certainly.

3553. Do you find much advantage taken of the provision that a third party may be present? There may be one person to be appointed by the alleged lunatic to be present with him or her at the inquiry before you?—I have not had a case of that kind.

3554. Have you found that you have the relatives before you?—Oh, yes, but not on all occasions.

3555. But you have had the petitioner, I suppose?—Oh, yes, on petition; and where it has been a case outside the Poor Law, or outside Section 11, I have always gone to their own homes to see them.

3556. Do you think it is of importance that at that stage you should be brought into contact with the relatives of the patients?—That has its advantages and its disadvantages.

3557. No doubt there is a balance of consideration?—Personally, I like to see the relatives, but it all depends upon the condition of things. In some cases it is of no assistance at all. In a chronic drink case, as a rule they are not of very much assistance. There is very often a feeling that they want to get rid of them, in the circumstances. It is not like an ordinary patient. With an ordinary patient it is desirable, I think, to see the relatives and obtain all the information you can; but in a drink case you do not very often get much assistance from them.

3558. I should have thought the relatives of an alcoholic case have just as much interest as in any other class of cases?—They have an interest, but they have a feeling.

3559. You mean, it is rather a feeling that it is a disgrace, and they would rather not take part in the proceedings?—Yes.

3560. When you speak of a disadvantage in the presence of relatives, do you think some relatives find it painful to be present?—That is so, and would rather not be present.

3561. But do not you attach importance to relatives having an opportunity to be present if they so desire?—Personally, I should welcome and desire everyone to be present who could; but we must remember, having in consideration the class of patients with which you are dealing, that privacy is essential.

3562. You do not want it to be converted into a public court?—Of course, I do not mean that.

3563. You see, the person who applies for an order is, of course, entitled to be present, and that person is generally a relative, is it not?—Generally so—in all my cases it has been so.

3564. If there is a relative present, the petitioner, and if a patient is entitled, and knows he is entitled to have somebody else there also, is it desirable to summon any more members of the family to this inquiry?—I do not think it is, unless there is something altogether undesirable to start with, and there is an atmosphere about it.

3565. You mean, if there is an atmosphere of uncertainty or suspicion?—Yes, and in that case you would get all you could from those directly concerned.

3566. But you know you are already empowered to obtain further information before making the order, and if you feel any suspicion about a case, you could send for anyone you wanted?—I have a case in mind, the case of a husband and his wife. She is a chronic drink case, and if she herself makes allegations against him, which is frequently the case when she is in drink, then you get all the information you can.

3567. But I am at the moment on the point as to whether relatives—next-of-kin—should have notice of an inquiry, and I suggest to you that, if there is an atmosphere of suspicion or doubt about the case, the judicial authority already has power to adjourn consideration of the application, and give such notice as he thinks fit, and summon any person to attend before him; so that if you want to clear your mind of any suspicion in the case, you could adjourn it and ask to see, let us say, a son or daughter or other independent relative?—Yes, I could do that.

3568. Do not you think that affords a sufficient safeguard, seeing that the applicant is already present, and the patient is entitled to have a third party?—Yes.

3569. In dealing with applications for an order in the case of private patients, have you felt the presence of that element or atmosphere of suspicion in your mind?—Only in drink cases. What I mean is this—it is rather difficult to explain. You have a woman notified to you under the Lunacy Act; and I have a case in mind. Her husband proceeded by petition. When I saw the woman she made a number of accusations against her husband as being the cause of all the trouble. That is what I mean by an atmosphere of suspicion; and then you want to get all the evidence possible to clear that up. What I feel in those cases is the inadequacy of the Lunacy Acts to deal with those cases. I feel we ought to have some power. A number of these drink cases do not come before the police in the ordinary way; they do not get prosecuted, and under the Inebriates Act of 1898 there have to be three convictions before they can be sent to a home. That is not so under the Lunacy Act. Now when a case of that kind comes before you, you are faced with the evidence that this is solely a drink case, and it will depend on the evidence of the wife or husband; and it should not go to an asylum, but you have no alternative. That is the difficulty, and I feel that in those cases—a case where two medical men certify a drink case, and it is suitable for an inebriates' home, a justice might then make an order to send the person to an inebriates' home.

3570. I was thinking of a different kind of suspicion. In the case of private patients there is prevalent evidently in some quarters an idea that relatives may wish to get the patient put away. Have you found any of the cases you have dealt with invested with any atmosphere of suspicion of that sort?—No, I have not.

5 November, 1924.]

MR. L. WHITEMORE, J.P.

3571. You have not encountered that?—No.

3572. Would you have any means of judging whether the desire of the petitioner was prompted by the interests of the patient, or his own interests?—Well, if you had a suspicion at all, you would adjourn the consideration of the case.

3573. You have power to do that?—Yes, and we do that.

3574. But how would you judge of the motive of the applicant? You have very little means of doing that, have you?—You would have to be guided by the atmosphere and the general evidence. I had one case in which the petition was brought to my house, and I had certain suspicions in my own mind on those lines, and I went to the house of the patient, and when I got there the suspicions were dispelled; the case was obvious; it could not be misunderstood.

3575. In that case something had aroused your suspicion as to the bona fides, and you went to the house where the patient was, and you found there was no ground for the suspicion, because it was obvious?—In that case the patient would not come to me—would not come to me in the house, and that aroused my suspicions further, and I insisted on seeing the patient where she was, and then it was quite obvious that it was all right.

3576. It was obvious that the case was one that should be detained?—Yes.

3577. In short, that there was no ground for suspicion in consequence of the applicant's conduct?—None at all.

3578. Have you any additional safeguards suggested by your experience to prevent the possible risk of certification in cases where certificates should not be granted?—I feel there ought to be a longer time given.

3579. Your suggestion, then falls into line with that of other witnesses that there should be an intermediate period of observation before a final judgment is pronounced on any case?—Yes; that is one weakness of the present Act; there is no period of observation at all.

3580. How does that apply in the case of a private patient? Do you suggest in the case of a private patient that the patient should be kept under provisional observation for a period, and then that the application be renewed to you with such results as the observational period revealed, and then you might pronounce a final order?—No.

3581. Then how would you set about it?—In the case of a private patient we have two medical certificates to start with; then the justice should see the patient, and if he thinks it a case for a longer period than 14 days, without stating any length of time at all, he should make a recommendation to the Board of Control; but first of all, I think, the medical man should state fully his reasons—all certificates are not full.

3582. Is it a prolonged period of adjournment you are contemplating? Of course, we have heard a great deal about the 14 days in the case of a pauper patient, but in the case of a private patient there is an adjournment. Do you suggest a longer period of adjournment should be allowed?—No, I suggest there should be a longer period of observation. Now a voluntary patient is taken under care by giving consent. That in actual practice is almost useless, because it frequently happens that the person who wants to be under observation most thinks he has the least need of it. I feel in a case of that kind where there is a suspicion, or there is a petition brought, however it may be brought—whether voluntarily or by petition—that the two medical men should give special reasons themselves for putting the man under observation, and that the justice himself should not take the responsibility of taking away the liberty of anyone for the longer period, but should act under the Board of Control.

3583. I take it you are quite in sympathy with the views we have heard that a longer time is desirable before certification, either in the case of a private or a pauper patient?—If it is a case for a longer period of adjournment than the 14 days, I think the Board of Control should sanction it, as a greater safeguard. I feel a responsibility in taking away the liberty of anyone without certification; the responsibility is too great to rest upon one man. I feel that where you are convinced that a man may benefit by a system of observation and treatment for a long period, it should be done under the Board of Control.

3584. The upshot of it is, you think there should be a longer period, but if there is to be a longer period, there should be an additional safeguard in the shape of an order from the Board of Control?—Yes, that they should sanction it. There are one or two other points that I want to draw attention to. I think there should be greater safeguards in all cases—the relieving officer and everybody else concerned—against what we call frivolous or needless notifications. I have several cases of that kind, and now you are considering the whole Act, I think I ought to mention this. I will give you one or two cases I have in mind. A mother gave information about her son, who was 20, and said he had a gun in his room and would settle her, and she went in fear of her life. The relieving officer went to the house and saw him. He said his mother was continually nagging him, and would give him no peace. There was a rifle in the house belonging to the volunteers. He took the son in; the medical officer certified no sign of insanity; I saw him, and saw no signs of insanity in the least. Now that has occurred three times, and I think where cases of that kind recur there ought to be some way of strengthening the hands of the justices in putting a stop to it. So where a case has occurred two or three times, a justice might be empowered to see the informant and read over Section 317 Sub-section (1) to him or her, and tell them if it was notified again, the case would be brought before the Board of Control.

3585. Earl Russell: This was a pauper case?—Yes. I have a case in mind again where an ex-soldier suffering from neurasthenia was continually being notified over and over again. I myself saw him three times, and in that case I was able by reference to the Clerk of the Guardians to stop it; but I do think if something of the kind I suggest were introduced, that might be stopped.

3586. Chairman: Is there anything else you wish to draw our attention to?—There is one point I should like to mention, and that is, that I think greater safeguards should be devised now with regard to discharged persons. I have a case in mind, a poor law case, a sewerman sent to an asylum. He came out cured, and his mates refused to work with him, were afraid to work with him, in fact. He attempted suicide, and I am not quite sure what happened; but any way, he is quite sane, and I think you might recommend some machinery whereby a case of that kind might be looked after.

3587. After care?—Yes. Then I think a safeguard should be provided for those taken out under Section 79. I have a case in mind where a woman was in an asylum 13 years—she was 40 years of age, and discharged to the care of a society, and she obtained through these persons a situation; she is there now. She went there without any clothing; the people themselves provided clothing, and now this society come along after she has been there seven months, and want to take her to some other employment. The girl does not want to go, and the matter is causing some trouble and is having a bad effect on the girl's mental health. I think there ought to be some safeguard in a case of that kind.

3588. You mean some precaution ought to be taken that a patient in the hands of a relative or friend should be looked after?—Yes, and I think before being released, the people should prove they are able to look after them.

MR. L. WHITEMORE, J.P.

3589. To see that the destination is a safe one?—Yes. I want to say about the Poor Law, there is no power to adjourn. Under Section 21 you send a patient to the workhouse for 14 days. I think there ought to be power, as under Section 6, to adjourn.

Chairman: We are fully alive to that point; we have heard a great deal about it.

3590. Earl Russell: How are these petitions brought to your notice? Is it a solicitor or a clerk to the justices, or a medical man who tells you you are to act? Who first speaks to you about it?—I have had the Poor Law authorities come direct to me.

3591. When you say "come direct," how do they do it? Who comes to see you, the doctor or the petitioner?—The petitioner.

3592. With a petition?—Yes.

3593. Then you make your appointment?—Yes. What I do in that case is to go immediately and see the patient straight away.

3594. Do you appoint the doctor who makes the examination?—Not in private cases.

3595. You do not?—No. The petitioner brings the certificate with him.

3596. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I want to ask a question about private patients. Do you see a good many of them?—Yes.

3597. Has there been any alteration in the number of cases certified by doctors within the last few months compared with the last few years?—Not as far as my experience goes. I have not had a private case for some time, except under Section 11.

3598. Then you cannot say whether there has been an increase or decrease in the number of private patients?—No.

Sir David Drummond: Do I understand that in the case of a petition accompanied by two doctors' certificates you suggest the magistrate should use his own discretion, and refer it to a Board of Control?

Chairman: I think what the witness meant was this, that he has power at present to adjourn the consideration for 14 days, but if he proposes to exercise the power of adjournment for more than 14 days with a medical certificate before him because he is not satisfied, in that case the Board of Control should have a say in the matter.

Witness: Yes, in every case where the justice came to the conclusion that the patient was not fit to be certified, but should remain under observation, and the two medical men so state in their certificates.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Colonel P. BROOME GILES, C.B., F.R.C.S., J.P., called and examined.

3599. Chairman: You are a Companion of the Bath, a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, and you are also a Justice of the Peace?—That is so.

3600. Have you had considerable experience as a magistrate acting under the Lunacy Acts?—Yes.

3601. Have you been a judicial authority?—Yes.

3602. Have you had to deal with petitions in the case of private patients?—Yes.

3603. Have you had many of those to deal with?—Yes, about 7 or 8 a year since the Act came into existence.

3604. For what County or Borough are you a Justice of the Peace?—I am a Justice of the Peace for Herefordshire, where I practised 25 years, and for 21 years in Buckinghamshire, where I did not practise, and for the last few years I have been at Folkestone, where I have had quite a good lot of cases.

3605. Then you have had great experience of administering the Act in rural as well as urban districts?—Yes.

3606. In administering the code as it is now, in the case of private patients, have you any observations to make as to safeguards?—The only one is that it should be a sine qua non that the magistrate should visit the patient in his house.

3607. There seems to be unanimity in regard to that. Why do you lay so much stress on that?—Because you have to sign a certificate, and unless you have some personal knowledge of what you are signing I do not think you ought to sign.

3608. In practice did you see the patient yourself?—Yes, always.

3609. And you think the practice should be made obligatory?—Yes, because if you do not, there may be some outside influence existing which otherwise you might be able to check.

3610. When you made your orders in the case of private patients, have you had the petitioner before you?—Always.

3611. And the patient?—Always the patient.

3612. Had you any doctor there?—Not in the room at the time. I would not have the doctor in. I visited the patient and asked this question: "Is there anybody here to represent the patient?"—which I think is a very important thing—I think it is a great thing that everyone should be represented, and whether a person is insane or not, I think it is only fair that he should have a friend or a representative in the room with him.

3613. You are aware that under the Act provision is specially made for the attendance, if so desired, of a third party?—Yes.

3614. Did you find in practice that that was taken advantage of to any extent?—No, very seldom.

3615. Did you in practice tell the patient who was before you that he or she could have a friend there if desired?—Yes. I said, "I am a stranger who has made a call upon you. Is there any friend you would like to join in our conversation?" I always tried to make it appear that I was not there in a judicial position.

3616. But you did not find in point of fact that the patients took advantage of this provision?—No.

3617. In the cases you dealt with, you really proceeded on the medical certificates and the statements in the petition before you in the presence of the petitioning relative?—Yes.

3618. And after seeing the patient for yourself?—Yes.

3619. Did you find yourself able, with that material or experience before you, to deal satisfactorily with all the cases?—Having had a fair amount of experience in lunacy, I always made up my mind whether the person was sane or insane before signing. I never would sign until I thoroughly made up my mind.

3620. Did you find much difficulty in making up your mind?—Yes. The very last case I had, I was over an hour and a half before I was able to make up my mind that the person should be under restraint, and it was one of the most violent homicidal people, which I did not know before, but it took me all that time before I could thoroughly satisfy myself.

3621. You had not in the course of your conversation got on the track?—No, I kept off it. He happened to be a man who had been a fifth wrangler, and a very clever man, but there was no doubt about his being homicidal. I found out a few days afterwards what he had done to his own mother a few days before, but I would never sign until I had satisfied myself.

3622. Sir David Drummond: Was not this stated in the certificate of the doctor?—I always see the patient before I see the doctor.

3623. Chairman: So that you hold over the doctor's certificate for examination after you see the case yourself?—Certainly, because I think if I went into the room, having read the doctor's certificate, I might be influenced.

3624. You are in rather an exceptional position, you see, because you are a qualified doctor, but all justices of the peace have not that advantage?—Then they must use their own judgment, the same as I do.

3625. Some of the witnesses have said they found the facts stated in a medical certificate were a useful clue to them in their own interviews, as giving them an indication of the lines to follow up?—Yes, and if I were not a qualified man, I should certainly place the greatest faith in what the doctors have written, but having the qualification, I judge for myself.

3626. Do you mean that people who have not the qualification must rely more than you do upon the medical certificates; but you have the double qualification, being both doctor and magistrate?—Yes, and in both capacities I might make mistakes.

3627. Taking an ordinary justice of the peace less highly privileged, do not you think he would be assisted in his conversation with an alleged lunatic if he had read through the certificate?—Absolutely; it would be really his chief guidance.

3628. And that is the intention manifestly of the scheme?—Yes.

3629. Have you ever found it necessary to adjourn cases under the power in the Act?—No; unfortunately they have always been rather of a heavy type, and any adjournment, I think, would have been a mistake.

3630. They were cases, in short, as to which you were able to make up your mind?—Yes, there was no doubt about them.

3631. Then may I take it you have had no instances of those difficult border line cases?—As a practitioner I have had them, and I have had a fairly good breaking in with numerous neurasthenia and shell-shock cases in the big camps I have had.

3632. We have had an almost unanimous body of evidence to the effect that, at least in cases where there is any difficulty in diagnosis, there should be a period of intermediate or provisional detention for further observation before certification?—Yes, I am quite in agreement with that; because, for instance, in cases of alcoholism, puerperal mania, mental obliquity from sudden shocks, it would be a cruel thing to put those cases immediately into an asylum, because you know that within a very short time, with no organic disease, those people would be well again.

3633. I cannot but feel that it would be a great comfort for a justice of the peace who had a case before him on which he had genuine doubt to say, "I want to know more about this case; I have two medical certificates; I have seen the man, and I do not feel quite sure, and before I discharge this public duty I should like to know more about the case," and to continue it for some time under some kind of order such as would preserve the safety of the man himself, and also safeguard the public, and afford an opportunity of seeing what the case really is?—I quite agree with that, and I should have an adjournment in a case like that.

3634. Speaking from the magistrate's point of view, I should have thought it rather a comfort to feel that you were not called upon to decide at once—possibly a little more delay would give you more information as to the facts of the case?—I quite agree, and I should do it.

3635. At present there is provision for a 14 days' adjournment. Do you think that should be the full period?—I heard the last witness speak about the Board of Control—I should be rather antagonistic about that. I should have thought that after 14 days, it is certain action should be taken.

3636. The suggestion made by Mr. Whitmore was that if it was to be more than 14 days, the Board of Control should come in, because that involved a considerable interference with the liberty of the subject?—I understand.

Sir David Drummond: What does the witness suggest would occur to a private patient during the 14 days' observation? Where would he be—at home?

3637. Chairman: What would happen if a patient is brought to you by the relative and you are not quite sure about it and you say, "Let us adjourn the case for 14 days for consideration"? What is to happen to the person in the meantime? The patient may be for aught you know insane, but for aught you know he may be sane; and if he is insane risks are attached to the position, but if he be sane there are no risks. What do you suggest should be done during the period of remand?—I should have him placed under the charge of nurses; I should have nurses in and a resident medical officer and the man carefully watched; on the other hand, I think it is the duty of the country to provide certain places for such cases.

3638. At present the only place that such a person could be sent to would be the workhouse, is it not?—Yes. I am vice-chairman of our workhouse and I have been for some time, and although the people are treated very well there, I do not think it is the proper place, with its surroundings, for a private patient to go to.

3639. We have heard that quite a number of private cases, as they ultimately turn out to be, have to pass through a pauper stage en route, as it were, to their destination. Have you found that to be a disagreeable feature under the existing law?—It is rather an offensive thing to the relatives, and many relatives strongly object to what they call the taint of pauperism which there is about it; but which I do not think really does exist. In our workhouse, for instance, we have trained nurses and doctors quite as good as in any hospital, and it is only the association of class—that is all.

3640. It is not quite so much class really, is it? I think anybody would rather resent the thought that their father or sister or brother had been sent to the workhouse?—Yes. That is the kind of thing.

3641. Lord Eustace Percy: You say you do not think the workhouse infirmary is a proper place with its surroundings for a private case?—Yes, for this simple reason, that you are getting mental cases into an infirmary where general diseases are being treated, and I do not think that is a good thing.

3642. But that applies to the pauper cases as well as to the private cases?—Yes, but the pauper cases are put into separate wards; and if you have sufficient separate wards in a workhouse, apart from the family objection I think you do get persons well taken care of.

3643. Sir Humphry Rolleston: When a private case is sent to a workhouse does not the patient go into a separate room?—Yes, but the relatives know that such persons are under the care of the guardians; they are in the guardians' home or the workhouse, or whatever it may be called, and that is the objection.

3644. Chairman: But where else is there for them to go?—I know that is the great difficulty; what are you to do? Are you going to build separate houses for these people? We can only send them to the places which exist now, and that is the workhouse, and I say it is not the proper place for them to go to, because of the dislike on the part of the relatives.

3645. Have you thought about this: We know there is a considerable movement in favour of having places where non-certified cases might be treated. Would it not be possible to have a place where a case, the certification of which was open to doubt, could be kept?—Quite possible.

3646. There are some such existing already, but whether they are legal or not is a question. However, one knows that is a possible recommendation of this Commission?—Yes. But then again the question arises, if people are not certified and they commit suicide, or they prove to be homicidal, will there not be a terrible outcry?—that is my difficulty.

5 November, 1924.]

COLONEL P. BROOME GILES, C.B., F.R.C.S., J.P.

3647. I think it would be inevitable that you would have to provide for some degree of control or compulsory detention during that interval of time; and that was what was suggested with regard to pauper patients, and in cases where there had to be an adjournment, and the magistrate was uncertain as to the safety of the case. Would you suggest that it might be dealt with under a temporary order, provided there was accommodation available for uncertified cases?—Yes. Once the order is obtained and they could be treated without certification, no difficulty would arise whatever.

3648. You have been on a visiting committee, have you not?—Yes. I was on the Visiting Committee in Herefordshire, and at Aylesbury I was Chairman of the House Committee; and we had this rule, that when people went out on probation they came before the whole Committee. Now it is a very trying thing, particularly for a nervous woman, to come before 16 people. Before the war two of us with the medical superintendent used to come in, and the people who were interviewed were asked, "Are you well and happy?" and so on, and everything was done to make them feel comfortable, but to be catechised by 16 people I think is not giving the person on probation fair play.

3649. Of course one wants to avoid any semblance of forensic inquiries or publicity, and I understand you wish to keep the thing as simple and as little formal as possible?—Quite.

3650. I wish you would tell us about your experience as a member of a visiting committee. What institution did you visit?—I used to visit the Herefordshire County Infirmary and I used to visit the Abergavenny Asylum many years ago, and in Buckinghamshire I used to visit the institution at Stowe every fortnight, and I have visited the Chartham County Asylum since I have been living at Folkestone.

3651. How often did you visit these places?—I visited once a month and sometimes once a fortnight in Buckinghamshire and I visit every three or four months now. We have a number of patients from our area in the Chartham Asylum, and I go out there to see how they are getting on and to see if there are any complaints.

3652. Do you think that your visits give the patients a satisfactory opportunity of access to the outside world and an opportunity of making complaints?—There is always the chance of making complaints when I go, and I sometimes get complaints; but when you investigate them you find there is practically nothing in them. Sometimes we get complaints about diet and many times we get complaints like this: "I do not like that woman, she has a red head" or "I do not like the hat she wears" but you hardly ever get a complaint of a tangible nature, because the superintendent of an asylum is so very careful that very seldom can a patient be abused or knocked about.

3653. Do you find that patients complain of being detained against their will?—Yes, that is a very common complaint.

3654. When a patient says to you, "I should be out" or "I should not be here," what do you do?—I generally hear what they have to say, take notes and go to the superintendent and examine into the case. For instance, at the Buckinghamshire Asylum for 16 years a lady worked in the washhouse, and every time I went to visit she used to say to me, "Do not you think I ought to go before the Board to-day?" She was a woman who was very disorderly in her dress, and I used to say, "Had you not better put it off until the next Board?" and that answer always satisfied her. That was before the war, and I know she is in the same asylum now. You want to treat them as charitably and kindly as you can. You may be sure when you get a complaint which is a genuine complaint which can be substantiated, it is always investigated.

3655. If a patient, possibly a patient who was genuinely on the way to recovery, thought he had reached a time when he should be released and wanted seriously to interview you with regard to it, would you have an opportunity of discussing his case with him alone?—Oh, yes. There has never been in my experience any difficulty put in the way of a patient interviewing the visitor.

3656. Have you had any interviews yourself with patients?—Yes, several. I have always insisted upon it, and I have always said, "If you want to see me come and see me yourself," and I say then, "Let us have your tale. You are no longer a patient and I am no longer a magistrate; we are man to man, let us have your grievance."

3657. But surely in a dangerous case that would not do, because you might find yourself shut up in a room with a homicidal patient?—I won the middle-weight gloves at the United Hospital.

3658. I see—so that you do not flinch from that kind of thing?—If you want to do your duty, you must take risks. I took risks during the war, though perhaps I should not like to take them now.

3659. But you have had the interviews yourself?—Yes, and there has been no opposition raised.

3660. Have you ever found as the result of such interviews that there was really cause for complaint on the part of any patient?—I have found an actual cause of complaint with regard to the treatment by an attendant, and I have gone to the superintendent and said, "Here is a complaint; do you think it is correct? If you do, you must bring the attendant before the Board the next time we come; if you do not think it is correct, let there be a fresh attendant put there so that there shall be no grievance," and I have never had any difficulty there.

3661. Have you found any cases of ill-treatment verified to your own satisfaction?—Yes, in the case of an attendant, and the attendant was discharged.

3662. Was that case brought to your knowledge by the patient?—No. That case was brought to my knowledge by the medical officer, and we had it up before the Board.

3663. Have you ever had any case of ill-treatment brought to your notice by a patient?—Yes, two or three, and in one case, which was sustained, the attendant was removed.

3664. So that that patient, having been ill-treated, had no difficulty in bringing the matter before you as visitor, and you took action, and the defaulting attendant was dismissed?—Yes. There is one thing I would like to say, and it is this: I think people out on probation should have rather more careful after-treatment, because they very often go back to a place where they are not living in a house but in a hovel; and where people who have had every care in an institution go out, they sometimes get badly fed and neglected to a great extent, and I think more supervision should be exercised over those who go out of an institution on probation.

3665. Mr. Snell: You said you always like to see the patient alone. Does that mean in the absence of the doctor?—Certainly.

3666. What is the special advantage of seeing a patient in the absence of the doctor, when the visitor must be guided by the doctor's advice?—He has to be guided to a great extent by the doctor's advice, but he has to form his own opinion. I do think this, that these people when in the presence of other people, who they know will certify against them, are a little bit nervous.

3667. Assuming the case of a visitor without any medical knowledge such as you possess, he must be guided in the end by the doctor?—Yes, in the end, but I think he should see the person.

3668. You said a justice of the peace, you thought, should visit a patient at his own house and also see the petitioner?—Yes.

3669. Is the relative, who is the petitioner, accepted as the representative of a patient?—Yes. I always ask the question: "Have you any friends you would like to be present?" and if there is no one you must take the petitioner.

5 November, 1924.]

COLONEL P. BROOME GILES, C.B., F.R.C.S., J.P.

3670. Suppose you had a relative who had petitioned to have a patient certified, could you accept him or her as representing the patient?—I should take them simply as the petitioner, and not as an individual who was the patient's friend.

3671. Is it always to be assumed that patients are unwilling to go into an institution?—No, certainly not. There are some people who will tell you at once, "I am very ill; send me away."

3672. What opportunity is there of a patient in a general way having a private conference with the visitor? Is there a special room provided for the purpose?—I have always had them in a separate room.

3673. There is no difficulty about that?—None at all. I mean I should kick up a row if I did not have a private room. I have never had any opposition to it.

3674. Earl Russell: One thing you said rather struck me when you were talking about your interviews with patients. You said you got on friendly terms with them, and I want to know if at any time during the interview you conveyed to the patient's mind that you were the person who would be depriving him of his liberty, and if so whether they ever made any kind of appeal to you?—I have been qualified as a medical man for 53 years, and that is the last thing I should contemplate, because there you put the fear of God into the man right off.

3675. If you do not do that, is it not possible that the patient may be certified without knowing that you are the person who is to decide?—That is a question I have never considered.

3676. Do not you think the theory of the Act is that the patient should have some idea that he is before a representative of the public, before being deprived of his liberty?—I have not read the Act in that way.

3677. Miss Symons: Might not that account for the fact that they do not very often want other people present?—I cannot tell you what is in the back of their minds. My own opinion is that that feeling has never existed with them.

3678. It only occurred to me that if one thought it was just a friendly interview and nothing depended on it, one naturally would not think of inviting anyone else to represent one. There is that side of the matter, is there not?

3679. Chairman: Where do you carry out your examinations?—In a room—it may be a bedroom or a sitting-room.

3680. In the private house?—In the private house.

3681. Then, so far as the patient is concerned, may your visit be indistinguishable from that of a doctor?—Yes. I go as a stranger, and I apologise and say, "I have come to have a little conversation with you," and then we begin.

3682. Of course, I can see the delicacy of saying, "I have come to see if you are insane or not"?—I never say that.

3683. Earl Russell: If a patient were only partially insane, he would never know at what stage he could fight the order?—I never ask that and I have never had any difficulty, and we frequently get on quite friendly terms.

3684. Miss Symons suggests that it is hardly a friendly visit if you have come to lock them up?—But they do not know that I have come to lock them up. Do not you think it would frighten them more if they knew that this man had the power of sending them away? I can tell you that they are awfully impressionable, and once they get the slightest hint of anything it makes them a great deal worse.

3685. I quite appreciate that, but I wanted to know if you realised that it was a provision of the Act which puts you there as a justice representing the public, before the man is deprived of his liberty and in order to give him an opportunity of protesting?—I never have taken that view, and unless I alter my mind I shall not.

3686. Sir David Drummond: Are you aware that in some parts of the country the patient is seen by the magistrate at a police court?—No, I have never known that.

3687. Chairman: Not in private cases?—No, nor in pauper cases. I will tell you what I have done in court: When I have seen a man who is not fit to be a criminal, I have sent him away to be examined.

3688. You would not approve of such a thing?—No, certainly not. It would be a most barbarous thing, I think.

3689. Lord Eustace Percy: Have you ever refused to sign an order in the case of a petition backed by two medical certificates?—No, because they have always been hopeless cases. As a rule people do not like the word "lunacy" and do not like certification, and I have had many cases where I have been called in as a friend and have recommended a nursing home—cases like alcoholism, puerperal mania, and sudden shocks.

3690. What I was referring to was the extent to which a magistrate was a real check on the medical man?—It can only be by exercising his own judgment and his own views. His is simply an act of administration, and if he finds nothing to the contrary, I take it he is obliged to sign, but if he has any doubt, he can adjourn a case or refuse to sign.

3691. And it is very rare that the magistrate's opinion goes against the medical opinion?—I have only known it twice and in one case it was the class of man who should not have been a magistrate. It was a pauper case and the magistrate refused to certify and within two weeks the wife's throat was badly cut and the man had committed suicide. I do not think any magistrate would act against skilled medical opinion.

3692. I want to ask you a question as to discharge. From your experience of visiting committees have you ever known the procedure for discharge under Section 77 (1) taken; that is, by three visitors without the intervention of medical officers?—No. I have never known anybody's discharge refused if the medical superintendent or the staff certified that they were fit for probation.

3693. Have you ever known of a case of discharge except with the authority of the medical officer?—No, never—and the committee afterwards.

3694. And any two members of the committee?—Yes—we never had two members.

3696. But under Section 73 the board of guardians, who are responsible for the maintenance of a pauper lunatic, have the right to order a discharge?—I should doubt it.

Earl Russell: That is subject to Section 74.

3697. Lord Eustace Percy: So that in practice the only way of discharging is on the certificate of the superintendent?—Yes.

3698. Have you ever known of a case of a patient being discharged on the presentation of a petition?—I have known that but not where I have acted as a magistrate.

3699. Chairman: You are of course familiar with Form 8 under which the medical practitioner gives you, first of all, the facts observed by himself and then the facts which have been communicated to him by others?—Yes.

3700. Have you in practice ever taken any steps to verify the facts which the medical practitioner has set forth?—Yes, always.

3701. What I mean is this: the certificate tells you that the certifying doctor has obtained some hearsay evidence, as we lawyers would say; do you take any steps to verify that hearsay evidence?—I always ask one or two people who have given him the evidence if that was their statement.

5 November, 1924.]

COLONEL P. BROOME GILES, C.B., F.R.C.S., J.P.

3702. Because I can conceive a case like this: the doctor might, among many other facts, state this: "His wife says that he goes about complaining that she is unfaithful to him." Now on the face of it would you in such a case ask to see the wife?—I should ask to see the wife as I always have done. There is often no foundation at all for such an allegation as that.

3703. Then you have seen the people in order to verify the independently ascertained facts which have been communicated to the medical practitioner by others?—Yes, certainly.

3704. Do you think such an investigation ought to be made obligatory on the justice?—Yes. Then you would have a perfect check on what I do not think exists, that is, the possible squaring of the practitioner.

3705. Do you think it is necessary to make that obligatory?—No, I do not.

3706. That is the point I want to make because I can conceive that there might be many idle statements which it would be mere waste of time to follow up; while, on the other hand, there might be some critical statements which it was worth while following up, and I want to know whether you think there should be some discretion allowed on the part of the justice?—Yes, when you have examined a witness sometimes you can tell whether the evidence is good or bad, but I think such a case so seldom would occur that it would not be much benefit to make it obligatory.

3707. Sir David Drummond: Do not you think it might deter a doctor from signing a certificate if he knew there was to be such a compulsory investigation on the part of a magistrate?—I do not know about that.

3708. You know, I suppose, that there is great difficulty in finding a doctor to sign a certificate now?—Is there? I have never found that personally.

3709. Lord Eustace Percy: In your experience of three day orders do you think that many three day orders are made by relieving officers and the police in cases where people should not be sent to the mental wards of a workhouse?—Those are the cases I have already spoken about—the cases of alcoholism, and so on. There are many cases of alcoholism where a person is violent and has tried to commit suicide; then what are you to do? You have no other place for them. You cannot keep them in the cells of a police station; therefore it means sending a person to a public gaol and I think sending a man to a public gaol is a far greater stain on him than sending him to a workhouse.

3710. Then is it only in cases of alcoholism that such a thing arises?—That is the only occasion on which I have ever known of it.

3711. Thank you very much.

SEVENTH DAY.

Tuesday, 18th November, 1924.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (Chairman).

THE EARL RUSSELL.

SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E.

MR. N. MICKLEM, K.C.

MR. H. SNELL, M.P.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Chairman: This morning we have to welcome to our deliberations Mr. Micklem, who has been appointed a member of our Commission, to take the place of Mr. Justice Mackinnon. I am sure we are all very glad to have his assistance. At the same time we have to express our regret that we are losing the services of Lord Eustace Percy, who has been called to another office. During the time he was with us we recognised what assistance he would have been able to give us, had he remained; but he will be now going to another sphere of usefulness, and I am sure we tender him our congratulations.

Our first witness this morning is Lieutenant-Colonel J. Francis Dixon.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D., called and examined.

3712. Chairman: Dr. Dixon, you are Medical Superintendent of the City Mental Hospital, Humberstone, Leicester?—Yes.

3713. When were you appointed to that office?—In November, 1911.

3714. Had you previously had experience in the same line of work?—Yes, I had had about eight years' experience in the Three Counties Asylum, Bedfordshire, and also a year as house physician at Bethlem Royal Hospital.

18 November, 1924.]

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3715. Has your whole career been spent in mental work?—No, not entirely.

3716. Were you engaged in general practice first?—No, I was not engaged in general practice, but I was engaged in the South African War; that is the first thing I did after I qualified; I was about 2½ years there.

3717. Then you obtained your first appointment in Bethlem Royal Hospital, and since then you have been engaged in this particular department of work?—Yes.

3718. It would be interesting to know whether you had any special preparation for this work in the sense of special study or research before you began it?—Before I began, no; but in Bethlem, yes. I took out the certificate which at that time was the only qualification that one could take in this particular branch for medical men.

3719. We have been interested in the question of the qualifications of gentlemen occupying your position—whether it is desirable for them to have special qualifications. In your instance you have acquired your experience really in practice?—Yes; but, of course, I did take the only qualification then obtainable when I was learning the work at Bethlem; that is the teaching hospital for this particular branch.

3720. It might be convenient if you told us first of all about your institution. It is a public mental hospital?—A public mental hospital—the City Mental Hospital.

3721. Where is it situated?—At Humberstone, on the borders of the city of Leicester.

3722. But within the city boundaries?—Partly within the city boundaries and partly outside; part of the estate is one side and part the other.

3723. What accommodation have you?—Roughly, 1,000 beds—just under 1,000. We did accommodate over 1,000 during the war, when we had some overcrowding.

3724. When was the asylum built?—I think it was opened in 1869.

3725. Has it been added to, or modernised, since then?—One can hardly say it has been modernised, but about 25 years ago it had a very large addition for accommodating about 350, and that is now used for the male patients, whereas the old building is entirely devoted to female patients.

3726. Is it one block of buildings, or are there a series of detached buildings?—No, it is practically one block. The old building and the new building are connected by a corridor, but I could not say that the new building was built on modern lines, as we understand the term now.

3727. From what sources are the patients under your charge derived?—From the city of Leicester entirely, with the exception of some London County patients on the female side who are boarded from the London County. They are accommodated with us because we have some spare accommodation on the female side; and we have a very few private patients, who may come from outside the city.

3728. Have you experienced any congestion in your hospital recently?—No, not as is understood by the regulations.

3729. What I am thinking of is this: We have heard that in some districts the relieving officer has been embarrassed in designating an asylum for the reception of a patient, because of the crowded state of the asylum to which he would ordinarily send his patients. Are you always able to take those that are sent to you?—We have been up to the present; we have never had any difficulty in that matter; but of course we have not got very much spare accommodation.

3730. The fact that you are able to take patients from London rather suggests to me that you have a little margin of accommodation?—Yes, we have some margin on the female side, but very little on the male side.

3731. With regard to your private patients, which you tell us are few in number, have you special accommodation for them?—We have separate accommodation on the female side for about 20 private patients of a certain class. We have some other private patients who are not in a suitable mental condition to take advantage of that particular kind of accommodation, and those patients are kept in the general wards. On the male side we have no separate accommodation.

3732. But I suppose these private patients will pay for their accommodation and treatment?—Yes; they do not pay very much more than what are known technically as pauper patients or rate-aided patients.

3733. That is to say you charge them practically what it costs you to keep your other class of patients?—And something more.

3734. And the excess—what one may call the profit on those cases—will go to the general funds of the institution?—Yes, that is so.

3735. I think you have given special study to the working of the lunacy code which you administer?—Yes.

3736. And of course you have had ample opportunities, have you not, of testing its efficiency?—Yes.

3737. In the course of putting the Statute and the Rules under which you act into operation, have you encountered any difficulties?—Not difficulties that were insurmountable.

3738. Have you found, however, that your administration was to some extent encumbered or embarrassed by the terms of the Statute under which you act?—I cannot say that I have found myself embarrassed, but I have heard of instances where other people have felt embarrassed.

3739. We are interested in the question of the smooth working of the code, as to whether difficulties are encountered under the present Acts in carrying on the day-to-day work of institutions such as yours; and we are anxious to have from medical superintendents like yourself any suggestions as to simplification or improvement of the code under which you work. We shall therefore welcome from you any suggestions which you can make for our assistance upon that topic, and we should like you to tell us quite freely what you have experienced yourself in your own practice. There is nothing like hearing a man talk about his own business; he knows the practical difficulties that he encounters. We hope you will assist us by telling us quite frankly what has occurred to you in your experience which might be bettered by a more satisfactory legal system. Have you any such suggestions to make to us?—Speaking generally, of course, if one interprets some of the legal enactments purely by the letter of the law, one can raise difficulties, but on the other hand if you can just go behind the letter of the law and see what is the spirit of the law, I think a good number of those difficulties can be overcome.

3740. That is not a task that should be set to anybody, to have to go behind the letter of the law in order to ascertain its spirit. The letter and the spirit should be one?—There may be a good deal in that, of course, but I will give you an instance. We have what are known as continuation orders. A continuation report is for the purpose of continuing the original reception order, which is the authority on which we detain the patient, and the continuing order by its form necessitates your stating that in your opinion the patient is insane, still insane, and a proper person to be detained under care and treatment. Now as a matter of fact that continuing report may be due to be written and sent to the Commissioners at a time when the patient is not insane, in your opinion. That patient may be convalescent, and may be perfectly sensible and quite reasonable, and may desire to remain until the termination of convalescence.

3741. Yes, I could appreciate that from the medical point of view it is very difficult to say where convalescence has reached the stage of cure?—Yes.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3742. Do you find that you have cases which are steadily improving, but as to which it is difficult to say at what precise moment of time they pass from the region of unsound mind into the region of sound mind?—Yes, I think that is the difficulty; and the same thing would apply to people who suffer from recurrent attacks. It is sometimes rather difficult to be able to say in regard to a continuation report that a person at the particular time when you have to write is insane. The patient may not be insane at that time; the patient may remain quite sane for weeks, or even months, and then that patient may have two, or three, or four attacks, lasting a week or ten days, when he is absolutely helpless, and requires a lot of attention, quite incoherent, and unable to look after himself. It becomes rather a difficult matter, if you take the letter of the law, in the intervals between those attacks, to say whether the patient is sane or insane.

3743. You may have to make your continuation report just at a period which we, as laymen, would call a lucid interval?—Yes, quite; but then the question is whether a patient is altogether insane who has only infrequent lucid intervals, or short lucid intervals. Of course you can have recurrent attacks, the lucid intervals of which last a year, we will say. You cannot keep a patient in an asylum for a year when the patient may be perfectly sane, although you know that the likelihood is that the patient may have another attack next year. I have patients who come in six, seven, eight and nine times, and after a time it becomes a question whether it is not better for them to stay in altogether, although for a large part of their time they are quite sane.

3744. When you speak of the continuation report it is a term we have not had as yet. Is that really the periodical report you make upon the cases under your charge?—Yes, I have to make a report at the end of the year, and then at the end of two years, and then at the end of the 4th, 7th and 12th years, and every 5 years thereafter.

3745. To whom do you make that report?—To the Commissioners of the Board of Control.

3746. Does that apply to all your patients?—Yes.

3747. Do you then feel some embarrassment in certain cases, cases of convalescence or cases of recurrence, in giving the certificate of continued insanity which is contemplated?—I think so, yes.

3748. Although at the same time you have no doubt as to the desirability of the continued detention of the patient for a time in your institution?—Yes.

3749. In the interest of the patient himself?—In the interest of the patient himself.

3750. Do you avail yourself extensively of the power of letting out patients on probation or trial?—Yes; a great number of my patients go out frequently for days and week-ends to their friends and relatives, if they have decent homes to go to.

3751. Of course, while they are away from you on that basis they remain certified lunatics?—Yes.

3752. And can therefore be brought back?—Yes: I have power myself to allow a patient 48 hours' leave by the Act. For any more than that I have to get permission from the Committee; but I frequently give them leave.

3753. I should imagine that you would take advantage of that power of allowing your patients out on trial in cases of convalescence?—Yes, a great number of my patients go out for week-ends for a month before they go out for good, to get used to the home surroundings again after a period of detention.

3754. As I appreciate your difficulty, it is this: There are patients in your hands who have reached a stage at which it is still desirable that you should have a power of detention or power of control in their own interests?—Yes.

3755. While at the same time you are unable to say definitely that they are at the moment persons of unsound mind?—Yes, that is so. I have a case in point of a man who goes out practically every week-end, but he is a man of not very much self-confidence. He is a man who has had frequent breakdowns when he has been discharged on previous occasions, and I have had a long discussion with his people and himself, and told him that I thought the only way for him to remain well was to remain in the institution; but he could go frequently backwards and forwards to his home; he was not able to undertake any work of a serious nature, but he could do a good deal of work if he had his own time and his own opportunity. He would employ himself very well in the institution, but he could not go out and do work for a wage.

3756. One can quite understand that persons who have been under the shelter of institutions, when they are exposed again to the rough and tumble of life outside, may sometimes find the strain too much?—Yes; they can stand a good deal outside if they have the shelter of the institution to fall back upon. It just gives them the moral support that they require.

3757. We have among other things to consider the question of dealing with patients without certification at the initial stage. I wonder what the solution for your difficulty would be; whether it might be in the shape of a modification of the form of report which you have to give, or possibly in a limited measure of control at this convalescent stage?—I do not quite follow the exact meaning of that. You either have a certificate or you do not?

3758. Yes, but it may be that we may have some modified form of certificate or notification for relapse cases?—But the object of a certificate is to relieve you of the responsibility for detention.

3759. Yes; that will need to be safeguarded?—Yes.

3760. But just as suggestions have been made that at the incipient stage it might be desirable to avoid the stigma of certification by some expedient, which we shall have to consider, I was wondering whether your difficulty might be also met at the other end, where your patient has passed in your view out of the region of insanity, but it is still desirable to detain him?—You mean a continuing certificate?

3761. In a modified form—in short, to salve your conscience?—Yes.

3762. Because the difficulty you have presented to us is a serious one. We do not like the idea of a doctor having to certify a case as of unsound mind when he has real doubt as to the sincerity of that statement; although he is perfectly convinced, on the other hand, that it is desirable in the interest of the patient that there should be a further period of detention. You follow my difficulty?—Yes.

3763. One does not like forms which compel people to state things they do not entirely believe?—Quite.

3764. I was wondering whether a solution had occurred to you which would meet that difficulty?—I think it might be that the form we already have might be modified. For instance, what is the necessity of saying that the patient is "still of unsound mind." Why not say, "It is still desirable that the patient should remain under treatment"? We might say the patient desires to remain under treatment.

3765. That raises, of course, the larger question whether it is legally proper to have any persons detained against their will who are not of unsound mind?—Yes, but in nearly all these cases the patients consent; they wish to stay themselves. In cases of that sort perhaps something like that could be done.

3766. Earl Russell: The words in the Act are, "certifying that the patient is still of unsound mind, and a proper person to be detained under care and treatment." Would it meet your view if you certified that the patient was not fully recovered, and a proper person to be detained under care and treatment, or is that still too strong?—I think that is still too strong, because that is practically what it was before. If he has not recovered he must be insane, provided he was insane before.

3767. Chairman: As long as you have consent, I can see you get over the difficulty, but you may have cases of persons who are in a hurry to get back to ordinary life?—I would not like to say so, but perhaps the fact of their being in a hurry is an indication of their not being of sound mind.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3768. That may be, but you follow what I have in my mind? We may have to devise under the second branch of our remit some form of modified control over persons who are not certifiable, but whom it is desirable to detain temporarily, even against their wishes, in their own interests?—Yes.

3769. Similarly, it occurs to me that at the other end of the process it may be desirable to detain for a time persons who are in a stage of convalescence, but as to whom it is not possible to say definitely that they are still of unsound mind. You follow the idea?—Yes, I do.

3770. I suppose the patient is not infrequently the worst judge of what is best for himself?—Not when he is convalescent; but when he is of unsound mind, of course, he is—that constitutes the unsoundness of his mind.

3771. Then would you regard it as a valuable provision that you should be authorised to have voluntary patients?—I think so. I frequently have patients coming up and asking to be taken in, and I cannot take them in; they have to go away and get certified; and they may only be suffering from what they feel may eventually bowl them over, but which has not bowled them over at the time.

3772. They feel a premonition, I suppose?—Yes, they frequently do; they get run down, their work is worrying them, and that sort of thing. Perhaps they are suffering from loss of sleep. They come in that stage and want a rest.

3773. Do they come and ask for the shelter of your institution in such cases?—Yes.

3774. Without certification?—Yes.

3775. Then do you think it would be desirable that you should be authorised to accommodate such patients?—Certainly.

3776. They would have the benefit of the shelter and the treatment afforded by the institution, and they would also avoid certification, and might be restored within a short time to useful life?—Yes, I think so. Of course, that sort of thing is likely to take place much more frequently in the future, when things are done in a better way than they have been in the past. I think it is possible to arouse the public's confidence in the mental hospitals in the future; it is improving; we are getting the public to have a little more confidence. I think I mentioned in my précis that one of my patients said I was quite at liberty to say anything I liked about her.

3777. There is nothing like a practical instance?—As a matter of fact, I think her case is an extremely informative one for the Commission.

3778. Will you give it to us in some detail?—She wrote an article. By the way, I might mention that I started last year a magazine written entirely by the patients in the institution, not edited or censored or anything of that kind, so that they can express their opinions on things.

3779. Perhaps we might defer for a little the description of what goes on in the day-to-day life of your asylum. We wish to hear that, too. For the moment, however, what was chiefly occupying my mind and the minds of my colleagues was this: We are presented with the legal code; we understand that is the code which you have to work in your day-to-day practice. We are very much concerned to know whether that code is sufficiently clear, simple and workmanlike to enable you to discharge your duties to your own satisfaction. We have to look at the existing law on these subjects of certification, detention and care; and our primary concern, therefore, is this: Examining that law, is it a satisfactory code as it works to-day? You are the kind of person who, working it, would encounter the difficulties?—Yes, from a certain point of view I am working it; I am working it from the inside, not from the outside. I am in the position of receiving the patient with a receiving order as my authority for taking the patient in.

3780. Therefore certification does not interest you so much, because the patient is brought to you with, if I may so call it, the accompanying warrant, and then you proceed to deal with the detention and care. Therefore you can help us upon those two topics. As to detention, you have just told us one thing that is very useful, that you find some difficulty in continuation certificates, for the reasons that you have explained to us. Now we want to know whether, if I may put it colloquially, there are any other legal snags which you have encountered?—In the certificate and the receiving order there are sometimes inaccuracies, or perhaps deficiencies is a better word. Inaccuracies are usually corrected by me or by my office, but deficiencies are pointed out by the Commissioners. A copy of the certificate goes up; I hold the original as my authority. Now I have not got any option in regard to the body of the certificate, as to taking the patient in. I may think in my mind that there is not sufficient evidence displayed in the medical certificate for me to take the patient in.

3781. In short, if you had been the judicial authority before whom that had been put, you would have said, "I am not satisfied"?—I might have said that. I do know cases in which that is so. Now instead of my disposing of the matter at all, or having any authority in the matter, my authority is not the medical certificate, but the judicial authority's direction; he directs me.

3782. It is a mandatory direction to you?—Yes; and then I send a copy of the certificate up to the Commissioners of the Board of Control; they look through it, and if they are not satisfied with the contents of the medical certificate, they send it back to the medical man who wrote it out. In my case it is mostly one medical man, because they are nearly all rate-aided patients.

3783. Earl Russell: Direct, or through you?—They are sent through my clerk and steward, not through me as medical superintendent.

3784. Chairman: We have heard about the amendments that are made in these reception orders; but the patient is received by you under an injunction that you must receive the particular patient into your institution, and from that moment the further detention of that patient is a matter primarily for you, who have charge of the patient, and are able to study the condition of the patient; so that your responsibility with regard to detention is manifestly one of very great importance?—Yes, it is.

3785. And after the patients reach you under this mandate from the justice of the peace, when and how do you first come into contact with them yourself?—I see the patients practically very soon afterwards. They are first examined; they are actually received and examined by the medical officer and the matron or assistant matron, as the case may be. The physical examination is made, and as soon as one is able to take an opportunity the mental condition is gone into, but within seven days I have to write a report on that patient, as I find the patient, to the Board of Control.

3786. I should imagine that that is a very important stage?—It is.

3787. Because it is the first time the patient is in the hands of an expert—I mean an expert who is going to have charge of the patient?—Quite.

3788. And you naturally are concerned with the state of the patients placed under your charge?—Yes.

3789. Do you make a full examination of the case with the papers before you?—Yes.

3790. It would be interesting to know whether you have in your large experience encountered any cases in which, on your examination of the patient admitted to your institution, you were satisfied that it was not a proper case for detention. Have you encountered any such cases?—I have encountered cases in which I was unable to confirm the statements that were made on the certificate on which the patient was admitted; but it is rather a serious thing, and what might be said to be rather a delicate matter, to say that a patient probably has none of the symptoms that were assigned to him before he came in, because he may not be showing those now, whereas he may have shown them quite recently.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3791. They may be transitory symptoms, I suppose? Yes. I had a case admitted quite recently, the case of a man who had been a patient about a year or two ago. He gets sudden attacks in the street; at least, the previous one he had was a similar one to the present one. He runs amok and creates a disturbance and gets arrested. He is incoherent and quite off his head; he was not drunk. He remained like that for a few days, but he was sent up to me, and he recovered, and became quite normal in a few days. But the Committee, who are the authority for discharging patients, meet once a month. Having had an attack like that, although he got completely over it and was quite sane in the course of a week, he still remained on as a patient for a fortnight, perhaps, or three weeks afterwards, until the next meeting of the Committee.

3792. In that case it appears to me that the certificate of detention which you received was amply justified, because the symptoms which were stated in it had actually occurred?—Yes, that is quite so, but on the other hand, you see what I mean: when I came to examine him further the man was practically all right, and he did not show any symptoms. He might just as well have been looked after somewhere else. He need not have been certified in the first instance. The fact remains that he is unaccountable for his actions for a short time, and in consequence has to be certified.

3793. That class of case might well be met by expedients which have been suggested by other witnesses, that the permanent detention order should always be preceded by a provisional order of some sort, during which a patient might be under observation, and possibly under treatment; with the result that a cure might be effected, or the symptoms might pass away, and the patient never come under a permanent order of certification at all. That would meet the difficulty you have told us of just now. However, in such a case at the time of your examination the symptoms may have disappeared, but that does not mean that the symptoms were not present at the time of the examination by the certifying doctor?—No. If I have to say that the patient is in my opinion insane, I have not got to say it in that report. I only have to say it in the continuation report. If I did have to say it in the first report, I might find a considerable amount of difficulty.

3794. Just take that case. You really feel that in that instance the person whom you are detaining, and whom you are by law entitled to detain against his will, has really recovered?—As a matter of fact it is not against his will really.

3795. I mean in law it is?—In law it is.

3797. Is that simply due to the circumstance that by the machinery of your administration there is a delay in getting the discharging body into operation?—That is so, yes; but I do not know that it amounts to a hardship. If it did amount to a hardship, it would be easy for me to overcome that. In the ordinary convenient way I leave the discharges until the meeting of the visiting committee, but if there were any urgency in having a discharge I could easily get a couple of the members of the committee to come and examine the patient, and according to the present law the patient could be discharged on the spot.

3798. I can imagine the case of a person who had an onset of mental disturbance quite sufficient to justify certification, but which might pass off in a few days. Such a person might have important public duties, and he would say, "I really must get back to my work," and you would say, "I am bound to detain you here until I get a discharge." What would happen?—Provided I thought it was a sound thing to do, I could get a couple of the members of the committee to come up and see the patient.

3799. Then machinery does exist?—That is so, but I should like to point out that I do not think power ought to lie with two members of the committee.

3800. That is the question of discharge. We are studying just now with you the question of detention, and you have explained to us the stages in which you proceed. You examine the patient after seven days to verify the continuance of the symptoms. Then I suppose the patient is directed to be treated in an appropriate fashion, and relegated to the appropriate department, subjected to the proper treatment, and supervised by you from time to time?—Yes.

3801. Then you have to give these continuation reports?—Yes.

3802. Then you come to the question of discharge. Apparently you have some criticism to offer us upon the facilities for discharge?—Yes. As far as my experience goes I have not had any difficulty myself in regard to that matter. When any question of discharge comes up, if it requires to be done before the ordinary meeting, I have on occasions had two members of the committee to discharge. My ordinary routine practice is to wait until the visiting committee meets; the patients come before the visiting committee and they are seen. They are recommended in the first instance by me as suitable for discharge, either completely cured or recommended for trial leave for a month or less, and if they continue all right when they are outside (they usually do), a certificate by their own medical man is written to me to say that in his opinion the patient does not any longer require institutional treatment, and on that the discharge takes place, having passed the committee previously.

3803. I understood you to say that you were dissatisfied with the existing system of discharge by a couple of members of the visiting committee?—I said I thought it might possibly be open to abuse, if two members of the committee had the power in opposition to the medical superintendent.

Earl Russell: It has to be three.

3804. Chairman: It must be three if the medical superintendent is not a party to it?—Am I wrong?

3805. I think it is two with the medical superintendent, and three without?—Nothing like that has ever happened to me, but I have heard of it happening elsewhere, and I have heard it complained about.

3806. I take it your view is that the medical superintendent's opinion of the case should at least be the predominant element in the discharge?—Yes, I think so.

3807. One knows that suggestions have been made in various quarters that there should be some outside authority, to which any patient who objected to his detention should be entitled to go, for the purpose of obtaining what one may call an independent verdict on his case?—Do you mean the patient should go, or the independent authority should come?

3808. One way or the other there should be an independent investigation at the instance of a patient or a patient's relatives?—Yes.

3809. Have you in your experience found any indication that such a course would be desirable?—No, I have not, but I should think it would probably be most undesirable; for this reason, that the people who complain most about the asylum, and about everything in it, are usually the most insane people. I do not suggest that because they make complaints therefore they are insane, but so far as I know nearly all these complaints are from quite insane people. There is no question about it.

3810. No doubt the motive for the suggestion that I have put before you is the fear that persons may be detained improperly or illegally?—Yes.

3811. There is, as you know, a considerable element of suspicion about these things?—Yes. What I am suggesting is this, that if all the people have that right, there will be a constant flow of people being interviewed. That sort of thing would create a considerable amount of disturbance, I think. These delusional cases would be constantly wanting interviews with people. To the committee themselves and to everybody connected with them it is perfectly obvious that they are deluded and so forth, and I think it would be uncalled for. I am all for opening up the asylums as far as possible for the public to come in and see them. I always take anybody round who wants to see the asylum at any time. I never make any bones about it or put any obstacle in the way of any medical man coming and seeing his own patients at any reasonable time.

3812. Then do you think that sufficient safeguards are provided by the present arrangements for visitation and for access to patients by independent medical men?—I am only telling you what obtains in my own place. I think as a matter of fact there is a tendency rather to object to publicity in asylums. There has been a good deal of it in the past, and I think there is a good deal of it still existing; but not, so far as I am aware, on account of any objection to letting the public see what is going on. I think the principal objection is owing to the feeling that the whole thing is more or less confidential, and that the patients' friends do not like other people to see their relatives there, and they do not like it to get out that they have relatives there, and that sort of thing. That, I think, accounts for a lot of the shrouding or secrecy or hush-hush we have with regard to asylums.

3813. I can quite appreciate that. That is the kind of atmosphere that is liable to engender an element of suspicion?—As a matter of fact, I think it is the basis of a lot of the suspicion that exists.

3814. I can see this also, that from the point of view of treatment it would be very undesirable to have your patients exposed to constant visitations by all and sundry?—Yes, I think so. I rather fancy that there are a number of people who are inclined to be busybodies. I should think you would have a considerable number of people of that type probably wanting to poke about and inquire about things. The patients get regularly visited by members of the committee; monthly visitors go round. I suggest that visiting can be done and yet heaps of things may be passed over. All sorts of things can be passed over, because the public know very little about it, and a large number of the public have rather a horror of the whole thing. A great number of them are afraid, as a matter of fact, to go through the wards. It is not fear of being damaged, or anything of that sort, but they have a feeling of discomfort and are distressed with the whole situation. They do not understand it; it seems foreign to them, and they cannot grasp it. Of all diseases it is the least understood and the least known by the public.

3815. What one is anxious to do is to reconcile every proper desire for privacy, in the interests of the patients and the relatives themselves, with such opportunities for ventilation, if one may say so, of the institutions as will preclude the possibility of abuse?—Personally, I am inclined to believe in ventilation at the expense of privacy, rather than in privacy at the expense of ventilation.

3816. Because the privacy is calculated to engender a suspicion which might be found, if there were more publicity, to be unfounded?—That is my distinct view.

3817. Have you any suggestions as to how there might be more publicity or ventilation in asylum life, so as to dispel suspicions where they are unfounded?—I think part of it rests with the public; the public are afraid to come near these places as a rule; they do not take the same interest in them as they do in other hospitals. I find a great deal of difficulty in raising people's interest in the welfare of the patients. For instance, it gave me a lot of work and took me a lot of time to get a sufficient number of magazines collected for the patients. The public never thought that lunatics could read, or appreciate anything. People do not understand what lunatics are capable of; they are capable of a great deal more than the public realise. They do take an interest in things; they read the papers; they discuss things; they are discussing this Commission, talking about it and saying all sorts of things. They discuss the various cases that have been in the papers, and they discuss them fairly intelligently.

3818. That is a very interesting aspect of the question. One knows that in an ordinary hospital the public take much interest. I mean, ladies visit, and recreations are provided; there are Christmas trees, concerts, and all sorts of things are done to assist the welfare of the patients. Do you find that mental hospitals do not get the same attention?—They do not get the same attention. Of course, we have some attention, but it is not from the public generally. We have an anniversary, for instance, and as it happens in the summer time the patients go out into the grounds, and the town councillors and their wives and families come up and meet them, and talk to them, and to each other, and so forth; they have a sort of spread on that occasion; they mingle with the people, but they do not mingle with the general public.

3819. Is there not this difficulty, that owing to the very nature of the unfortunate malady from which they suffer many of them are persons who really could not be visited by the ordinary lady visitor of a hospital?—Yes, but not nearly so much as one would imagine. I think that is a very much exaggerated idea. I think the more they mingle the less their deficiencies will appear. It will wear off in the course of time. The mere fact of their being so much isolated makes them still worse.

3820. You think it would probably be a beneficial element in their treatment if they had a little more of that social attention that you speak of?—Yes, I think so. In fact, anything that will humanise them and produce normality is all part of the principle of treatment, I think.

3821. I can imagine, of course, that in certain cases of mental ailment, the mere fact of being exclusively in the society of people suffering from the same malady and seeing only the professional people who have to deal with that malady must in itself be a deterrent in the way of recovery?—Quite. The patient to whom I have referred points that out. She has written an article that she wants me to get published in the "Morning Post." She mentions that very point.

3822. What you are telling us just now is exceedingly interesting. May we take it that quite a large proportion of your institutional population might really benefit by visits from good-hearted people—ladies and gentlemen, who take an interest in the institution?—I have no doubt they would, except this, that I have noticed people, who are not accustomed to them, treat them in such a way that it rather has on the patient the same effect as one can imagine would be produced on a precocious child, if treated as though he were not precocious.

3823. That again just brings up the difficulty that I was alluding to: Where the ailment is a mental ailment, a member of the general public visiting with the best intentions might be very liable to disturb the minds of such persons?—That is so. Of course, it depends upon who visits.

3824. You would have to select your visitors rather carefully?—I can quite understand that some visitors would have an irritating effect upon the patient, whereas others would have just the opposite effect. I do not think, therefore, that anyone should be allowed to go round. That is one of the reasons why I said that I thought it should hardly be the right of any insane patient, or any persons who might think they were not insane, to call in anybody they might fancy. On the other hand, of course, if there is a question about having an experienced medical man, or anybody experienced in insanity, it should be a district commissioner, who might pay more frequent visits than are capable of being paid by the Board of Control.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3825. Yes. I think the public, or at least some portion of the public, seem to desire that there should be an outside check, so to speak, which would obviate the risk of improper detention of persons; but have you found in your own experience any difficulty with regard to your cases; I mean, have you found that you have any discomfort with regard to the continued detention of particular cases, or any doubt as to the propriety of their detention?—I cannot say that I have, but perhaps I ought to have. I mean to say, I do not feel very uncomfortable about having to say that I think this person is still of unsound mind and a proper person to be detained, although I know she is not, and I know she is going out in a couple of months. I am on perfectly friendly terms with that particular individual. I do not take the thing very seriously. It is merely a formality I have to go through; she is perfectly satisfied to be under my treatment; she thinks I am doing her a lot of good.

3826. And she wants to stay with you to complete the process?—Yes. The meaning of that form is that it prevents me keeping people that I ought not to keep; that is what it is intended for.

3827. Is there any motive for your detaining people in the asylum when they are fit to be out?—No; on the contrary, there is every motive for me to send them out before they are properly cured, because the more people I say are cured the better my percentage of recoveries is, and the more I am thought of as an expert in the cure of mental diseases, and all that is to the good.

3828. So far as I have learned, almost the only motive that has been suggested for detaining persons unduly in institutions such as yours is that they are found to be useful to the institution. So much work has to be done by the patients, and if a person proves to be exceptionally efficient and intelligent, there may be a motive from that source for the continued detention of that person. Have you any experience of that?—My experience of that particular point is this. We have so many patients to deal with, and we find that employment and occupation are so essential for their welfare, that it would be a great advantage to get rid of good workers, in order that their places may be taken by other people for whom we cannot find enough employment, owing to the fact that we have other people doing it.

3829. You really have more patients than work?—We have more patients than work, so that that matter in my place would never arise at all. I should be only too pleased to get rid of these people, so as to fill their places by other people for whom at the present time I cannot find proper occupation.

3830. You have spoken of the advantages of a little more association of your patients with outside persons as a curative element. Can you tell us what facilities you have generally for the treatment of cases in your hands?—Do you mean in regard to their going out?

3831. No; generally. There is another matter we have to explore. It is suggested that an asylum is more a place of detention than a place of treatment, and one wants to know to what extent the persons who are detained in the asylum receive treatment. Have you facilities for treating your patients?—Oh yes, we have facilities for treating them up to a certain point.

3832. I am thinking not for the moment of medical treatment; I am thinking of the treatment for their particular malady—mental treatment. What can you do, and what do you do for your patients?—First of all we have to classify them.

3833. Have you facilities for classification?—Yes, up to a certain point. I think the facilities for classification are not by any means adequate. The old building was put up in 1869, and I think the other was opened in 1901. Now that was considered to be modern at that time, presumably, but there was practically no attention given to the necessity for classification in the structure. It was simply a repetition of the same units all along—constant repetition of the same thing. I had to modify the way in which the patients are accommodated very considerably. For instance, at that time a ward unit consisted of one room and one dormitory, with a kitchen off the one room, and that was the whole unit; so that the patients were expected to live and eat constantly in the same room; they moved from the living room into the dormitory, and vice versa, and they were served with their food from the kitchen. Of course, there was lavatory accommodation, too. In my opinion that is not a proper unit for the vast majority of the patients. It should consist of another room, and that should be a recreation room or sitting-room. I have been able to modify part of the male side so as to include three parts to each unit, that is to say, a dining-room, a recreation room, and a bedroom. With regard to classification, we classify the patients not according to the mental diseases, but according to the amount of liberty that we can give them, the amount of confidence that we can have in them. Of course, on the two sides, male and female, the conditions are different, because the structure is different. On the male side half of my patients are at liberty to go about the place more or less as they like. The other half are not sufficiently trustworthy, or they are too feeble, or too demented, or they might lose their way; they are not sufficiently intelligent, and for one reason or another they are under confinement. A proportion of the patients on the female side are under the same conditions.

3834. Have you any classification from the very outset, because this has occurred to one as a defect: If you have a number of patients coming into an institution more or less simultaneously within a day or two, let us say, suffering from all kinds of mental disturbance, from a case of simple melancholia to a case of mania, nothing, to the lay mind at least, could be worse for these cases than that they should be—I do not use the word offensively—herded together in one place, even for a few days, before you have time to sort them out. Is not that a difficulty you have?—That is a difficulty; they are more or less herded together. They have to be, because of the structure of the place. Take my female side; I have an infirmary ward to which the sick and infirm are sent, and some of the new admissions are sent there if they happen to be suitable for that ward. It is a ward which consists of 50 beds, and it is more or less a square ward, where there is very little segregation. If they do not go in there they have got to go into the reception ward, which is a very pleasant ward as far as its appearance goes, but it contains about forty patients.

3835. Take a sensitive case?—That is exactly what the patient who has written the article says.

3836. Take the case of a woman rather highly strung, but temporarily unbalanced, who has been accustomed to decent conditions at home, a well-doing person, but for the time unhinged, brought into association with possibly depraved cases, you may say sexual perverts, or maniacs; I could imagine that such an association might well accentuate the symptoms?—It certainly would not tend to cure them, except by the force of example it might tend to pull them up, as a moral shock. I have a case in point of an hysterical girl, who did not seem to be getting on at all. I could not make anything of her. She was very naughty, really like a naughty child, and I remember I told her that if she did not try and pull herself together I should take her over to the other side of the house, amongst the chronics, and she got well in a very short time;

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

it shocked her so much that she really pulled herself together. Of course, on principle, I could not go as far as that. I quite agree with what you say; that is one of the difficulties we have to contend with.

3837. If you had even a rough system of classification at the outset, whereby cases on reception were relegated to separate reception wards or separate compartments, even, of your establishment, would not that get over the difficulty?—I think so. As a matter of fact, I am quite sure that when my committee are contemplating any extensions that will be the first thing they will have in mind. They will build reception wards pure and simple, and with separate arrangements, so as to classify the patients better on admission.

3838. Then you attach importance to classification at the outset?—Undoubtedly.

3840. Psychological influence?—Yes, it is psychological, no doubt, but at my place we do not go in for any definite psycho-analytic methods, although I did have a medical officer who was very keen on it, and I gave him every facility for carrying it out. I said, "So long as you get results, it is all right," but he did not get any results, so we gave it up. It appears that treatment of that kind is not usually successful with a patient at that particular stage. In the earlier stages it may be useful, but not in the stage at which we get them in mental hospitals. To bring them back to normal depends greatly upon the nature of the defect. We might have a person in an acute state of confusional insanity, restless and sleepless, like a person with an acute fever, probably with some actual fever, getting no sleep, refusing all food, throwing himself about, and all that sort of thing. A case like that would have to be put in a padded room in order to give the patient no opportunity, or as little opportunity as possible, of doing himself damage. They may have to have sedative treatment, or tube feeding; all sorts of things have to be done. A patient of that kind will very often get quite well in the course of two or three months.

3841. These are measures of protection of the patient against himself?—Yes. Then you get cases of melancholia. They are probably of very much longer standing. They take a longer time, but by personal contact with them, trying to occupy them, and trying to get them into a healthy bodily condition, you often improve their mental condition. A lot of these mental conditions arise through bodily ill-health, so that a large amount of the nursing is restoring a regular healthy life with proper food, sleep, and proper attention to the bodily functions.

3842. Do you find that a certain amount of discipline such as your institution affords is bracing to the patients?—Undoubtedly I think so, yes, provided it is discipline of a right type.

3843. I suppose you may have cases where the intelligence is not much more than that, as you put it, of a naughty child?—That is so.

3844. How can you deal with the naughtiness of that type? In the case of a child it is quite simple: you spank the child. But what do you do with the case of a patient who is grown up, but whose intellectual equipment is very much that of a naughty child, a patient who does mischievous things, and so on?—If I might just ask the question, Do we spank the child in these days?

3845. I hope we do. I am told on the best authority that if you spare the rod you spoil the child.—No doubt the best authority of antiquity, but what about modernism? As a matter of fact, we cannot spank these people, but we use the modern methods which we say we should use with children now, namely, moral suasion, so far as we can.

3846. Do you find yourself assisted by your staff in your efforts in that direction?—Yes, but the amount of assistance we get from the staff I think can be very largely developed in course of time now that more attention is being paid to the proper qualifications of the medical staff, and especially the nursing staff; because, after all, I attach almost as much, if not more, importance to a well-qualified and well-selected nursing staff as to a medical staff.

3847. The staff is in hourly and daily contact with the cases, whereas you can only be there at intervals?—That is so.

3848. Have you any observations to make to us on the question of staffing the asylums?—No, except that I think we are beginning to go on the right lines now. I think in the past we have been very behindhand in a great number of things connected with asylum work and administration. For instance, we have not in the past offered sufficient inducement to the right class of men and women to take up mental nursing.

3849. Inducement has two sides. Inducement may be pecuniary, or it may be the conditions of life—conditions of service. Which have you in mind—is it the conditions of service, or the remuneration, or both?—I think the conditions of service and, to some extent, the remuneration. But in regard to remuneration, I should like to say that I think it is not right in this respect. I think now that we are devoting a lot of time and attention to the training of the probationer nurse, the pay that she is now having is very much greater than she ought to get under the circumstances. I also think that, having selected and having trained and got useful people who are likely to stick to the work, we do not make the career sufficiently attractive for the people to stick to it. In other words, the senior people do not get enough pay, and the junior untrained person gets too much pay proportionately.

3850. You want for the probationer the stimulus of something to look forward to?—Yes, I think so. As to the conditions, of course they are in most of the mental hospitals that I have seen not such as are considered necessary for up-to-date general hospitals. It is all a matter of development and time. We are improving in that direction, and no doubt nursing homes such as they have in general hospitals will come into being in the course of time, but at present I think there is a lot to be done in that direction.

3851. Do you find that it is a career which attracts a good class of men or women?—As far as my own place is concerned, I have been there now about 13 years. When I went there first, there was no training of any kind except a little first aid; it was not encouraged, and educated people were not encouraged to be taken on the staff. It was the policy. That policy was adopted, and I do not think that was the only place where a policy of that nature held good. I understand that the reason for that policy was that uneducated people were more easily satisfied with the conditions as they then existed; they put up with them better; they were not so restless; they did not want so much done for them, and they stayed longer, whereas if you tried to get a better class they would not put up with the conditions. They say it is not good enough, they are restless, they move off, and you cannot get any steady staff.

3852. Perhaps they are less able to withstand the distressing influences of the place?—There may be something in that. Of course I take a different view myself. I take the view that we have to get better people into mental nursing and train them, and do the best we can to keep some of them. My view about mental nursing is that it is a very much higher kind of work, more difficult, and calls for greater qualities than general nursing.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3853. It must also call for special qualities of self-sacrifice I should think, and sympathy?—Yes; all the higher qualities are required in an extreme degree in mental nursing, whereas you get on tolerably well with a smaller degree in general nursing. General nursing is more or less mechanical. In mental nursing there is a good deal of heart and soul required to get at these people.

3854. Then if you are going to have a career which is to attract persons with these higher qualifications, it must be a career that is adequately remunerated and one which has prospects?—Especially prospects. I think the initial remuneration for a career is one which does not affect the better and more farseeing class of people.

3855. But prospects do?—I think so; it is the possibilities.

3856. Would you be in favour of a policy of interchange of staffs between the ordinary hospital and a mental hospital, or must you have a specialist staff?—I think you must have a specialist staff; but now that the Nurses Registration Act has come in, in which the first year is common to all nursing, they go through a common training for one year, and they pass a preliminary examination; the whole of the nurses do that now whatever their ultimate destination may be. I think it is a very good thing for a mental hospital to get some of the spirit of nursing which exists in some of the larger and better conducted general hospitals.

3857. The practice is improving in that respect then?—Yes, undoubtedly, but nothing very much has been done up to the present. I was down seeing Dr. Good in Oxford some time ago, and he has attempted to effect an exchange from time to time between some of the nurses at the Radcliffe Infirmary and some of his nurses from the Littlemore Mental Hospital, but it is only in its infancy. I think something could be done, and it would be an advantage.

3858. One wants to cultivate the idea as much as possible that mental disease is, after all, one of the ills that flesh is heir to, and assimilate the atmosphere that surrounds that malady to the atmosphere that surrounds other maladies, and no doubt in many cases there are physical symptoms which are the concomitant, if not the cause, of mental symptoms, and which would benefit from the treatment by a nurse who has had general experience in an ordinary hospital?—Yes, but it is quite likely that if you take one of our typical qualified mental nurses and put her into a general hospital, she would be very much more at home at her work there than if you took a typical qualified general nurse and put her into an asylum. I am quite sure the mental hospital nurse would be more useful in the other atmosphere than vice versa.

3859. In pursuance of your view, do you hold classes or give lectures for your nurses?—Yes, I lecture; both my assistant medical officers lecture; my matron lectures; my head male nurse lectures, and my sister tutor lectures. My matron, who has double qualifications, lectures. When I say that the matron has a double qualification I mean that she is a qualified general nurse and has got the Medico-Psychological Certificate and also the C.M.B. My sister tutor has similar qualifications.

3860. Do the nurses obtain any qualification?—They are going up for the State examination, but it is only just now that the State examination has come into existence. Before that they went up for the Medico-Psychological examination.

3861. Do they now have facilities for preparing themselves for the State examination?—Yes.

3862. I notice in your précis that you rather deprecate the present machinery under which a patient has to go before a magistrate before he reaches you?—Yes.

3863. Have you considered that, after all, we are dealing here with an order of a more or less judicial character which is going to restrain the liberty of the subject?—True.

3864. Do you not think the civil arm in the shape of the law must have some recognition at that stage?—It is really that the patient should be taken before the magistrate that I deprecate, not that the patient should see the magistrate. I frequently find that the fact of going before a magistrate seems to impress itself upon the patient's mind in the then state of his mind; and it seems to create a feeling in the patient that some evil or wrongdoing has been committed, and that he is in the hands of the law rather than in a hospital being treated for a disease. That is the only question in regard to that point of being taken before the magistrate. If it could be avoided I think it would be well—if the magistrate could come to the patient.

3865. We have been told that relieving officers take patients to a Poor Law institution in the first instance, and that there the magistrates come and deal with the cases after they have been put to bed?—Yes, I think that would meet the difficulty, but a great number of cases that have been up to me have been to what they call the municipal buildings, and that impresses them very strongly.

3866. Earl Russell: That is the same place as the police court?—Yes; they cannot get it out of their heads that they have done something or other. It has a bad influence, I think.

3867. Chairman: Then you really object to the patients in your hospital reaching you via a Poor Law institution?—I find as a matter of fact that a great number of them are doing so now, because the medical men are beginning to be rather chary about certifying. There has been a considerable amount of diffidence about certifying recently amongst medical men, and they send them to the workhouse for observation, and they are nearly all certified by the medical superintendent of the infirmary.

3868. Then you think there has been a tendency to increase the number of cases which pass through the pauper stage before certification?—I think so, yes. When you say "pauper stage," of course the mere fact of certification technically constitutes pauperisation.

3869. There is a strong feeling in many quarters that it is unfortunate there should be that element of pauperisation connected with this particular malady, which does not exist in the case of other maladies?—Yes, but how are those patients who have to go to the workhouse infirmary for other diseases, supposing they are not taken into a general hospital, to be dealt with? What are they?

3870. There is just this difficulty, that many well doing people can get treatment in our general hospitals because their ailment is such that it can be treated here. They get treatment, they recover, and they have never had any element of pauperisation about them at all; but, because of the particular nature of the mental malady and the necessity of the detention order, for some reason or other this element of pauperisation seems to come in?—I was bringing up another point, and that was supposing a patient is unable to be admitted to the general hospital for a physical disease, and the patient goes to the Poor Law infirmary—is he not a pauper?

3871. Yes, you are right, he is?—Is it not a parallel case?

3872. The only thing that occurs to me is this, that all the mental cases which reach your asylums, that is to say, all cases of mental malady other than private cases, are designated paupers, but all cases of physical ailments are not. Very, very large numbers of people suffer from physical ailments and are treated in general hospitals and do not suffer this stigma at all; of course those who go to the Poor Law infirmary do suffer that stigma, but still there is an alternative?—You mean there is an alternative for the poorest people, where it is a purely physical ailment?

18 November, 1924.]

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3873. Exactly, you see the point. Every poor person who suffers from a mental malady seems inevitably to become a pauper, but every poor person who suffers from a physical malady does not become a pauper, because he may go into one of the general hospitals?—Would the public be likely to support hospitals for mental disease?

3874. You ask a difficult question, but we shall have to consider the question of whether this inevitable pauperisation of mental cases is also a desirable feature?—That point is also mentioned by my patient who says she thinks not.

3875. Just tell us about this magazine, because it is evidently one of the amenities of your institution. Can you supply us with a copy?—Yes, I brought a copy up in case you might like to have it.

3876. Yes, I have it. This is the October, 1924, issue of the "Harvest Magazine"?—Yes. I have what I call a spring magazine, a summer magazine, a harvest magazine and a Christmas magazine; it is a quarterly publication.

3877. It is evidently a new literary venture?—Yes, this is the first year of its life.

3878. And is it written entirely by patients?—Entirely by patients, and not censored in any way.

3879. How is it paid for?—It is printed by the patients; the print is set up and they print it themselves. When I say themselves, it is done by one man under the supervision of our asylum printer. We sell it to various people for 6d. a copy, and I pay the contributors out of the money; the contributors get the money. The lady who has written this article has also written some verses in that magazine which are not at all bad, I may say.

3880. Are those the verses on "Buttercups"?—No.

3881. "Disturbing spirits"?—"Disturbing spirits" is the article she wrote, yes, but she has written an article on "Should married women work?" She is quite versatile.

3882. You have handed us, I think, another article by her separately?—That particular article is "Asylums or mental hospitals—which, or both?" I think she is in favour of having two sets of things: one an asylum for the care and treatment of old people, and the other for the treatment of acute cases, which I think is a sound proposition.

3883. She is a certified patient?—She is a certified patient well known to the members of the Board of Control, I think.

3884. Is it the case of a person as to the propriety of whose detention you have no doubt?—I have no doubt about the propriety of her detention, but I think hers is a case in which a great many people might have a doubt up to a certain point; they might be some time in coming to a conclusion that she was a suitable patient to be detained.

3885. Has she ever expressed any views as to the propriety of her detention?—She has constantly.

3886. Does she want to be out, putting it quite plainly?—Yes. She thinks she is being illegally detained and says that when she does get out she will bring an action. She is constantly making efforts to escape, but she has written that article at the same time and written these other things.

3887. One does not want of course to probe the identity of any person to whom you are referring?—She personally wanted to publish that article of hers in the newspapers, and she sent her name and all about it; she does not mind about that at all. At the same time it is not necessary to probe her identity.

3888. No, but what I wanted to know was this. This seems to be a class of case round which a good deal of controversy might arise in the public mind?—I thought it was a very interesting case for that reason.

3889. Have you any doubt of her insanity?—I have no doubt of her insanity.

3890. Would you rather not discuss it?—I think it is quite open to discussion; I have no objection to discussing her case. I told her it was quite possible it would be discussed. She is perfectly sensible in a great number of ways.

3891. What is the type of insanity?—She is what is known as a case of paranoia.

3892. What are the symptoms?—The symptoms are that the patient has ideas that there is a conspiracy against her.

3893. Is that a delusion of persecution?—A delusion of persecution of a certain type—a rather delicate type in a sense. It is not very easy to see what her ideas are, but she is lacking in judgment, and no amount of persuasion on anybody's part would explain that the various things she thinks of are without foundation, and that nobody has any motive for doing the things she thinks are being done. If anybody took the trouble of reading that article, they would be able to discover the elements of insanity in it, but a great deal of what she says is perfectly true; a great deal of the criticisms about asylums are perfectly true so far as they go, but the point is that it is not well-informed, and does not go the whole way. There is a lot of truth in it.

3894. Here is a case evidently of a person with a considerable degree of intelligence who desires to leave your institution. Has she been seen by your visiting committee?—Yes, she has been seen by individual members of the visiting committee on several occasions; she has been seen collectively by the visiting committee on several occasions. I have written reports about her to the Board of Control on several occasions; she has been seen by the Commissioners of the Board of Control.

3895. Has she ever had an opportunity of putting her case to outside people?—She has written to the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chancellor has written to the Board of Control, and I have sent up further reports; and, in order to give the Lord Chancellor an opportunity of seeing what the case is really like, I enclosed, with the patient's consent, about 100 or so letters she has written to various people.

3896. Has she ever asked for an examination by an independent doctor or by the Board of Control?—I do not know if she has asked for one, but if she did she could have one at once. All these things have been done, and I think everybody is satisfied that she is insane. So far as I know nobody has come to any other conclusion.

3897. Earl Russell: Except herself?—Except herself.

3898. Chairman: Does she protest that she is sane?—Yes; she gets annoyed with me when I tell her she is insane. I do tell her definitely that she is of unsound mind, and I tell her in what way she is.

3899. Can she grip the idea?—I am beginning to wonder if some sort of a marvellous thing is not going to happen about her. Every now and then I seem to think that there is a sort of gleam or glimmer of her getting an insight into her condition. It is elusive; it goes away, and she is bad as ever again. We do not look upon those cases as at all curable, and if she is by any chance cured, we should be rather pleased about it.

3900. It is quite obvious that you have studied this case very particularly?—I have.

3901. Do you give special attention to those cases where there may be some difficulty, or where the patient is protesting against detention?—Yes, certainly, of course. I mean there are some cases that have no sense at all. You do not want to be a doctor to know that they are insane. Any man in the street can see that certain cases are absolutely and completely off their heads. These others are the difficult cases. These are the cases that want to be studied and are studied.

3902. And may the manifestations be subtle?—Very subtle, and not easily discernible. Many people go round and say, "I do not know what is wrong with that person at all." On the other hand, they might see a person coming in who is very obviously insane, and they might say "That is a hopeless case," and I say "No."

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3903. It seems in those cases the public must depend to a large extent upon the medical men who have to deal with the cases?—I think so undoubtedly. I mean to say that a member of the public coming in to examine that case, without the assistance of the expert to point out and to lead him into the region of trouble, might never approach it at all, might never touch on it.

3904. Then we will circulate this article among ourselves if you will be good enough to leave it with us?—By all means.

3905. There is one other matter. Have you any views as to the desirability of removing chronic cases and hopeless cases from your mental hospital to Poor Law institutions?—Yes, I feel rather strongly on that subject. I think that if there is any stigma—and it is acknowledged that there is a stigma—attached to being a patient, remaining a patient under certificate, when other accommodation can be found it should be found for people who are perfectly harmless and do not require the administrative arrangements which have to exist in a mental hospital.

3906. I thought that one of the reasons in your mind was that you would in that way relieve the strain on your accommodation and concentrate the use of your curative appliances and methods upon cases which had more hope of recovery?—That is so.

3907. But the chronic cases for which nothing can be done except to provide shelter and such comforts as you can give, would do as well in a Poor Law institution?—Yes. I refer now to senile cases, cases that are simple-minded and only require to be treated like children. Some of them are bedridden, hopeless bedridden cases that ought to be treated in a general ward of a Poor Law institution; no mind of course, and can be certified as of unsound mind, because their mind is finished, but they do not require asylum treatment at all.

3908. Then have you any views upon the treatment of incipient insanity without certification?—I think it is very desirable that patents should be able to get treatment without necessarily being certified as insane.

3909. You know the difficulty of justifying what may be a necessary element of detention without the intervention of some kind of order?—Yes.

3910. Do you think, looking at it from the practical point of view in your own experience, that many cases might be saved from certification if they were dealt with in some provisional way?—Yes. With regard to certification I cannot quite follow some of the arguments in connection with it. To certify a patient is really to say that a patient requires treatment, and to say that the patient requires treatment for unsoundness of mind. Now really if you are going to treat an unsound mind you must have power over the individual who possesses that unsound mind. The mere fact of unsoundness of mind connotes authority to deal with the individual.

3911. Connotes irresponsibility, and therefore the necessity for control?—Yes. I mean to say you may be ill, and your mind may be affected, but when does it become unsound?—It becomes unsound when your conduct begins to get such that you are not amenable to ordinary society, and you become irresponsible in that way; but you may be suffering from mental disease which perhaps need not necessarily amount to unsoundness of mind.

3912. Yes, but to you, of course, the idea of certification may seem more or less innocuous; it is a matter you are dealing with regularly. There does seem on the part of the public to be a certain abhorrence of stamping any human being with what you may call the hall mark of insanity; it is a blot on the record of that person, which they do not suffer from if they have merely had pneumonia or any other ordinary disease, which, as an incident of their lives, passes away. But for some reason or other a person in whose case a certificate of unsoundness of mind has been given is regarded as a person against whom there is a definite mark for life?—Do you think that really has to do with the past or with the future? Is it traditional, or is it a fear of a return of the malady?

3913. It is very difficult to say whether it is a thing which may pass away with more enlightenment, but it seems to be very deeply ingrained in the public mind?—Yes, but I think it is more traditional than anything else. It seems to me that it is largely the outcome of former ideas of the nature of insanity.

3914. Yes, probably, but let me put an example to you. Supposing you have a witness giving evidence before a jury, a witness giving quite excellent testimony, and then the question is put in cross-examination "Were you certified as a lunatic six months ago," and the answer is "Yes, I was." Now I am looking at the jury, not at myself at all. To the mind of the jury that would inevitably convey a serious imputation upon the value of that evidence?—It would, but many things presented to the jury have the same effect; they are mentioned for the purpose of affecting the jury, and that would be one.

3915. But a certain solemnity would attach to that observation which might not attach to another. There are many comments made of course upon past records, but just as a previous conviction, so to speak, is a very awkward thing for a criminal, or indeed a conviction at all for a witness, so also certification of insanity suggests somehow or other to the public mind, not to the expert mind, not merely that the person has had a particular form of brain illness, but is also a person who is outside the ordinary pale of humanity. It is that element that one is so anxious to obviate?—Yes; but when we consider it was not so many years ago they were burning these people, when they were supposed to be possessed of devils, and they were driving the devils out of them with sticks and such things, it is hardly a great deal to be wondered at that it is looked upon as something quite outside the ordinary pale of humanity.

3916. Would it not rather assist in the development of this very idea that you have in your mind, the removal of this conception, if people could be treated in the first instance in homes or institutions which were not of the nature of asylums but partook rather of the character of hospitals, in which they might be detained (I appreciate the necessity of some control) for a period before they were finally stamped with the hall mark of certification and remitted to one of your institutions under that category?—After all, if you do that why certify them at all, because you can keep on renewing whatever this authority is you propose to give.

3917. You do not think there is much to be said for a differentiation in certification, so to speak?—You can call it something else. The whole thing amounts to giving a person authority to perform a technical assault upon a person for that person's own good. You can call that anything you like. You can certify the doctor if you like and say: "This man is a certified doctor for looking after patients of a certain class," it is simply protection given to whoever is dealing with a person who requires to have something done that he does not necessarily agree to have done to him; it is an interference with personal liberty. In an ordinary disease a patient is only too willing to undergo treatment, he gives his consent. In a great number of mental diseases too a patient will give his consent, but in some of the very worst cases the patient is not capable of giving his consent, or, if he is capable, he refuses to give it.

3918. Or may withdraw it just at the critical moment?—Yes, all those things may happen. Supposing a man falls down and cracks his skull and is unconscious, are you going to wait till he comes round before you get his consent to perform an operation on his skull to move some depressed bone, or something like that? There ought to be some way of getting over the difficulty of certifying that man as insane because he has met with an accident. After all, all these mental diseases have a physical basis. We do not know what some of them are; we do know what some of the others are.

3919. Have you studied the provisions of the Mental Treatment Bill introduced last Session?—Yes, I read it through.

3920. The cardinal proposal there is for the temporary treatment of mental disorder without certification?—Yes, it all comes back to the same thing in the long run. We should like to get hold of these people early, but the very acute recent cases may be raving mad people. You see this thing does not come on, like some other illnesses, gradually. The ones that come on gradually are the ones you do not have much hope for; but most of the acute mental illnesses are recoverable and they are only temporary, and they are the most difficult to deal with as a rule.

3921. But do not you think that the repulsion from the idea of the asylum may often deter people from taking their relatives for treatment, or the patient himself from going for treatment at the earliest stages when the case might be most hopeful?—I think that is so, but I think it is so to a less extent than it was, and it is probably likely to diminish as time goes on with the improvements of method, and the general reputation of mental hospitals. I think they will go on improving, and I do not see why they should not be ultimately as reputable as other institutions.

3923. Mr. Micklem: In the case of the lady you referred to who wrote these papers, if there was anyone outside who was prepared to look after her, would there be any objection to her leaving the hospital?—That question did arise. She has relatives, but they could not undertake to look after her on the one hand, and she herself would not undertake to allow them to have anything to do with her.

3924. Is she dangerous or unfit to be at large?—She is not dangerous in a sense, but I think she is unfit to be at large, for the reason that she spends all her time calling on public officials and presenting the same petition to them irrespective of any chances she has of deriving any benefit; and she is so much occupied in that particular way that she is unable to concentrate her mind on what she says she wants to do, which is to return to the teaching profession, but she could not go on with teaching while she has all these grievances in her mind. What she was brought to the institution for ultimately was in connection with smashing some windows of one of the officials. I do not suggest smashing windows is any reason for people being brought to a mental hospital, but it was in conjunction with other things. That brought things to a head in her case.

3925. In your view are many of the certifications of senile dementia entirely unnecessary?—Quite unnecessary, I think.

3926. And a large number of cases that are found in the asylums you think ought to be referred back to the infirmaries under the Poor Law administration?—I think so. No doubt some of them were at one time suitable for asylum treatment, but they have now reached such a stage that they do not require any longer the peculiar and special treatment of an asylum, and I think they ought to be decertified, if I may so call it.

3927. Miss Madeleine Symons: Dr. Dixon, could you give us any figures of the recovery rate of patients admitted to your asylum and percentage of readmissions?—The number of direct admissions previously under treatment here or elsewhere—that means readmissions either from having been discharged from this particular institution or having come from others—842 patients were in the institution at the end of last year, and there were 189 admissions. Of that number 39 were readmissions. The rate of recovery on the direct admissions is not so good this year as it has been in some previous years, but it was 37 per cent.; much bigger on the female side than on the male side—30·88 on the male side and 41·41 on the female side, the combined average being 37·12 percentage of recoveries on the admissions. The general percentage through the country is 31·1, so that it is a bit higher than the general rate. Another way of presenting the particular return I have got here—I have introduced it recently in my report—is the rate of recovery on total recoverable cases under treatment. That was 57·9 per cent. Then the rate of recovery on the total number of patients under treatment was 6 per cent.; that includes all the old residue.

3928. Could you tell us the number of staff you have for those patients?—I do not know that I have the exact numbers here, but there are about 70 female nurses and approximately 50 males; and the number of patients is, males 332, and 510 females.

3929. You have told us that you thought the salary paid to probationers was too high, and the later remuneration perhaps too low. Could you give us any information about what the salary is in the case of both male and female nurses?—I am afraid I cannot at the moment say exactly what it is, because it is very complicated owing to various deductions. What they do now is, they give a salary based on the recommendations of the Joint Conciliation Board, which was a board made up of members of the Mental Hospitals' Association and members of the National Asylum Workers' Union; they formed a conciliation board and arranged for a scale of wages and for general conditions of service. I think that the basis of the initial or minimum salary of the male probationer was what they started with, and that was the agricultural wage in the country. Now whatever the unit was the female got 20 per cent. less, but it was a living wage; it was reckoned to be a living wage; that is to say that the young probationer who knows nothing at all and has to come to be trained is being paid what is called a living wage.

3930. Do you find that under this present system your staff stay with you a long time, or do a good many of them leave in a fairly short time?—I find a good number of the female staff leave. The male staff do not leave so frequently. Some of the changes on the female staff are due to the fact that they are found to be unsuited to the work, because we are making a rather careful selection. A good number of female probationers are told after they have been there a few months that they are not likely to be taken on the permanent staff, and they go for that reason; but apart from that, a considerable number go for other reasons.

3931. A fairly high proportion of them go before they have finished their training?—Yes, they do not stay through the whole length of it, and also there is a wastage of trained nurses at the end who go into private practice, and a proportion of them get married. We make no restriction against the males getting married; they can get married and settle down, and a good many of them do.

3932. But you dismiss the women on marriage if they don't resign?—Or are unable to carry out their duties.

3933. They all live in?—Yes, they all live in, whereas the males do not.

3934. Earl Russell: I want to go back to your continuation order. It is under Section 7 of the Act of 1891 I see, and the words used there are the same as in the form prescribed by the Board of Control—that the patient is still of unsound mind and a proper person to be detained under care and treatment. You thought the modification I suggested would still leave it too strong?—I did think so, but it is certainly an improvement.

3935. May I suggest these words, which I think would meet the most tender conscience: "that the patient although convalescent is still a proper person to be detained under care and treatment"?—Yes, I think so.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

3936. And if the Board of Control thought that that was not strong enough, and required investigation, of course they would have power to investigate it?—Quite.

3937. Your paranoiac patient you were telling us about is not what you would call a borderland case in the sense that there is any doubt about the insanity?—Not so far as I have been able to discover up to the present. Everybody has ultimately been satisfied; everybody that this lady has written to has been convinced by her letters that she was insane.

3938. A difficult case to diagnose, but with the knowledge of her history and so forth there is no difficulty in coming to a conclusion?—I have been able to satisfy everybody so far. The Board of Control are satisfied; I think the Lord Chancellor is satisfied; I am satisfied and her own people are satisfied.

3939. Are you satisfied that any other competent alienist would come to the same conclusion?—That I could not say, of course.

3940. That is putting it too high?—Yes.

3941. This is the sort of case, is it not, which a visiting committee rashly appointed might discharge by three of their number under the impression that the patient was sane?—I can quite imagine a set of circumstances in which such a thing might occur.

3942. I notice in your précis you say that this does occur sometimes?—It has never occurred in my personal experience, but I have heard of its occurring.

3943. You say: "This latter power has been known to be abused where newly appointed members have rashly stepped in and discharged several patients who they thought ought not to be detained"?—Yes.

3944. I should be very glad if you could tell us any place where that has occurred?—As a matter of fact I think you will probably find that that will come up in some of your future sittings. I think it is to be mentioned by a member of the Committee of one of the Lancashire asylums. It was related by him at a meeting I attended.

3945. Do you appreciate that even as the Act now stands it means that three separate individuals who are public representatives must take upon themselves to disregard the medical advice before this can happen?—Yes.

3946. Do you think that limited to three it is still undesirable?—I think the committee as a whole should take the responsibility.

3947. Now about the inside of your asylum, how many bedridden patients have you got?—I should think about 30.

3948. And are you very particular about bedsores and things of that kind?—Yes.

3949. Are the patients examined with sufficient frequency?—Yes. I mean to say they are examined several times day and night. We do not have bedsores arising.

3950. And if they arise they are at once dealt with?—Yes.

3951. Are the wards provided with cupboards in which presents or private property of the patients can be kept?—Not to a sufficient extent; in my opinion there ought to be a lot more done in that direction. Of course, underlying the lack of accommodation for patients' private things is the old-fashioned idea—perhaps not altogether old-fashioned, but the feeling that there is what they call a fear of the patient secreting something that he ought not to have. I was talking to an assistant medical officer from an asylum, and he told me, "None of our men have any pockets in their clothing." That is at the bottom of a lot of the absence of accommodation for patients' private things; they are not allowed to have anything. I think, of course, that is quite wrong. I think in the vast majority of cases they should have private accommodation for their own little private things.

3952. I was thinking of a cupboard which was kept locked by the matron where the patients' private things were kept, such as cake or fruit?—I have food cupboards distributed about the wards which are ventilated and with a glass front, so that the patients can see what is there.

3953. Who keeps the key of that cupboard?—The sister keeps the key.

3954. And I suppose you have the notices put up about the people they can write letters to?—Yes.

3955. Do you have a separate place where they can post letters in a ward, or are the letters collected by a sister?—They are collected; I have not got separate places. That has been recommended, as a matter of fact, by the Board of Control, but I think it is only based on the supposition that there might be some letters detained. I should look upon it as rather an insult to feel that I had to do a thing like that. I would rather keep in close contact with the people and let them feel and see that no such thing would be tolerated as any interference with their correspondence.

3956. When your female patients are bathed are they bathed together or separately?—There are two arrangements for bathing. There is what is called the general bath. That takes place in a semicircular bathroom with sprays which do not come on to the patient's head, but on the shoulders on either side. There is a seat below the sprays that the patients can sit on, and there are nine compartments each separated from the other by sheets hung on rails about as high as the patient's head, and each of these compartments converges towards a centre point at which the supervising sister is who regulates the spray for the bath. The patients walk into a compartment covered by a sheet, and they hang the sheet over the opening, and they are generally under the supervision, as far as seeing over the top is concerned, of the sister, and there are nurses in each compartment who assist in the bathing of those people who require assistance. Many of them are quite competent to bath themselves.

3957. The particular point I want to put is this: does it involve a number of women seeing each other naked or not?—No, it does not.

3958. They are separated as you describe?—Yes.

3959. And in no case is the bathing done in a public way?—No. There are ordinary slipper baths in each of the wards as well.

3960. Are the slipper baths also screened?—No, they are not.

3961. Are they open to the whole ward?—No. There is a bath-room with a couple of baths in it.

3962. Not screened from each other?—They are not permanently screened, but there are screens there, of course.

3963. Is any complaint ever made about those by the female patients?—No. I need not tell you that I have had complaints made in previous years, before this arrangement came about. I may also mention that a similar arrangement does not exist on the male side, and there is no complaint there at all; the matter is dealt with in a different way.

3964. I want to put this suggestion to you about more ventilation. We have before us a suggestion from a meeting of justices of the peace that they might also appoint visitors to visit an asylum as well as the people who now visit it. You think that would be a good idea in your view, that justices of the peace should visit asylums?—I think in the case of the justices of the peace who are specially appointed undoubtedly it would be a most excellent thing for them to go round and get some experience of these institutions, and learn something about the patients that they have to give directions about.

3965. I know, but I rather meant from the point of view of ventilation and of the public coming in. It would be an additional set of visits if justices of the peace were to visit asylums, and these justices

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

suggested that they thought they ought to do so. Do you think it is desirable?—As far as the justices of the peace are concerned I do not think there is any objection to it.

3966. You know as regards taking the patient to the police court and treating him rather as a prisoner, we have had evidence in some cases that he or she is taken direct to the workhouse, put to bed there, and seen next morning or the day after by the justice?—That, of course, is another matter.

3967. So far as that is concerned, you would have no objection to the intervention of the justice?—No, because he would not approach the patient in that capacity. He need not reveal his capacity necessarily.

3968. Perhaps he need not. One more question again on a question of words. Do you think that perhaps this softer phrase would be better than "Certified lunatic"—"A mental case under compulsory treatment"?—What is this for?

3969. To avoid the stigma of calling a person a certified lunatic, you would call him "A mental case under compulsory treatment"?—You mean substituting that on the reception order?

3970. Yes, using those words as the official words?—I think the word "lunatic" is perhaps rather out of date in this sense, that it conveys a meaning that has been applied to that sort of condition in the past; it would be just as well to drop it and start afresh with a new nomenclature in regard to these proceedings, but whether that particular phrase is the one or not I would not like to commit myself at the moment.

3971. Mr. Snell: Dr. Dixon, you said that patients when they were convalescent got leave of absence for week-ends, and so on?—Yes.

3972. What is the effect upon the mind of a patient who, after leave of absence, has to return to a mental institution?—They are all right. They come back and tell you all about what is going on at home, how their people are, and how they have been enjoying themselves, and so on.

3973. It does not have an evil effect upon their condition?—No. I have to select the sort of patients who may do that, of course. Short leave of absence from the hospital has been granted during the year on 1,739 occasions to male patients and on 316 occasions to female patients.

3974. What is the curative effect or otherwise of visits from friends and relatives? If a visit, for instance, is from a wife and children, does it help, or is there a reaction of depression?—It entirely depends upon the case, first of all, upon the mental condition of the patient, and also upon the kind of person who is visiting. A person might be one who would do the patient more harm than good. The patient might be in such a condition as not to derive benefit from a visit.

3975. I think you said that patients might desire to remain in a mental institution voluntarily, and ought to be allowed to do so?—Yes.

3976. Do you think that the fear of the struggle for life outside could enter into any preference of this kind?—I do most undoubtedly.

3977. They are afraid to renew the outside struggle for life?—Yes, provided that the conditions in the mental hospital are tolerable, and not only tolerable, but very good and efficient. The better you make your mental hospital, the more likely are they to want to stop. I have a good number of people that I could not get rid of, if I wanted to.

3978. Supposing a patient forms the delusion that it was a more comfortable and serener life to be inside for ever than to face the struggle for life?—It would not be a form of delusion to want to stay for ever.

3979. Have you any definite separation of patients who are incurable from those who are temporary cases?—No, not entirely. In other words, I cannot say that I have got all the curable cases here, and all the incurable cases there (describing), but approximately most of the curable cases are in certain surroundings or conditions which are the best suited for their condition, as far as our accommodation goes which, of course, is not ideal. For instance, there is one thing I may mention, namely, the little isolated villa that we have. In the villa all the doors are open, and there is a nice walled-in garden all round, and they do a good deal of their own domestic work there. There are about 20 patients who live approximately a normal existence; they serve out food, and do all sorts of things. The patients do it with the assistance and direction of one nurse. I frequently send my patients who are on the way to recovery over there, in order that they shall get as near as possible to the ordinary domestic arrangements of home life, so as to get accustomed to it.

3980. Then is not the habitual association with incurable cases likely to have a bad effect upon the cases that may be regarded as temporary?—I am not prepared to say that that is the case, because I think if you admit that, you must admit that all people who are for a long time in contact with the insane must begin after a few years to show a certain amount of mental deficiency, and to discuss that would lead us into—well, I do not quite know where.

3981. But granted that your patient is in a highly nervous condition to begin with, and he is thrown into habitual contact with incurable cases, some of which are distressing, is not that likely to have a bad effect upon him?—I think undoubtedly, as the patient to whom I have referred says, it is a most undesirable thing that a patient who is perfectly sane, as she says she is, and perfectly conscious of everything, should be subjected to the noises and abnormal conduct of people round about her. I have to put her in a ward where there are 20 or 30 other patients, some of whom are not everything they should be; but, owing to the fact that I have not got all the accommodation I should like, and all the powers of classification I should like, these things happen. She says, of course rightly, that you cannot move your bricks and mortar about the place, and consequently that is why I cannot get everything I want. She is quite alive to that.

3983. What chance has a paranoiac patient, such as the one that has been mentioned, of getting any judgment on her confirmed by the opinion of another alienist—another mental specialist?—Do you mean outside the institution?

3984. Yes. Suppose the case were in dispute; she protested that she was sane, and she wanted another opinion, a consultant. Is there any provision for that?—Do you mean financial provision?

3985. No, I mean any provision for her being allowed the privilege of seeing a consultant?—There is nothing to prevent her doing anything which she can get her relatives to do. What she has done already is to write to the Board of Control, who are the specialists; they have alienists there. On the next visit of the Board of Control they make a special point of interviewing this lady, which they have already done—members of the Board of Control.

3986. And they are mental specialists?—Not all of them.

3987. Some of them?—I should think they are mental specialists; they are not necessarily all doctors, but I think it is quite possible that people constantly dealing with mental cases become mental specialists in time, without necessarily holding a medical degree.

3988. Mrs. Mathew: I wanted to ask if you thought the seven day report to the Board of Control left you a long enough time to make a really good report?—I think, of course, the more time up to a certain limit the better, but on the whole I think one should be able to arrive at some conclusion in that time.

3989. Have you a dental surgery or dental treatment for your patients?—Yes, we have a dental visiting surgeon who visits regularly, and we have up-to-date equipment for him.

3990. And the patients have access to the grounds on all days, every day, do they?—Which grounds do you mean?

3991. You mentioned a party that they had, when they went out into the grounds. I was wondering whether that is usual or unusual?—It is not unusual for them to go out for walks, but these are special occasions where they have a lot of visitors up in the grounds.

3992. Have you arrived at the cost per head of your patients?—Do you mean for this last year?

3993. Yes, what is the figure?—The figure is 21s. per week.

3994. Does that include everything?—Yes.

3995. Overhead charges?—21s. 4½d. to be exact.

3996. Earl Russell: That does not include overhead charges surely?—No, this is maintenance pure and simple.

3997. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Dr. Dixon, you say that the machinery of the Act as it stands now is unnecessarily cumbrous and complicated, and you support that view mainly by a criticism of the form of the continuation reports. Is not that so?—As a matter of fact I really think I made a general statement, and I do not think I supported it very much because there is nothing really cumbersome about the particular thing I brought forward.

3998. I was going to ask you what were the grounds. You say it would be fairly easy to safeguard the liberty of the subject. What are the reforms that you suggest?—I do not think that I am quite in a position to go into the question of the reform of the law and the certificates and all that sort of thing. I have not laid myself out for that.

3999. You say it should not be very difficult?—Well it probably is very difficult really.

4000. That is disappointing. Now with regard to the continuation order, you instanced the case of a patient who is convalescent whom you do not feel you can certify as being of unsound mind and who wishes to remain. Can you retain her without signing up the continuation form which says she is unsound?—No.

4001. So that your suggestion would be that the continuation order should be modified so as to allow voluntary detention?—Yes.

4002. Now take another case: you have a patient who is convalescent whom you do not consider to be unsound, and who does not wish to stay. Would it be wise to certify that patient against his will and keep him in?—There are degrees of convalescence—stages of convalescence. Sometimes it is not an advisable thing for a person to leave at one stage of convalescence rather than at another; but I do not know whether, if they can be said to be convalescent, any special rules or regulations are required to cover the few cases which might arise of people who, notwithstanding they were convalescent and not advised to go, still wished to go.

4003. Would not the mere fact of their being retained when they wished to go assert a malignant influence over them?—It is difficult to say.

4004. Now you say that the authority who gives the direction for the detention of the patient should be specially qualified. You mean you would specialise him rather—that he should be always dealing with these cases?—I think that would probably be a very good thing.

4005. So that you would get one justice to devote himself to examining these patients—is that so?—I think so; something of that nature.

4006. Would you treat the doctor who certifies to the justice in the same way: Would you as far as possible get hold of the same man, a man who has had special experience, or would you take a man of general wide knowledge but with no special devotion to that particular question?—If it should be found desirable—and I think it probably may be that the Commission will find it desirable—that the rate-aided patient shall have the benefit of two medical certificates, the same as a private patient, rather than one, I think it is desirable that one of the medical certificates should, if possible, be made out by the patient's own medical man, and that the other one should, if possible, be made out by somebody specially qualified or specially appointed for the purpose.

4007. Now you spoke about the improvement in prospects for the medical profession engaged in the asylum service, and you suggested that the medical superintendent should retire at some age—we will say 60 or 65?—Yes.

4008. Do you think there is any choice between the age or between the duration of the period for which a man is to hold the office of superintendent?—Of course, I think probably the duration would meet the case better than the age.

4009. What period would you suggest?—I think 30 years' service.

4010. What is the average age at which a man becomes a medical superintendent—45, I suppose?—Before that, I think, now.

4011. So that you would say 30 years service or at the age of 60, whichever comes first?—Yes, I should think so.

4012. You referred to the important subject of the out-patient treatment of incipient lunatics, and you suggested that perhaps the best plan would be that the out-patient department should be part of the mental hospital?—I do ultimately. Mind you, I do not think that idea is generally held, for the simple reason that it is assumed that the mental hospital will always have attached to it the reputation that it has at present. I would not like to assume that.

4013. It struck me that your argument for attaching the out-patient department for the incipiently unsound was mainly to remove what stigma there may be attaching at present to mental hospitals?—It helps to remove it certainly.

4014. It cuts both ways, does it not? If a patient attends a mental hospital he is likely to be stigmatised?—If the idea is that once there always there, and that the patient is evidently going to become a permanent inmate, yes, but that is what we are trying to avoid.

4015. If a person has some doubt about the state of his mind, would not he be more likely to go to a general hospital? A mental hospital is generally some way away from the town?—Where they are conveniently situated, I think it ought not to be forgotten that in order to raise the reputation of the hospital you should not detach the staff.

4016. Would it not be better for the medical officer to go to the general hospital and see the patient there?—It has its advantages, certainly; that is what they do at Oxford.

4017. Sir David Drummond: Dr. Dixon, I judged from what you said that you did not attach so much importance to the idea of the stigma of certification as some of the public do?—After all, the mere fact of the stigma only arises from what the public think. That constitutes it, does it not?

4018. I thought you said that the stigma did not exist?—What I really think is that the stigma is likely to diminish. I do not think it is very likely to be abolished altogether. As the public get more educated in these matters, when they find a great number of people who have had mental attacks have recovered completely from them, and do not have any relapses, then I think in course of time it will be greatly diminished.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. FRANCIS DIXON, M.A., M.D.

4019. Is not the stigma rather that the patient is insane, not that he was certified insane? In the same way as you speak of a patient who is consumptive, the stigma is that the patient is consumptive?—Yes.

4020. So I take it that there is not really the degree of stigma attached to the certificate so much as to the fact that the patient is insane?—Yes, because insanity conveys a feeling of uncertainty as to relapses.

4021. Do you really mean that nine-tenths of the patients admitted into mental hospitals are incurable?—I do not say that nine-tenths of them are incurable on admission, but of the patients in mental hospitals nine-tenths are incurable.

4022. You gave 189 admitted for one year and 57 of those people recovered. That is a very much larger proportion?—Yes, but these are the residue. I have a table here which I have been using for the last two or three years of the admissions and the kind of admissions so far as one can judge. We had 189 admissions last year, and of those admissions there were 71 considered to be recoverable; only 71 out of 189 were considered to have a chance of recovery. I meant nine-tenths of the people in the institution at any given time.

4023. Now the Chairman asked you if you had ever had a case in which you read the certificate of two doctors, or one doctor, and took an opposite view?—I would not like to say an opposite view, but I have on occasions not been able to confirm the view that was expressed.

4024. Can you conceive of a medical superintendent actually taking up that attitude, that he does not confirm, and he discharges the patient there and then?—That has been done.

4025. Can you conceive of it being done frequently at all?—No, it is quite an exceptional thing.

4026. What accommodation is there for private patients in your district?—By "district" you mean the district served by the mental hospital—that is the city of Leicester?

4027. Yes?—I do not know that there is any registered or licensed accommodation.

4028. Do you think throughout the country there is sufficient accommodation for private cases—people who can afford to pay?—I understand that there has not been any addition to permission to have private patients issued for a long time, but the question as to what amount of accommodation is required I could not answer.

4029. What do you think has been the practitioner's difficulty in certifying? You told us that the practitioners of late are rather inclined not to certify?—Their difficulty, as far as I can judge from expressions used, is that they feel they are undertaking a very considerable amount of legal responsibility; they think they are going to be in the Law Courts, and that sort of thing, if the patients get better; in fact, they are not sure what constitutes insanity sufficient to warrant their certifying.

4030. What, in your opinion, constitutes a certifiable case?—That is an extremely difficult question. You flatter me very much by asking me it.

4031. You would not propose to give an answer?—I would not propose to give a general answer to that question.

4032. Therefore you recognise that it is a matter of opinion very largely?—Undoubtedly a matter of opinion to a certain extent. I think there are cases in which there can be no question at all; it is perfectly obvious; but there are a great number of cases in which there is a very considerable amount of difference of opinion.

4033. Sir Ernest Hiley: I have only one point to put to you, Dr. Dixon. You let out a large number of patients, both men and women, on what you call trial during the year; you let them go home?—There is a technical term which means discharging a patient on trial, that means to say that the patient is recommended for leave on trial to the Committee, and the Committee give them that trial leave; but I personally have authority to give the patient 48 hours' leave without reference to the Committee, and I frequently do it.

4034. When the Committee allow them to go out on trial, do you give the patients any advice or prescribe any rule of conduct for them, so that they may benefit by their period of trial?—When they go out on trial the assumption is that they are practically recovered.

4035. You class them as recovered?—When we receive a certificate which they take with them, or rather their friends have it, and that certificate is signed by their medical man who observes the case when it is at home, and he says, "I think this patient is now recovered, and no longer requires institutional treatment," that is sufficient for me to consider the patient recovered.

4036. They are under observation?—They are under observation, but, so far as I know, it is not a systematic observation. I do not know that their own medical man keeps them under any special observation owing to the fact that they have been discharged on trial. I am not aware of that; I do not know that any arrangements exist for that purpose.

4037. Have you any arrangements for after care, or anything of that sort?—We tried to get a branch of the After-Care Association started in Leicester, but we have not been able to raise sufficient enthusiasm amongst the people to get one going. I do, however, make use of the Mental After-Care Association, and I am in correspondence from time to time with them in regard to certain cases that are willing to be helped by them, and in certain instances I have sent cases to them, and they have done very well.

4038. Was I right in thinking that the percentage of these cases that come back to the asylum is 39?—Not the percentage; that is the total number.

4039. Thirty-nine out of 189?—39 out of 189, yes.

4040. In answering another question you gave the same figures as percentages. That is why I asked you. You gave the percentage of recoveries as 37?—That is right.

4041. Out of 842 patients?—Yes, but you must remember that this percentage is a percentage on the direct admissions.

4042. Previously under treatment there were 39. Out of 189 or out of 842?—Out of 189.

4043. Chairman: Have you ever had a case under Section 49 of the Act, where two medical practitioners have been appointed by the Board of Control to come and see a patient under your care?—No.

4044. Are you aware that there is that safeguard, that either the patient or any of his relatives may make an application to have two outside medical men brought in?—I am aware of it, but I have no experience of it.

4045. I understand in your institution the patients are allowed to sit up at night?—Yes.

4046. To what hour?—Half the male patients sit up as long as they like. They go practically whenever they like, within a limit of half-past nine.

4047. Practically, you allow a considerable amount of freedom as regards bedtime?—Yes.

4048. That is not universal, is it?—No, I do not think so.

4049. Do you think it desirable to give freedom in that respect? Is it compatible with the proper discipline of your asylum?—Yes, I find it is, but there might be conditions in which you could not do that sort of thing. As far as my place is concerned, I do not find any ill-effects from a disciplinary point of view. A great number of the patients elect to go to bed much earlier than that. I find, when I am going round the dormitories after tea, about 6 o'clock at any time of the year, a certain proportion of the patients walk off to bed.

4050. The importance of your system is that it gives an idea of freedom to your patients?—Yes, that is the idea of the system.

Chairman: We are very much obliged to you, Dr. Dixon.

(The Witness withdrew.)

After an Adjournment:

Dr. O. G. CONNELL, M.C., L.R.C.P., called and examined.

4051. Chairman: Are you Medical Superintendent of the Norfolk County Mental Hospital, Thorpe, Norwich?—Yes.

4052. I do not propose to take you over many of the topics which have been discussed by your predecessor in the witness chair to-day, but we should like to have from you some evidence on several points. Have you paid particular attention to the question of the safeguards against undue detention of persons in asylums?—Yes, I have. The present reception order, in my way of thinking, is sound; but I think that the same procedure might be adopted with pauper patients as with private patients, with the two doctors' certificates and a justice's order, and the petition, either of a relative, or, in the absence of a relative, of a responsible officer.

4053. Of course one recognises that would considerably add to the expense if you have two medical certificates for every case?—That is so.

4054. I should imagine there are many cases which are so clear that a second certificate might be redundant?—Yes, I quite agree that is so.

4055. And we have, of course, to think of the question of money in any recommendations we may suggest. Do you think the expense of a second certificate is of sufficient importance as a safeguard to justify the expense in pauper cases?—No, I think not. The point that crosses my mind is this. Occasionally one gets a patient who is not a lunatic, but has been certified as such; that patient is detained, say, for a week, and at the end of the week we send our report to the Board of Control, there is a week's detention, and the patient at the end is discharged. But that is rare.

4056. Might not that occur with any number of certificates, because the patient might have exhibited the symptoms of insanity, but at the time he reached you, you could not say he was insane?—Yes, but take, for instance, the case of a mistake on the part of the doctor or the justice—both making a mistake. I had a case of a woman who was sent to me as insane; she behaved insanely, as far as I can gather, at home; she smashed windows and screamed, and that sort of thing. But it appeared this young lady had a young man whom she introduced to the family, and her sister married him. She was fearfully upset about it, and she behaved in an insane manner, and the doctor was called in, and said she was obviously a lunatic, and the magistrate said so too; but when she came in she said "I am no lunatic at all."

4057. It was merely a manifestation of temper?—Merely a manifestation of temper, but I had to detain her under the order. But at the end of a week I could not see any sign of insanity, and she was discharged.

4058. Might not two doctors have considered she was insane in the first instance?—I think it is a point to be considered.

4059. I suggest that in cases of difficulty, cases which are on the border-line, it might be very proper to call in a second opinion, but I suppose in the great majority of cases which reach you there is very little doubt they are, for the time being, at any rate, of unsound mind?—Yes. My experience of this case was that it was one which I did not find to be insane, but she might have behaved in an insane manner when outside.

4060. Will you tell us your experience with regard to the Visiting Committee of your hospital?—There are 16 members of the Committee who visit. They meet once a month; they go into all applications for discharge, and in the case of any relative making an application for discharge of a patient they go carefully into it, and see the patient and the relative. Most of our cases are sent home on trial; those are also seen. During the month there are visitors appointed. Every alternate month there are two visitors, and the other month one. They go round the whole building, converse with any patients they wish to converse with, and in any case of doubt there are always the records to look up, and I can talk with them on their particular delusion; and the visitors are quite satisfied that there are no people detained who should not be detained.

4061. Through those visits do you think every inmate of your institution gets an opportunity of putting his case, if he has one, to an outside person?—Yes, ample opportunity. Most of those people have friends who come to see the patient, and if they have any doubt they can see the committee. In the case of all relatives or friends who write to me asking for release of a patient, I tell them when the committee meets, and the time, and that they must make application; and they see the committee. I do not frighten them off myself; they see the committee, and the committee deal with it.

4062. That seems to be a satisfactory way of dealing with it?—Yes, and then there are various guardians who visit the asylum from time to time.

4063. But they are interested only in their own cases?—They are interested only in their own cases.

4064. Do they see them?—Yes, they see them, and talk to them, and hear any complaints they may have to make.

4065. One was thinking that it would be very desirable that inmates of such an institution as yours should feel that they are not shut off from all access to the outer world. Do you think the visits of the Visiting Committee and the guardians enable them to think they have contact with the outer world?—Yes, and if they write letters, they have post boxes in each ward which are cleared by the assistant matron, and if there is nothing in the letters which renders it inadvisable to send them, out they go. Some of them are obscene, and some are rambling—those are kept back.

4066. But any letters which have the appearance of seriousness go?—Yes. I very often get letters from relations asking me not to send letters to So-and-so, or to "collect all the letters this patient writes, and send them on to me," and I often do that; that is an easy way of getting rid of them. A patient very often asks me, "Has that letter gone to So-and-so?" and I can say it has gone. The patients are so insane that they add to their own delusions; they keep on adding to them, and one must act very carefully and tactfully, in the interests of patients and relatives.

4067. Do you mean that a patient may continually address letters to some prominent public man, or something of the kind?—Yes, something of the kind. Any letter, of course, sent to a Minister of State goes unopened—uncensored.

4068. To the person designated?—Yes.

Dr. O. G. CONNELL, M.C., L.R.C.P.

4069. In addition to the visits of your Visiting Committee and the guardians, do you also have visits from the Commissioners of the Board of Control?—Yes, they come round regularly—when I say regularly, they come once a year.

4070. What do they do when they come?—They go round the whole building; they see every patient. I go into the ward with them, but I do not follow them too near, so that any patient may have the opportunity of discussing any matter quietly with the Commissioners, and, though I may be in the ward, the Commissioners wander about talking to the patients. If the Commissioners think a particular patient has a grievance which ought to be seen into, they make a note of it in a little book they carry about with them, and the records of the patients are looked up, and they are satisfied that everything is being done that is right and proper.

4071. Do you regard the periodical visits of the Commissioners as an additional and important safeguard?—Yes, I think it is a great safeguard, because, as you are probably aware, these Commissioners have themselves been medical officers, and know the inside of an institution from top to bottom; and the legal side of the Board have had so much to do and have come so often in contact with the patients that they have a very good knowledge of mental disease. They inquire very very carefully into things.

4072. Do you receive sometimes complaints of ill-treatment from your patients?—Yes, mainly from patients who are undoubtedly insane, and who make charges. I have had charges brought against me by a relative outside. A patient died in the hospital from pneumonia, and the charge against me was one of murder. I informed the coroner, and asked for an inquiry and also for a post-mortem, so that we had nothing to do with the inquiry into the cause of death.

4073. Was that where the patient had some delusion that you had ill-treated him?—He was always making complaints. He was at one time in prison, and he told me once that the warders had beaten him, and he showed me marks of blood in his mouth, and said that was how they had battered him about, but I found out afterwards that he had broken a pane of glass and cut his mouth. That is the ordinary kind of thing. These patients are examined very very carefully for any marks or bruises. Every week when bathed they are examined by the assistant matron or matron, or head attendant, as the case may be, and these things are all reported, and the whole thing is thoroughly looked into. There is no possible chance of ill-treatment occurring in a mental hospital. It is all a bogey; as far as I can see there is nothing in it. I mean, there are two kinds of people who make complaints, one is the patient who imagines he is not insane, and the second class is the person who has a grievance against the institution.

4074. Have you investigated in your own institution a large number of cases of allegations of ill-treatment?—Generally, yes, but you will always find that it is quite a usual thing. You will not go on a round without receiving some complaint of ill-treatment, but on investigation you find no foundation for it, as a rule.

4075. You in fact find many allegations, but on investigation they turn out to be ill-founded?—Yes. A patient may have a delusion, but to all appearance otherwise that patient is sane. They talk and converse, but on that one point they are very insane. I go round and talk to these people, and ask how they are getting on, and if they get sufficient to eat, but if there is anything wrong, or if there is a little row, I ask about it. They are the first people to complain if anything serious goes wrong.

4076. Of course, cases do occur, and we know of cases where attendants have been dismissed?—Yes, and if you look at the Board of Control's last report, you see cases recorded.

4077. The thing one is most apprehensive of is that unhappy patients might be ill-treated by subordinates, and have no means of bringing their grievance to a proper quarter for remedy?—Yes. But there is no systematic brutality practised. I have seen patients spit in an attendant's face, and say: "Now, strike me, and I will get you the sack." Well, if the attendant gets annoyed, and gives a slap, that attendant is had up. They have to put up with a good deal, and they have not a happy position. If you get a powerful strong man in a struggle it will probably take about four men to hold him, because when a man is in a maniacal fury he develops four times ordinary strength, and throws people about like a dog shaking a rat; and in the struggle they all come down, and it is likely that the patient gets marked; but these things are reported immediately, and the medical officer sees at once the result, and when the Commissioners visit they see the record and sign it.

4078. Then you do not think there is any risk of ill-treatment passing undetected?—No. As I said before, one might find some junior attendant who will strike a patient; but he would be sent away.

4079. You do not find a patient so cowed and terrified that he might be afraid to tell the medical superintendent or head nurse what was happening?—No, I cannot imagine such a thing occurring, and I should be surprised if it was true. It certainly could not occur in my place; I am positive of that.

4080. I do not think you told us the size of your hospital?—I have 1,033 patients.

4081. Have you any private patients among them?—No. I try to treat all my pauper patients as private patients. Where patients wish to wear private clothing I let them; if they have little bits of jewellery, and want to wear them, I let them. Those patients who have no clothing, have to be dressed in county clothing, but in the case of those who have their own boots and shoes, and that sort of thing, I let them wear them. The place is really a home; the patients can dress in their own clothing. Many of them are on parole, and they go into Norwich and make a little money.

4082. Do you endeavour to give them as much freedom as you can?—Yes. They realise they are in a mental hospital, and many of them, of course, have an appreciable amount of sense, but they are what one may call mild mental cases, cases which might do quite well outside if there were somewhere to send them to, but relatives will not have them in very many cases, and the Unions where they have no mental wards will not accept them, and if one sends them out to the Unions they say, "Why do you send this case? It is a mental case. We have no accommodation." Here is a letter which I received the other day: "As my son has informed me that he is likely to be sent home, I would like to inform you that I cannot possibly be responsible for him, owing to my age and failing health. Also my son's panel doctor has stated that he will not be responsible for him. Under the circumstances, I think something ought to be done by the Ministry of Pensions." This happens to be a service case, and the Ministry of Pensions will take the matter up. This is a case of an epileptic, who developed mania on top of epilepsy. His mania left him, but he has not got rid of his epilepsy, and it is quite likely that if he has any means he might remain out.

4083. Would you discharge him as recovered?—No, because there is still a degree of mental derangement.

4084. But you would discharge him if someone would take him?—Yes. But here is a letter showing that this poor woman could not take him. I have another case which is rather a long story; it is a case of a gentleman who was able to go out, but they would not take him, and I had to get the relieving officer to remove him to the workhouse. The relatives were annoyed that he should go into the workhouse, and the relieving officer handed the case over to the relatives, and they are carrying on the best way they can at home.

Dr. O. G. CONNELL, M.C., L.R.C.P.

4085. Is it one of your difficulties in sending people away that they may have to go back to surroundings which are unhappy or unsuitable?—That is so—unsuitable surroundings.

4086. Although, of course, you cannot detain patients after they are recovered?—No; that is the trouble. It may be that there is a case mildly insane, and which would do quite well if they had somewhere to go.

4087. That would be a class of case which might be sent to the care of friends?—Yes; if there was a place one could send them to, one could do so.

4088. But that would still be a certified case, I take it?—Not if discharged to the care of a relative. There are many cases of insanity which are not under certification. I should say there are just as many insane outside asylums as in them, but they are harmless sort of people, and do not give any trouble.

4089. Sometimes we hear there are more outside than inside?—I believe there are, but they do not do any harm.

4090. Will you tell us about the care of the patients in your hospital?—Have you a rigid time at which they always go to bed?—No. My experience has been much the same as that of Dr. Dixon. The dormitories are open, so that they can go to bed when they like; others sit up and play cards. There is no hard and rigid rule, except that those on parole must be in at dark. In summer time they stay out as long as they like. I think every care is extended to the patients, and the conditions in the hospital in a large percentage of cases are better than they were accustomed to at home. There are a few to whom that does not apply, but those few are people who have seen better days, and have come down. It is hard for them to be classed as paupers, and I think the term "pauper" should be altogether removed from the reception order. It is a nasty term. These people are not paupers really, and there are quite a number of these people who pay the maintenance rate, or part of it.

4091. Are not they removed from the category of paupers?—No, they are still paupers. I have one female private case; and there are ex-service patients on the male side; but the conditions for private and pauper cases are alike.

4092. We were told that in the case of patients who had passed through the workhouse, and therefore became paupers, and ultimately found their way to the asylums, if it was subsequently discovered that they were able to pay their way, they were removed from the category of pauper patients, and became private patients?—I do not think so.

4093. So that whether a patient is really paying full maintenance or not, you make no distinction?—They are pauper patients, and are classified alike with the others who cannot pay their maintenance and are dependent on the rates, they are stamped as paupers; and I think all these things help to push the unfortunate lunatic further down, and bring contempt on mental hospitals as a whole. I think we should try and get rid of those conditions. Why call them lunatics, rather than persons of unsound mind, which would be much better than calling them lunatics?

4094. You are in fact in favour of assimilating this form of disease to any other form of disease?—I am; I regard it as a physical ailment. Any of us might get mania next week.

4096. But there is the element of compulsory detention, which is an embarrassing thing to deal with from the legal point of view?—Yes. It is a tremendous difficulty, and one wonders how one is going to deal with it, but I think one can safely divide insanity into two categories—the curable and the incurable type. In a few words I will give you the chronic type of cases. You get idiots who make noises, who scratch and bite and scream, and have no control over themselves. Then you pass to a higher grade, still of a low form, but a little better; then you get to the further scales, until you come to the criminal type. For instance, the Dartmoor shepherd has been spending his life in gaol, until some intelligent magistrate has said he is insane. He always will rob poor boxes. If you put a £5 note down he will pass it, but he will rob a poor-box. This type of man you call a criminal, but he is not; nothing can help him. Then you come across epileptics with dementia. These epileptics have been tried to be cured since the time of the Flood. The great St. Paul, I believe, was said to be epileptic. All the world has tried to cure epileptics, but we cannot. Naturally they send them to us and say: "What you want is treatment for these patients"; I do not know how; but there is no form of treatment for them. Then we pass on to the old seniles, who have small hæmorrhages in the brain, perhaps the size of my finger nail. When we hold post-mortems and find these things, we know we cannot cure them. The only really curable cases are melancholias and manias, and we get a fairly good recovery rate from these patients. My last lot of statistics show that in 1923 there was a 35 per cent. recovery rate, and this year there is a 45 per cent. recovery rate of the whole of the patients coming in. The patients coming in are mixed; you get dementia, epileptics, manias, melancholias, and out of that crowd you will find a large percentage of recoveries.

4097. If you were to eliminate the class of chronic patients you have been describing, would you have a much higher percentage of recovery?—Yes, because the chronic cases knock the recovery rate down, and there is no possible hope for them that I can see.

4098. Taking cases where something can be done by treatment, how do you treat them?—Those are cases which I say should not be certified; they could come in as voluntary cases, and I have had people coming to me asking to be taken in.

4099. Do I understand you are an advocate of voluntary admission of patients?—I am.

4100. To follow that up, if someone comes to you as a voluntary patient, sufficiently intelligent to appreciate that he is on the verge of a breakdown, and asks for the shelter of your institution, and unfortunately the attack supervenes after he has been two or three days in the institution, and he says "I am going home now," you cannot stop him?—Quite so.

4101. What would happen there?—We must have some supervision; we must get so many days' notice, and be able to communicate with the relatives and say, "If you want to take him out, take him out."

4102. But would not you require to have some control over the patient—although a voluntary patient—you must have some control over him?—Yes, because a man who was not fit to go out, and went out, would certainly do himself some harm. Do not certify, but give him a chance; he might be better in a week.

4103. Then on the question of treating incipient cases, I suppose a number of cases would never reach certification, if they could be dealt with in some provisional way?—I have my doubts about that. Taking a neurasthenic or neurotic person, they go for years and years in that state, and never develop insanity. The person who goes really insane is the person who goes straight off, and those are the best cases that are going to recover. The old chronic cases that we have with all kinds of delusions become hopeless. You can play about with them and give them bottles of medicine, but it is a waste of time.

4104. Are you in favour of some method of out-patient treatment, or an out-patient system combined with institutional treatment, as a sort of preliminary to asylum treatment?—I think if we ran an out-patients' department and saw these cases we could form some idea of their standard, and that sort of thing. But here is a patient going off, and we say, "I think you had better stay with us," and then treat them on the lines of a patient in a general hospital. We could then take them in and treat them, and send them out again. If people felt they could come in and be treated, we should get more coming along; but they have the idea that the moment we get them it is good-bye, and they will never come out again. That is all nonsense; we want recoveries. Personally I would not keep mild cases; I would treat them for a month, and if they could keep out a month they could keep out longer, and even if they kept out three months, it is something, it all counts. In Edinburgh at the Royal Infirmary there were 500 cases of all forms of insanity treated as out-patients and in-patients without certification, and they get a recovery rate of 64, or including alcoholics, 72. That is pretty good. The people there say, "Here is a hospital where I can go for treatment," and they go.

4105. Which hospital is that?—The Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh.

4106. Do you think, if the asylum became more of the character of a mental hospital, people would resort to it as readily as they resort to the Royal Infirmary at Edinburgh?—Yes.

4107. And you might be able to reduce the number of certifications very substantially?—Quite so.

4108. But there is always the difficulty, in contrasting it with a hospital, that you must have certain legal powers of control, must you not?—Yes, but that could be done. There could be some provision if the necessity arose, but if the necessity did not arise, why carry it into force? I mean, if a patient was in, and wanted to go out, and he was unfit, I ought to be able to say, "I want so many hours' notice," and insist on keeping him. In the meantime I could communicate with a relative, and if the relative said, "I will be responsible," let him take the patient. There might be a few disasters at first, but I think it would work out all right.

4109. I am not sure that I agree with that. The relative might be anxious to have the patient at home, but it might not be good for the patient. The patient might be handed over to the relative, and might fling himself or herself out of the window directly they got home?—Let me give you an instance of a case of not being able to evade the law. A woman came to me one night about eight o'clock, shaking and trembling all over and weeping, and talking in an incoherent and rambling manner. She had walked about seven miles to drown herself. It so happened that it dawned on her that she was about half a mile from the mental hospital, and she asked me to take her in. I said I could not; she must be certified, and she said, "I will go back to the river." If she went back to the river, what would be the result? The legal thing to do was to ring up a policeman, to take charge of her, and a magistrate, a layman, would decide what was to happen to her.

4110. So you would have liked power given you to have enabled you to take her in?—Yes. I had another case of melancholia, a woman in my hospital, and I said to her, "If you have a recurrence, come in, and do not waste time." She came in after she had put herself in the water, and I asked her why she did it. She said, "I tried and tried to come in; they would not send me in; they kept putting me off, and I determined I would come in, and I saw a group of people standing by, and I walked into the water." It seems a deplorable thing that a person has to attempt suicide in order to receive treatment.

4111. Suppose you were in a position to be able to receive voluntary cases, would you supplement your power by having the right to obtain, if necessary, powers of detention?—Yes.

4112. You would receive a voluntary case on the basis of, say, 48 hours?—Well, more notice than that, because in a county like my own it takes something like three days to get a letter a few miles.

4113. Earl Russell: Seventy-two hours, I think, has been suggested in Lord Onslow's Bill?—Yes.

4114. Chairman: And during that time you should have authority to detain the person?—Yes.

4115. I take it you would have no motive or desire to detain the person?—No, nothing whatever. I have nothing to gain; I am a whole-time official.

4116. And the 72 hours delay would be occupied in communicating with the authorities and getting, if necessary, supplementary powers of detention?—Yes. In the event of any hitch I think there should be some emergency order—what kind of order is immaterial, providing we can do it with safety, our intention being primarily not to have magistrates' orders, but to treat the patients on ordinary hospital lines.

4117. How do you deal with your patients from the point of view of classification on admission?—All new admissions come into one ward. In this dormitory I should think there are about 16 beds; there are all sorts of insanity. Then we classify further. We have, say, an old senile dementia case, and we keep it there for a week, and during that week I have to certify to the Board of Control. If they are chronic, and not going to mend, the patient goes to the chronic ward, or if it is a case of acute mania, and might get better, they are put into a convalescent ward amongst the best type of patients, when sufficiently well.

4118. You do not find it a drawback to aggregate together persons suffering from different kinds of mental disease?—It would not be an economic proposition to do otherwise, because the numbers that come in are comparatively small. Taking this year, from workhouses I have received 55, and from their homes I have received 131 patients. On the female side I have received 34 up to now, and if you divide those into the various forms of insanity, on an average you would want one ward for about three patients; that is working on averages. It is not practicable. If we had plenty of room and plenty of money, we could do it.

4119. I should have thought you might have been able to separate cases of obvious mania and violence from quiet cases in less time than a week?—That is so. They do not leave the ward, but they leave the dormitory. An acute maniac shouting would be put into a side room.

4120. I thought perhaps you might possibly have someone suffering from melancholia placed in the same room with a raving lunatic?—No; they are immediately removed, and if they come in roaring and shouting, they never reach the dormitory, but are put into a side room straight away. The dormitories are quiet; you might hear some poor wretched person weeping, but that is all; there is nothing in the way of shouting or noise.

4121. One has seen in the Press objections to many quiet patients being brought into an asylum and herded with all and sundry, violent cases and so on, much to their horror and distress. Have you any experience of that?—No. The dormitory is reserved for these admissions. Noisy one are put into a side room, and a day room is reserved for old chronics, who occupy special beds in a smaller ward.

4122. But you might very well have a case brought in from the streets of a man or woman using the most foul language, and behaving in a most indecent manner. It would be difficult for that person to be dissociated from some quiet person who was suffering temporarily from an unsettled brain, would it not?—Quite; but that does not occur.

4123. Would you put a person shouting in a separate room?—Those cases go to the worst wards, and all those people who shout and curse are put together, and then you get the quieter lot together. The noisy, troublesome people only torment the better people.

Dr. O. G. CONNELL, M.C., L.R.C.P.

4124. Again I am appalled at the idea of keeping these noisy people together?—Where could we put them?

4125. I do not know.—If you put them amongst the better patients you will upset them.

4126. I quite agree they will do harm there amongst the better patients.—Then, you see, if they are shouting and jumping and swearing, they are not doing it all day; they might do it for an hour, and are perhaps perfectly nice people after that.

4127. Then the next person will take it up, perhaps?—Yes; that is the difficulty.

4128. It is the difficulty, I quite see, that you cannot possibly have a separate room for every noisy patient. I suppose, in the case of a person who is violent and likely to do himself or someone else an injury, he is put in a separate room?—Yes, until they get over the attack. It is difficult to describe. You would probably go round the wards of a mental hospital and you would not know it was a mental hospital. I have taken some guardians round the whole place; there was a lady guardian amongst them, and this lady said on going away, "But you did not show us the worst ones." Here was a woman looking for really troublesome lunatics, but she did not see any, yet I showed her the whole place, the worst possible sides everywhere. But if she came another day she might have seen something which would upset her very much.

4129. Mr. Micklem: How large is your district?—I could not give you dimensions; it is a very large district.

4130. Is it the whole of Norfolk?—Yes; it goes all round by Hunstanton on the one side, and Yarmouth on the other. Yarmouth send us their cases.

4131. How long have you been Medical Superintendent?—I have been nearly three years now.

4132. During all that time you have had no cases wrongly certified, except the one instance you have mentioned?—No.

4133. And in most cases there has been a magistrate's order, and one certificate?—Yes—well, in Wisbech Union they do send two doctors' certificates; I do not know why; it is unnecessary.

4134. Do you suggest there should be two certificates?—Well, I put it to you for consideration. Certainly it is an expense, and in these days we have to study economy.

4135. In a case of acute mania you would like to dispense with the signing of an order?—I quite agree, because generally they are the speediest people to get better. I have seen roaring maniacs quite well inside a week. They are in a poor state; they want feeding up; their mental state is clear, but they are suffering from shock, but you cannot send them out. You cannot have hard and fixed rules for a mental hospital.

4136. But, speaking generally, you would like to do away with certification in quite a number of cases?—Quite a number.

4137. In cases of acute mania and senile dementia?—Well, in cases of senile dementia you can. We sometimes get people of 84, and they are marked dangerous, while there is no danger about them. It is not the place in which to keep these people.

4138. Miss Symons: Can you tell us what is your maintenance rate?—21s.

4139. How much of that would cover food?—I cannot give you the proportions.

4140. I suppose your committee decide the dietary on your recommendation?—Yes.

4141. And you are quite satisfied?—Yes, I am quite satisfied. My dietary is worked on the suggestions of the Board of Control, who have gone into it very thoroughly, and made recommendations. The patients get quite a good breakfast, bacon one morning, or a boiled egg or fish, with of course the usual bread and margarine or butter, and a cup of tea.

4142. You mentioned some difficulties in discharging patients. I suppose one difficulty is the difficulty they have in finding work?—That is so.

4143. Do you refer them to any employment association?—I have not done so up to now, but I feel that we should refer some of our patients, particularly patients who might be useful people, who might go out and take up domestic work; but the whole trouble is want of funds, and so on. The After Care Association is a voluntary thing, but I think, as far as lunatics are concerned, it should not be voluntary as regards money. Coming in and being treated should be regarded as voluntary, but as regards funds for their after-care, I think there should be some State fund or some Government fund from which an association could receive help.

4144. Do they keep sufficiently in touch for you to know when they get work?—They vary. Some find work and keep work; others find a job, but when the mistress hears her servant has been in a lunatic asylum she goes out quicker than she came in. No one will take the responsibility; because they have happened to be lunatics they are afraid of them. I have tried to get people inside a house, but the moment anything is suggested it is obvious no one will take the responsibility. One does not know what the lunatic is going to do. They might be perfectly well and simple folk, quite useful people, and yet might do something; and if I had a friend I should be chary about recommending a person to be engaged as a maid, especially if the lady had valuables in the house. It is a serious responsibility.

4145. I suppose you try and give them occupation while in the institution?—Yes, they are occupied. It is called work, but they are allowed to look on if they do not feel like work. I should think they work 4 or 4½ hours a day.

4147. Is there any remuneration or encouragement for that work, other than the remuneration from the work they sell?—No, there is no authority for giving them anything; they are rate-supported.

4148. Earl Russell: Do not you stimulate them by additional allowances of tea or tobacco?—Yes, we give it them in kind, not in money. I give them tobacco and tea. Seniles and people who cannot work are also put in the same category as the workers, and receive tea and tobacco.

4149. Have you any other large towns in your area besides Yarmouth?—Yes, there is Cromer, a fair-sized place; there is Dereham, Fakenham and a number of places.

4150. It is an extensive county?—It is an extensive county.

4151. Do you know anything about the business which takes place before the patients reach you—how they are certified?—No, I simply receive the patients.

4152. Do you know whether they are brought to you direct, or through a workhouse?—I generally inquire that, and up to the 10th November I have had from the workhouses a total of 55, and from their homes 131—they mostly come from their homes.

4153. You say the majority are brought from their homes?—Yes; there is no accommodation in the workhouse for mental cases.

4154. Do you find, as a rule, certificates are signed all by the same doctor, or various doctors?—Various doctors sign the certificates.

4155. In most of the cases coming to you, would a second certificate have been of any use at all?—I would not say they would be of any use to me. The only thing is, the public have an idea that patients might be sent to asylums who are not lunatics, and to safeguard that the private patient has two certificates, and I thought I would make the suggestion.

4156. Well, it would cost something like a guinea a case extra, which would have to come out of the rates?—Quite.

4157. Would you be satisfied if the justice has power, as I think he has, to call in a second opinion if he wants one?—Yes, I think that would be satisfactory, but you must bear in mind that the justice very often thinks he knows more about the case than the doctor.

4158. I want to ask a question about the non-certified cases which you say should be treated. Under what authority are you going to detain them as voluntary cases? In a case of acute mania you would not be able to get the consent of the patient, would you?—No, but you could get the consent of a near relative or responsible person. Supposing a person had no relative, then the relieving officer or clerk to the guardians would be only too glad to do that.

4159. I should prefer not to leave it to a near relative, because in many cases is not the near relative one of the people they suspect?—Yes, that is so.

4160. And it might make it more awkward when they recovered if the near relative had much to do with it?—Yes, and then on the other hand, when a case recovers, you would like to hand it over to the relative.

4161. You have read Lord Onslow's Mental Treatment Bill?—Yes.

4162. Do you think the period he provides of 72 hours would meet your requirements?—Yes, if it were done by telegram; a letter takes too long.

4163. You mean you could either get the certificate or let the patient go?—Yes, I could wire, and if I got no reply, I could proceed with the certification.

4164. Would you prefer that method to having the certificate prepared and the justice ready to act, and the justice adjourning?—I think the less we have to do with justices and magistrates the better; there is too much prison about the thing. You see they are mentally sick people. Now if I had a bad appendix and went into a hospital, I should be sorry to have to wait for a justice to come along and say, "Shall we get it out or not?"

4165. You have referred to records of injuries. Have you had any substantiated case of ill-treatment?—No, not what one would really call ill-treatment, but may I give you an example? There was a new nurse in; she was about three days in a ward, and they were playing the piano and dancing, and amongst the patients dancing was one lady who spoiled the set of lancers; she corrected her a couple of times, and she took no notice. Eventually the nurse, it was alleged, slapped her; the patients in the ward were immediately up in arms, and reported it to the charge nurse, who reported to the sister. The nurse was immediately suspended, and in the morning I investigated the thing and saw the patient and the nurse. The nurse admitted she hit her, but did not hurt her, and appealed to the patient, and she said she did not, and another patient said, "You shook her," and another, "You slapped her," but the nurse admitted she struck her, and I had to dismiss the girl. It might seem harsh. The wretched girl had not any money to get home, so I had to keep her for a month and put her on to sewing until she had enough money to find her way back home.

4166. Is that the worst case you have had?—That is the worst. Of course, I have had a case where a nurse has been alleged to have bumped a patient on the head with a broom, but it was the nurse's foolish method of doing it. The patient threw her dinner at the nurse; the nurse swept it up, and the patient started talking nicely to the nurse, and said, "Give me a drink." The nurse came with a glass of water in one hand and the broom in the other; the patient took the water, and before the nurse could realise what was happening she attempted to throw it, and the nurse in defending herself put out her hand and accidentally bumped the patient on the head with the broom. She came rushing down and said she had hit the patient with a broom accidentally. She was a nurse who had three years' practice, and she ought to have known better.

4167. She ought not to have had a broom in her hand?—She ought to have had another nurse with her. That nurse was dismissed. The patient said the nurse struck her, and from the point of discipline we have to stamp it out, and not tolerate that sort of thing at all. I do not spare them. They have to put up with a lot; and if anyone is persecuted, it is the staff.

4168. Have you had any cases amongst the male patients?—No.

4169. No complaint of twisted arms?—No. That used to be the case, but nurses are a different class now.

4170. Do you yourself visit every ward once a day?—Oh, no. Perhaps I go to one ward three times in a week where I have certifications. I go all over the place; I have no set time.

4171. If you or your medical officers are about to visit a ward, is that known before you reach the ward?—Of course, as to the medical officers doing their regular round, that is known, but not on the night round.

4172. Are there intercommunication telephones in the building?—Yes, but they dare not use those—do you mean to warn them I am coming?

4173. Yes?—No; a man with 15 years' service would not throw that away. It would be a whole life's work gone.

4174. So that when you get there, the visit is in the nature of a surprise?—Yes; they do not know where I am.

4175. Will you tell me, in the daytime how many assistants are in charge of how many patients?—Do you mean nurses?

4176. Yes?—I could not really tell you; they vary so much. The quieter wards have only one nurse in them.

4177. For how many?—Taking the laundry ward, for instance, there are two nurses there for 80 patients; but in a bad ward there would probably be five nurses for 30 patients. My average works out one in six.

4178. Mr. Snell: I think you said the visiting Commissioners visited not less than once a year?—Yes.

4179. Is there not rather a long interval there during which a patient might be ill and recover and be able at times to go out?—I quite agree. But you see, we are under discipline the whole time. When the Commissioners come round, then I am somewhat in the position of a sort of naughty boy who is being asked, "Have you done your work?" Now, I think, we have passed that stage and that feeling ought not now to exist.

4180. Is any effort made, in the mental treatment of patients, to encourage them by explaining that any particular disease of the brain is as natural as the disease of any other part of the body, and that if they co-operate with the attempts which are made to treat them they have a chance of recovery?—Oh, yes. Every time I see a patient I chat with him or her and point these things out. Patients get every encouragement.

4181. In cases of children awaiting classification, are they kept with adults?—I have only a very small number of children in my institution. On the female side I have five and on the male side I have two, and they are with the adults.

4182. At what age do you suggest a child ceases to be a child?—It depends on the child, because some of them have never grown up at all. They would probably be 12 years old and look about five years old.

4183. Do you think there is any special danger in children being associated with adults?—No. You see they are a very low form of insanity—they are idiots; they are babies—well, when I say babies, I mean they have no intelligence and they are in cots, although they may be about seven or nine years of age.

Dr. O. G. CONNELL, M.C., L.R.C.P.

4184. And you think there is no moral danger about it?—No, there is not the faintest chance of that.

4185. On the point of classification, I suppose complete or proper classification could only be carried out in institutions which are provided with proper accommodation?—Yes, but you see in a hospital like mine the amount of expense involved in that establishment would be enormous, if you are going to cover every form of mental disease entering and leaving.

4186. What would you say about what we call small country houses, where it is difficult to see that any classification at all could take place?—Do you mean private houses?

4187. I mean small receiving places in detached counties.—You mean public places?

4188. Yes.—I do not think that that is a good idea. I should look at the matter from the broadest point of view and try and do away with all the stigma and do away with all question of pauperism and homes and such like.

4189. You want institutions for the treatment of the mentally sick to be of a suitable size so that proper classification in all cases of mental disease could take place?—No, not quite that, because you see you might get perhaps a chronic maniac who for the first three months might be very ill, but who for the next three months is quite well, although during the last three months he might be liable to a recurrence. During that period I should know what to do with the patient with my experience, but if I sent him out, probably within a week, or before that, he might break down, so that one does not know what to do with them. If you get a case of delusion, you do not want to classify, and with cases of chronic mania and all the other cases apart from delusion you would not have the accommodation.

4190. If after-care were available, do you think it would be likely to help in a considerable proportion of cases?—I think if after-care associations could receive sufficient financial encouragement, many of the mental hospitals would avail themselves of the chance of sending certain patients to them, and those associations could organise smaller branches in various places. Of course, I am only making this as a suggestion. I do not say that the associations would do it.

4191. In answer to Miss Symons, you gave us certain information as to what the women did in the way of employment. On what are the men patients engaged?—In farming, scrubbing the wards and keeping them clean, and some work at mattress-making. Two patients work in the boot-shop, and there are three in the tailor's shop. Some of them are engaged in the bakery. Whatever their calling is outside, if we can find it for them inside, we do so.

4192. That is all institutional work, for which they get no remuneration?—No, but if there is anyone in the neighbourhood who wants his garden looked after, a patient can very often make a small amount of money by being allowed to do the work, or if I can put money in their way in any other way, I do so, but of course I cannot pay them out of county money.

4193. With regard to the certifying justices, do you think it would be a good thing if the certifying justice was obtained from amongst the local doctors who might be justices; and would not that modify your suspicion as to the ability of the justice from outside?—It would help, I think, but then there is just a possibility of creating a monopoly there.

4194. But such a man would be only one amongst many?—But he would get all the cases, and he would soon begin to dictate what he would do and what he would not do—that is the danger of that.

4195. Mrs. Mathew: I want to know the age at which junior attendants go into the wards?—At any age from over 18 up to 35 years of age.

4196. Do you really have a girl of 18 years of age in charge of lunatics?—Oh, no, not in charge. The people in charge have years of service, and have passed practically all their psychological examinations. They are not young, but I cannot tell you their age.

4197. But the junior attendants would be only 18 years of age?—Yes, from 18 years of age upwards, not under 18 years of age. You might get a woman in of about 30 years of age as a junior who has not had any experience, but if she was looking for a post we should take her.

4198. Then the word "junior" does not necessarily refer to age?—No.

4199. What hours a day do the attendants work?—They work a 60 hours' week. The hours are arranged between the Asylum Workers' Union and the Mental Hospitals' Association, and we work entirely on the recommendation of those two bodies. We are members of the Association, and whatever they decide my Committee acts upon.

4200. Sir Humphry Rolleston: With regard to the maniacal cases which are admitted on the recommendation of the relieving officer, is the recommendation in order to enable you to detain a patient till he or she gets more sensible?—Do you mean when taken in as a voluntary case?

4201. No, because he would not be in a position to enter voluntarily. I am referring to a case of a relieving officer acting for him?—Well, if such a man recovers sufficiently to go out, he could communicate with the relieving officer, and the relieving officer could say, "This man is now well, and desires to go home," and he would act as the petitioner—or at any rate, the relieving officer is the man's next guardian in such a case.

4202. And if the relieving officer said that he could go out, you would let him go, would you?—Yes, if the individual was well enough.

4203. And you think such a system would act well?—Yes, I think so.

4204. Do you have a certain number of cases of delirium tremens sent to you?—No, not a great number. They seldom come in to me, though they might occur in towns, but mine, you see, is a rural area.

4205. I should like your view with regard to having an out-patients' department for incipient cases who might attend voluntarily for treatment?—Personally. I think it would be better in a mental hospital, because we could then act directly, and it would be a move in doing away with the so-called stigma of insanity. The sooner we educate the public to think rightly that the so-called stigma of insanity is not really a stigma, but is simply a misfortune that may befall anybody, the better. We do not talk about the stigma of cancer or the stigma of pneumonia; then why should we talk about the stigma of insanity? Then gradually people would get to say, "I have seen So-and-so, who is very bad; I will take him to the hospital, where there is no chance of his being locked up."

4206. Supposing an out-patient is quite insane, how would you deal with him?—There, again, I would get his relatives or the relieving officer to be his guardian and take him in for any reasonable period, and if he does not mend, then you could certify; but the unfortunate part with regard to that is that you get patients recovering years after admission, and perhaps a patient has been five or six years in a mental hospital and suddenly gets back his reason. The voluntary idea is to give a person the chance, say, within three months, or it might be extended to six months; and after that, certify.

4207. How many voluntary mental establishments are there in England?—I do not know. Do you mean private institutions?

4208. Yes.—I cannot tell you. There are none in the public service, of course.

4209. Sir David Drummond: At what time do patients have to get up and leave their beds in the morning?—I would not like to answer that question because I am not sure, but if I might I could write to the Secretary and give the information.*

4210. Are you aware that at certain asylums the patients have to rise at six o'clock winter and summer?—No, I do not think that such a thing exists at my place—no. Six-o'clock in the morning is a bit early, particularly in the winter months.

4211. I was rather concerned at hearing you say that the justice's opinion was not worth much, and I would like you to elaborate that a little?—I think I can give you an example of what I mean. A patient I had was certified by a doctor and sent to a magistrate to sign the reception order, so that I could take the patient in. However, the magistrate would not sign the paper as he could not see anything wrong; but when he finally asked the patient, "Would you like to go into the hospital?" the patient said "Yes." Well, the magistrate simply signed the paper because he thought the patient desired to go into the hospital and not because of his condition, and you know very well how one can be deceived by a mental patient. Even with all my experience I have been deceived myself, and if I am liable to be deceived, I feel that a layman is more likely to be deceived and should be more or less guided by the medical officer or by some medical man.

4212. Do you suggest that some change should be made in the curriculum?—No. I do not admit that the medical profession is behindhand at all with regard to mental diseases—I mean with regard to giving certificates, but at the same time I think more attention should be paid to the subject during the student's time—in the school. I think certainly more attention should be given to the subject then.

4213. Then you think that doctors are not sufficiently familiar with the subject, do you?—Well, experience makes them familiar, but I think when they start they have not enough knowledge.

4214. How would you propose to enforce the 72 hours' detention of a voluntary patient?—Do you mean without the patient being really certified?

4215. I take it the suggestion is that an asylum should be run on the general lines of a hospital?—Yes.

4216. You are aware, are you not, that in a general hospital you cannot keep a patient longer than he chooses to stay?—Yes.

4217. Then how are you going to enforce the 72 hours' detention in the case of an asylum?—I think if the Commission made that law, it could be acted upon.

4218. That is to say, you would certify them after a fashion?—Yes, but we would not call it by that name, because we want to avoid all questions of certification as lunatics.

4219. But still, there is a certain amount of compulsion involved in it?—Yes, but you cannot help that.

4220. Sir Ernest Hiley: How many cases have you had this year through your hands. Can you give me any figure?—Up to the 10th November, 197.

4221. How many of those are re-admissions?—The number of patients returned was four males and no females. That was last year; and up to the present time I have had two males and five females returned this year.

4222. That is out of the 197, is it?—No, the 197 were admissions.

4223. But what I asked you was how many of those 197 cases were re-admissions?—I should say seven.

4224. Only seven out of 197?—Yes.

4225. In round figures $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.?—Yes, something like that.

4226. I understand you let out on trial or on leave a number of cases every year?—Yes.

4227. How many of those cases come back to you?—Most of my discharges are on trial. Supposing I have, say, a London case in my hospital, when that patient is well enough he is discharged outright, and, of course, he goes to London and does not return to me. But in my own neighbourhood if they are sent out on trial, they do come back without recertification; and amongst the people I send out are some who I more or less expect to come back, because some of them are on the border line.

4228. How many do you get back, about?—That was the number I gave to you.

4229. The $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.?—Yes.

4230. Then really your percentage of recovery is rather high?—Yes. There are better percentages than mine because some institutions send out 70 per cent., but in sending out such a large number one must bear in mind that, though these people might be fit to go out in the charge of relatives, there is something wrong with them still; it is much the same thing as a person who is suffering from a physical ailment.

4231. Do you know whether the workhouses in Norfolk have any accommodation for mental cases?—I believe there are no mental wards in them.

4232. And that is the reason why they come straight to you, is it?—That is one reason. Some patients go to the workhouses, but most of them come to me direct.

4233. Do you deal with the patients from Norwich?—No, there is a City asylum there; I only take the county, which includes Great Yarmouth.

4234. Sir David Drummond: What happens with regard to private cases?—There are private hospitals.

4235. Are they sufficient to accommodate the number of people?—Yes, I think so. I get applications now and again to admit private patients, but I have not room for them.

4236. Chairman: With regard to patients who are let out on trial, do the visitors to your hospital take advantage of Section 55, sub-section (2), and make allowances to them?—Yes. They generally give them a fortnight's allowance if they are in want; but if they are going direct to a job, they do not. If they are people in a better station of life and do not want help, they do not give them any help, but in any necessitous case they do.

4237. Do you know of any instance in which a visiting committee has refused to help a patient in such a direction?—No, I do not know of any such instance.

4238. When you are treating a patient do you tell him the cause of his certification?—No, and I do not think it is advisable either, especially if you take the case of a dangerous lunatic. My practice in such a case, if I wish to satisfy myself, is to see the doctor who originally certified him. I do not think it is at all wise to let the patient know who the doctor is, so I do not mention his name, because these people keep these things at the back of their heads for years and ultimately might easily cause some serious injury.

4239. Apart from the person who has certified, do you discuss the symptoms with the patient himself?—What I do is this: I read out the particulars, and I say to the patient, "I see you put yourself into the sea—is that true?"

4240. You do that, do you?—Yes, but I do not say who tells me; I do not say, "Dr. So-and-so says so," but I read what is stated on the certificate, and when I have told the patients that, they have discussed the matter with me, and they give their version of it.

4241. Do you think that is always wise? You know in the case of people suffering from ordinary ailments which do not affect the mind, a doctor does not tell always the patient the nature of his ailment?—No, nor do I tell them that they are insane. For instance, you may have a man who has grand ideas of wealth, and in the case of a man I had the other day he told me he was going to buy up a railway station, and he was going to have the Fleet round to Yarmouth for illuminations. In that case I said to him, "You are a very wealthy man," and he said, "Oh, yes," and I said, "What about the Fleet coming to Yarmouth; have you made all arrangements?" and he said "Yes." But all the while they do not appreciate that you are getting at their delusion.

4242. Supposing the character of the insanity was of an unpleasant nature and the subject of the delusion was connected with, say, sexual matters, would you tell the patient that that was the nature of his aberration?—Yes, I would ask him about it.

4243. But would you tell him that he had actually done so and so, as described by the medical certificate?—No. I would not tell him that, but I would ask him, "Did or did you not do so and so?"

4244. But would you describe to him the nature of the actual form of insanity from which he was said to be suffering delusionally or maniacally or whatever it might be?—No. One cannot do it in every case, but I would do it with certain patients and do it in a particular sort of way. For instance, if I had a patient who was amiably disposed I would not mind doing it, but if I had a surly or nasty patient to deal with, I would not attempt that sort of thing.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P., called and examined.

4245. Chairman: Dr. Devine, are you Medical Superintendent of the Borough Mental Hospital at Portsmouth?—Yes.

4246. How long have you held that post?—Since 1914.

4247. Prior to your assuming your present duties had you had any experience in connection with mental cases?—I had been Senior Assistant Medical Officer at Wakefield Asylum, Assistant Medical Officer at Long Grove Asylum, and Assistant Medical Officer at Cane Hill Asylum.

4248. So that you may be said to have spent your life in this work?—Since 1905.

4249. What is the size of your institution?—It holds about 800 patients.

4250. And where is it situated?—In the district of Portsmouth.

4251. Within the borough?—Yes.

4252. When was it built?—1879.

4253. And has it been to any extent altered or modernised since then?—It has been considerably enlarged, and also a large number of villas placed in the grounds; there are five separate detached villas, three of them occupied by private patients, who do not belong, all of them, of course, to the borough of Portsmouth.

4254. So that in your institution you have accommodation not only for what we have called the pauper cases, but also for private patients?—Yes, I have about 130 private patients.

4255. Are these included in the figures you gave us a moment ago?—Yes.

4256. How many male patients and how many female patients have you altogether?—I have 597 females and 320 males at the present time.

4257. Now you have read the terms of the reference to this Royal Commission?—I have.

4258. Which, as you will appreciate, relate to two quite distinct matters. It first relates to the present law and system of administration with regard to certification, detention and care of patients. As an officer who has had experience in the working of the existing code, will you tell us to what extent you have found it satisfactory, or whether you have in any respects found it has embarrassed you, and has not provided you with the powers you require?—I think as an instrument of detention the Lunacy Act is almost perfect. I have found no reason to suppose that it does not protect the patient who is certified. That is my own experience; and with regard to the detention side of it, it seems to me to be perfect, as perfect as any human instrument could be which is dealing with human beings. The defect of the Act from our point of view, that is to say, from the point of view of psychiatrists, is that it is too insistent on the fact that every mental patient who is called certifiable should of necessity be certified under the Act.

4259. I follow. Let us take it by stages, if you please. First of all, the initial stage of certification. You personally, I presume, have nothing to do with that procedure, because the patients reach you after certification?—That is so.

4260. You are brought into contact with them, therefore, for the first time after they have been certified as persons of unsound mind, appropriate for detention in your institution?—That is so.

4261. You do, however, receive with your patients the documents justifying their admission?—Yes.

4262. And as your patients are for the most part rate-aided patients, you receive, I suppose, the one medical certificate which is required?—Yes.

4263. Do you yourself scrutinise those certificates?—Yes.

4264. You must have seen many of them, of course?—Yes, thousands.

4265. Will you tell us what your experience has been with regard to the adequacy of those certificates? They contain, as we know, the grounds upon which the medical practitioner has found that the person examined is of unsound mind. One would like to know from your survey of so many cases, whether you find that those certificates carry conviction to your mind, if I may so put it?—I think the best way of putting it is, in the first place, that in my experience as a superintendent I have only found one case that I described at the end of a week as not insane, and that case was a malingerer, undoubtedly. I discharged him as not insane; we gave him some money to go out of the town, and within a week the man was arrested in a train for travelling without money.

4266. Without a ticket, I suppose?—Yes. He was placed in a prison, and the prison authorities rang me up and said he was insane; he had got hallucinations. He was certified, and put into another asylum, and the doctor wrote to me and said that he had heard that the man had been with me: what did I think of him?—because he seemed to be a malingerer. So that the man, if he was a malingerer, was certainly an abnormal personality. As regards the other point, of course, some certificates are not so worded as those who have had a great experience of mental disorder would word them. It is rather a difficult thing to describe what you see before you in a mental case; but none of these cases have been found not to be insane, as far as my experience goes.

4267. Did all those cases come under your personal survey within seven days of their admission?—Yes. I see them all personally myself.

4268. And is that a detailed examination of them in order that you may acquaint yourself with the facts of the case?—Yes, that is so. The case is taken exhaustively by the assistant medical officer, the actual writing down of the case, and the full details, the case book, and the history, and so on, and I make a personal examination of the case myself.

4269. The results of which I think you have to report, have you not?—The results of which I report to the Board of Control.

4270. May we take it, then, that in your long experience you have only in one instance been satisfied that the person who had been certified for admission to your institution was not a person of unsound mind?—Yes, and even in that case I think the medical officer who certified him was justified in drawing the conclusion at the time he certified, because the patient had hallucinations and so on, or said he had, at any rate.

4271. I think this is the first instance we have had of a malingerer who feigned madness in order to get the advantage of an institution?—I think he wished to spend the winter there.

4272. While your experience has been so satisfactory in that respect, I understand you do attach importance to the magistrate who signs the certificate personally seeing the patient?—Yes, I think the magistrate ought always to see the case. I also think, though the system may have proved satisfactory as far as I am concerned, that every case should be seen by two doctors; because where it is a question of the liberty of the subject, there is no reason why a person of a certain social position should have more stringent care taken of him than poorer people; so I think there ought to be two doctors to certify, in spite of the fact that it has worked all right in my experience.

4273. We have had that suggestion made to us by some other witnesses who have preceded you, but I would like to put a point to you upon it. I take it that in the great majority of cases the diagnosis of insanity is comparatively simple, is it not?—Quite so, yes.

4274. And in the great majority of cases would not a second certificate testifying to the same fact be really more or less redundant?—It certainly would, but that might apply to the private patient as well.

4275. But the solution might be that one certificate in the case of a private patient might be enough. We have in mind the fact that a second certificate would double the cost of certification, and we have to consider the cost of any suggestions we may make. We are anxious to recommend any safeguards which may commend themselves to those who have experience in working this code, but not to suggest things which may be superfluous?—My experience has shown me that it is not necessary, but is more to alleviate any possibility of criticism on the part of the public.

4276. It is quite important to have that in view. It has occurred to some of us that the doubtful cases, which, after all, are the troublesome ones, where possibly a second certificate might be a re-assurance, could be met by the justice calling in a second opinion upon any case as to which the first medical practitioner had any doubt, or as to which he himself formed any doubt on seeing the case. Do you think that would adequately meet the situation?—I think it would. Of course, as far as my experience goes, the magistrates are extremely conscientious over the matter of signing the certificate. It is a custom in Portsmouth for the magistrate always to see the case, and he quite frequently refuses a certificate.

4277. So that they really do bring a judicial mind to bear on the case?—Yes. Of course, it is much easier for them in the case of Portsmouth, because all the borough cases are first taken for observation; they never come direct to us; they are always taken to the infirmary, and they are detained it may be for a week or a fortnight, or quite a prolonged period.

4278. Do all your patients reach you via the Poor Law institution?—All of them, except, of course, the private patients.

4279. Yes; we will deal with those later. Do you not have any emergency cases brought to you direct by the relieving officer?—Never.

4280. Do the magistrates in Portsmouth attend at the Poor Law institution for the purpose of seeing the cases there?—That is so.

4281. Have you found that the justices are scrupulous in the performance of their duty, having in mind the stigma which certification imposes upon a patient?—Yes. If I may say so, I think that the practice in Portsmouth in a sense is a bad one from the point of view of the psychiatrist, because the patient in a Poor Law institution, in the acute stage of the illness, when the greatest care is necessary, is not under the most favourable conditions; without saying anything against the infirmary, of course. I mean there are not the medical officers or the nurses and so on. From the point of view of the patient, however, and preventing certification, it is an advantage, and the magistrates do undoubtedly hold up certifying and sending to the asylum, because they feel that it is so prejudicial to the interests of the patient to be certified, if it can possibly be avoided, with which, of course, I entirely agree.

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4282. If the patients are taken in the first instance to the Poor Law infirmary they will be detained there for a period, in, I suppose, a mental observation ward?—Yes; they have formed a large block, which takes 400 cases, I think, in the Poor Law infirmary; and in this infirmary are a certain number of feeble-minded, certified under the Mental Deficiency Act. I might say in passing that I am medical officer under the Mental Deficiency Act as well. Some of them are sent there under the Mental Deficiency Act and under the Idiots Act, senile cases and so on, a heterogeneous collection of mental cases, among whom are all the acute admissions.

4283. Yes, but apart from what one may call the more or less permanent population of the Poor Law infirmary, which would include such persons, I am considering for the moment those persons who are passing through the Poor Law institution, either on the way to your institution, or possibly to be discharged after observation. Do you think that that intermediate period in the Poor Law infirmary may be detrimental to the patients at the initial stage of their malady?—Yes, I think it is, and the guardians themselves recognise that it is. If they are taken into the Poor Law institution first, to avoid certification, they should be treated under the most favourable possible conditions, and, as the guardians themselves recognise, they should be treated in the Poor Law infirmary, the hospital part of it, in a separate ward—not, if I may use the term, herded with a heterogeneous crowd of unfavourable chronic types.

4284. I suppose the outset of such mental ailments is probably the most critical period in relation to the future of the case?—Undoubtedly the acute stage of a confusional case is a stage that requires nursing as carefully as a case of pneumonia, and every possible means of medical treatment of the most skilled type applied to it. It may make all the difference. It is a difficult thing to say, of course, but on general grounds it might make the difference between chronicity and otherwise.

4285. And while those in charge of the Poor Law infirmary may do their best with the means at their disposal, they have not the same means of treating and nursing as you possess in your asylum?—No; they do the best with the means at their disposal, and they are fully conscious of the responsibility.

4286. Of course, the patients may be detained not merely for three days till the justice disposes of the case, but they may be detained further for 14 days in the Poor Law infirmary?—They are detained a good deal longer than that. My experience, especially until recently, was that the cases were largely and almost invariably chronic when they came, and had been there some time with extensions of orders and so on. I am not very au fait with the details of detention.

4287. But do you attribute that more or less prolonged detention in the Poor Law infirmary as in part, at least, due to the reluctance to certify?—Yes, I do, partly. Of course, there is the question of finance. I would not say it came into it, but there is that question of finance. Mental hospitals are very expensive places now, of course.

4288. And every patient who is sent on to your asylum will cost the ratepayers so much more?—Yes.

4289. What is the cost of a patient per week in your institution?—It is 24s. 11d. I think at the moment. Of course that is double what it used to be, and I should think there is no prospect of its reduction; in fact, we do not want it to be reduced much.

4290. Therefore there is a perfectly proper element in the minds of those administering the Poor Law, that they do not wish to send cases to an expensive institution unless they are proper cases for treatment there?—Perfectly.

4291. Do you think, looking at it from your expert point of view, that that very reluctance either to certify or to send to your institution and the consequent prolonged period in the Poor Law infirmary, may be disadvantageous to the prospects of the patient's ultimate recovery?—Yes, I do, undoubtedly.

4292. Now have you considered how that might be obviated? Would you be in favour of patients coming direct to a department of your asylum, where you could receive them without certification in the same provisional manner as they are received in the Poor Law infirmary?—That is the solution that I should advocate; an entirely detached part of the institution, and under the same authorities. Of course, I think of these things from the local point of view. It would be grotesque to suggest building an entirely separate institution, a so-called clinic, in a town such as ours, and duplicating the administration and acquiring from goodness knows where psychiatrists and mental nurses and so on; it would be an absurdity. I should suggest a separate department which will take all problems of mental disorder, with which the town is of course full, for observation, for careful study, reports, notes, and so on, and placing them in whatever place they should be placed in, whether they are feeble-minded institutions, or to the care of friends, and to try and solve their problem for them.

4293. I think some of us have been impressed with the undesirability of this transition stage under which all your patients have to pass through a Poor Law infirmary on their way to their ultimate destination, which may be either freedom or an asylum. But to get a practical solution for it, would it be compatible with your administration, which is confined at present to actually certified cases, if you had a department of your asylum to which cases at their initial stages were brought at the outset, and dealt with provisionally, until their ultimate fate might be determined after observation and treatment?—Yes, that is my view.

4294. Of course, one advantage from the patient's point of view would be this, that while they were under observation in this provisional stage you could afford them the benefit of attendance by your skilled staff, and of treatment as well?—Yes, that is so.

4295. I suppose neither of those advantages, with the best will in the world, can be afforded by a Poor Law infirmary, which has to deal with general cases of all sorts?—I do not think so, without very great expense.

4296. And that expense, if it were incurred, would really mean a duplication of mental staff and mental treatment in two places in the same area?—Yes, it would.

4297. Now, you have told us about the stage at which patients reach you. With regard to the next stage, the detention, we shall assume that you have satisfied yourself after your examination that the patient is one appropriate for detention in your institution, and that you have reported the case in ordinary form to the Board of Control. What happens to the patient after the first seven days? Perhaps it would be better to ask at the very outset when the patient first comes to you: Is any classification of the cases made on arrival?—Yes, we have an admission ward on each side where the cases are all admitted provided they are suitable, but if a person was very feeble and so on, he would be obviously better treated in the sick ward in the infirmary; but, generally speaking, all the recent cases are admitted to the admission ward.

4298. Are they received by one of your assistants?
—Yes.

4299. And does the case receive at the outset individual consideration as to the proper way to deal with it?—Yes, certainly.

4300. We have heard it suggested that in some institutions patients of all types of insanity, whether they are quiet melancholic cases, or whether they are more or less violent cases, are at first herded together, to use your own phrase, for a time, which does seem undesirable. Is that not so in your institution?—It depends on the structure. The structure of our acute ward, unfortunately, is not a separate villa such as some asylums have, but our structure is a large ward with side rooms and a large bed space with not very many beds in it, and a very large verandah opening out into the garden. If a case required treatment in a side room, which is not by any means a disagreeable thing, (it is a nice airy room, heated, with a big window and a bed), the case would be treated there; and another case of acute melancholia could be treated in a separate part either on the verandah or elsewhere. Unfortunately, it would be impossible in many institutions so to arrange that every type of case had a separate room. That is the whole trouble of treatment of mental disorder: that the more one feels that more ought to be done for the cases, the more you realize that you ought to have more little wards, because so much individual treatment is necessary for a case; and to get ideal conditions which, of course, we always visualise, the expense would be simply enormous.

4301. One has, of course, to have that in view, but, speaking as a layman, one cannot but feel this, that a patient brought for the first time to an asylum, probably in a condition of excitement, or, at any rate, strange to the new surroundings, and for the time being off his balance, might find it very painful to be associated at once with a large number of cases possibly much worse and more violent, and that the start of the asylum life, so to speak, might frighten or distress such patients very gravely?—I fully agree with that, but the picture of an acute ward as stated by you is surprisingly different from the reality; there is not the noise and excitement, and so on, that is anticipated, and it is really a fairly quiet sort of place. There might be rather a restless case in a side room, but the majority of cases would be quiet.

4302. If you had an acute maniacal case you would segregate that from the others?—Yes, certainly. Of course, I would like to point out this, that the problem is most extremely difficult with our present conditions, because the so-called acute ward—if you take my male side, for instance—is largely filled with chronic patients. The cases of the acute admissions are so few, and when they do come in they are not acute at all, that you would find you really want quite a small ward. Most of my admissions, as I say, especially on the male side, are chronic from the start. The last four cases I have had have been general paralytics in an advanced stage; there is no question there of acuteness; the only acuteness about them is that they have just come in.

4303. No doubt the popular impression of a lunatic is of some person who is raving. Your experience shows you that a large number of cases are not cases of excitement, but cases of depression or general breakdown?—We endeavour in every possible way by a human and sympathetic attitude to deal with the patients, because the more you live in an asylum the more sensitive you are to the atmosphere, and you feel the disability of the patient and the sadness of his coming in, and the more you try to reassure the person on admission the better. Admission is not a kind of scene in which there is a great disturbance. A person simply comes in, is carefully talked to, and reassured and made as happy as circumstances permit.

4304. I understand that as a matter of practical working you have a reception department, and that associated with it you have a certain number of small rooms in which you can put cases which it is undesirable should be with the others?—Yes.

Sir David Drummond: I do not think we have yet heard from Dr. Devine how long a time elapses before these people are separated.

4305. Chairman: Just tell us this, doctor, following Sir David's point: These people come in dribblets, one one day and one another, and so on; how long are they in your institution before they are apportioned out in the way you indicate?—It depends entirely upon the case. The usual routine would be, supposing you had a very restless and excited case who would disturb the others on arrival, that patient would be put into the observation room in the ward.

4306. Separate from the others?—Yes, an observation room in the admission ward, and he would be treated for the excitement. Of course, you have to consider what the patient likes first, but, unless the patient is happier where he is, he is moved out as soon as possible into the common life of the ward, and then as soon as possible, or even at once, he is placed out into the verandah, the open air verandah, depending entirely, of course, upon his mental condition..

4307. I think what Sir David wants to get at is this: On actually arriving at your institution is each case considered on its merits by your medical assistant?—Yes, and instructions given as to what to do.

4308. He may be dealt with in this fashion. It is a case which obviously must be treated alone and he is put into one of those separate rooms. If, on the other hand, the case is a quiet case which may be quite safely placed with the others the patient will be introduced to your general ward?—Yes, certainly, or the verandah, as the case may be.

4309. Sir David Drummond: The point is that these single rooms are just off the reception ward, and a noisy patient would be heard in the reception ward?—Yes.

4310. Chairman: Then you still have association to this extent, that those who are quiet or depressed patients in the general reception ward may be distressed by hearing what goes on in the side rooms you have?—Yes, they might undoubtedly. Of course, the verandah is a great blessing there, because you can put them out into the verandah straight away, and there they escape it, but the fact does remain that a quiet patient might be distressed by the noise of another one.

4311. Now in practice have you patients of violent or destructive types generally in these side rooms—I mean is it a matter of common occurrence?—Yes, as a rule, but with an acutely disturbing case who disturbs other people, I should like to move them as quickly as possible to a ward where it will not be so disturbing; that is so, especially on the female side. On the male side you would hardly ever hear a sound in the acute ward.

4312. Earl Russell: What do you mean by "it will not be so disturbing"?—Where there is a case that is noisy.

4313. (Chairman): That is after the initial stage?—Yes.

4314. For the moment we are contemplating what happens to the patient who arrives. I can well conceive that it could be very distressing for the quiet class of case I have in mind to be housed in the ward, where could be heard through the door, so to speak, very distressing incidents, shouting and possibly the use of obscene language. Might not that be very detrimental to a case which was just hovering between soundness and unsoundness of mind?—Yes, I think so; I agree with that in every way.

4315. I would like to know whether that occurs often. I mean in your reception ward where the cases are for the moment housed, is there generally somebody in the adjoining rooms who is violent and possibly shouting?—No.

19 November, 1924.]

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4316. I want to know how often the patients in the general reception ward are exposed to such incidents. If I visited your ward to-day, for example, and walked through it, would I hear unhappy sounds coming from the adjoining single rooms?—I do not think it is so much sounds, it is a question of restlessness; you might do, of course. I have no hesitation in saying that I quite frankly admit that between what we should like and what we have got there is a certain gap, however hard we try. I mean to say my own attitude to this business is that you have got to think personally what it feels like to the patient all the time. That is the whole object of managing an asylum. You are bound to say that with the structure and with the means at your disposal, there are things for a patient that you would feel you would not like yourself and that is one of them; but you are the victim of an antiquated structure. I do not approve of these large barrack asylums at all. I should be delighted if there was a large sum of money placed at our disposal so that we could build an asylum on an entirely new plan with our modern ideas, a purely villa asylum, but we have not got it.

4317. I quite understand the difficulties with which you have to cope, because you are the inheritors of a system which was undoubtedly less enlightened, but with the means at your disposal you have explained to us what has happened.

4319. Chairman: But wait a moment. I think you rather misapprehended Sir Humphry's question. Sir Humphry suggests that such a case on admission would be at once taken to the portion of your institution devoted to cases of that type?—No, I am afraid not. The case that I should move to a ward with more cases of that type would be the case that I did not regard hopefully, but I could not move this case that I did regard so hopefully because I should be introducing the patients themselves to the atmosphere of chronicity. These excited cases are very sensitive to their environment of course. A very extraordinary thing is that one often finds, if you ask the patients themselves, that they do not seem to object to the noisy case very often and they are extraordinarily sympathetic to it, and they do not seem to be very disturbed by it. I have got private cases now. I have a lady under my care at the present time; that lady came in in a very excited state; I put her into a special room in the sick ward, and she broke a window, and I had to move her to the acute ward; she was disturbing all the old people. I put her back afterwards; she got better in the sick ward, and then I thought as she was a lady of position, and I told her so, that she should go to the private villa, and I sent her to the private villa; but she begged me practically on her knees to come back, and she came back to the sick ward, where she now is and insists on staying there. The fact is she is an individual; you cannot treat a human being by rule. She likes the old people, looks after them and is happy. If you try and think as much as you can of the patients and as far as possible do what they like, it is all to the good.

4320. Sir David Drummond: Are these acute hopeful cases treated in the side rooms of the reception ward?—Yes, you keep them in the side room first, and the minute you get the chance you take them out of the side ward on to the verandah. If they get restless and disturb the other cases, then you put them back again.

4321. So that as long as they are noisy they are within the hearing of the patients in the reception ward?—Yes.

4321A. Chairman: Are there many cases, if it may be taken as a normal circumstance of your reception ward, in the side rooms which are noisy and acute cases?—Yes, undoubtedly, especially on the female side. A large proportion of the female admissions are people acutely confused and excited.

4322. The difficulty from your administrative point of view is that you have not got in your institution the means of separating completely the two broad classes of cases, the quiet and well behaved cases on the one hand, and the more or less violent and excited cases on the other?—Only a partial separation. I must insist on a partial separation, because there is an open ward and there is the verandah, and side-rooms. The noise would not be heard on the verandah, and they sleep out there, of course.

4323. But as one appreciates, after all we are dealing with people who may be in a very sensitive state of mind, and undesirable associations at that stage may be unfortunate, you would agree?—I do.

4324. Then your conception of an ideal institution would be where such noisy cases were from the outset kept quite apart from the quieter cases?—Yes, and in this sense, that ideal is actualised in the case of the private patients; the private villa is much more ideal. A very acute private case I should always put into the main building, but the private villa has got a small ward for the acute cases and an entirely disconnected part in the villa for the quiet admissions.

4325. And that is what you regard as the ideal method to which you would like your whole institution to approximate?—Yes, that is so.

4326. Now we have carried the patient this length, that you have, first of all, put the entrant either into the general reception ward or into one of the side rooms; you have made your examination within the seven days. What is the next stage in the patient's history?—The patient stays where he is as long as he requires the treatment in the acute ward. As soon as possible one transfers him to that part of the institution most suited to his needs. If he is a sick man, we send him to the sick ward. If he comes round, we send him to what we call the convalescent ward.

4327. May I take it that apart from the reception ward and the reception rooms, the ordinary wards in your institution are so arranged that separate wards are allocated to separate types of patients?—Quite.

4328. So that you have a sorting out of the cases in this clearing house as I call it?—Yes.

4329. The ultimate destination of the patient is a ward in which other cases of the same sort are accommodated?—Yes.

4330. How many patients will you have of one type, let us say, in a particular ward?—You might have 45 in a ward; there are none much bigger than that; that is quite big enough.

4331. In these wards do you find patients more or less of the same type?—Yes, certainly.

4332. Looking at it from the curative point of view, do you find that it is detrimental to patients to be in the presence of a large number of persons suffering in the same way as themselves?—No, I do not think so.

4333. Passing to the question of detention of cases, your warrant to detain is dependent, is it not, upon the continued unsoundness of mind of your patient?—Yes.

4334. What in practice are the precautions you take to see that the conditions of that warrant are fulfilled, namely, that the persons whom you are detaining are patients who ought to continue to be detained?—On a given date, as you are aware, this continuation certificate has to be written, and my own practice is that, provided the patient is fit to be up, the patient is brought to my office at nine o'clock in the morning, and there I have the case records before me, I have a talk with the patient and decide whether or not he is a fit subject for detention.

19 November, 1924.]

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4335. We had yesterday some evidence that was interesting on the subject of these continuation certificates. One medical superintendent said that it was difficult at the convalescent stage to say of a particular case whether it had passed out of the region of insanity into the region of sanity. Have you found difficulty in signing continuation certificates in cases of convalescence?—No, I do not think so. Of course it is a very great responsibility, this recertification or continuation, and if one were supposed to find at the time of examination lunacy of such a kind that the person would be certified at the outset, one would certainly not find it in quite a number of cases. One has got to draw on one's large experience, one's knowledge of the case, the knowledge of the whole situation, domestic and otherwise, and his reaction as exhibited during the year.

4336. What one has in mind is this, that you may be quite satisfied as a medical man that in the interest of the patient, although the progress to recovery is marked, nevertheless the case is not one which ought to be set at large. You may be just at the stage when another fortnight or another month may complete the process of recovery which you are observing. Does that occur?—I cannot say that. I find no difficulty whatever in such a case, because if the case was in the condition of being fit to go out in a fortnight I should simply recertify the case and state it on the certificate.

4337. The certificate requires you to state that the person is still of unsound mind?—He is of unsound mind if he is not fit to go out. As a matter of fact I should consult with the patient and see what he thought himself. I should say to the man or woman "Well, what do you think about it? You have had this bad illness, and I think you would be better for a fortnight or three weeks more stay. What do you think about it yourself?" And if he said "I would like to go out now," I should send him out. It is very difficult to tie down to a formula a human being—the mental reaction of a human being. If you state on a certificate that this person is in a convalescing stage and feels much better but does not feel quite fit to go into the world, you send that to the Board of Control, and within a fortnight or three weeks the Board of Control most certainly write to us and say "Have you discharged this man?"

4338. I can quite understand that the premature discharge of a case might well undo the beneficial work you have been achieving?—Certainly.

4339. So that it might be in dubiety whether the patient had actually ceased to be of unsound mind at the moment of your continuation certificate; you might have no doubt that for the completion of the cure and for the benefit of the patient a short further period of residence in your institution would be desirable?—I do not think those cases constitute the difficulty. The cases that constitute the difficulty are the kind of case in which a magistrate coming to see the patient would say, "This person is not of unsound mind," and we know perfectly well that he is. Then take such a case as maniacal depressive insanity; that is a patient who has frequent episodes either of excitement or depression, and at the date of certification he is in a normal condition. You would not put down on the certificate: "This person has this symptom, that symptom and the other symptom," because at that moment he has not got them; but you would state on the certificate: "This person during the time of observation has had frequent episodes of depression," and you would describe them, and say he is now in a quiescent stage. Then you sign the statement at the bottom that the patient is of unsound mind; so he is in toto of unsound mind. In a fortnight that person is going to be in a state of extreme depression or excitement.

4340. Then in practice you do not find any embarrassment from the terms of the continuation certificate in cases of convalescence?—I interpret it as I say.

4341. Is the difficult class of case in your mind the class of case where there is no doubt as to the necessity for detention, in your medical mind, while the lay mind may think that the patient is one quite suitable for discharge?—I do not think there is a single case that I have got under detention with regard to which, if I laid the facts before an intelligent layman, he would not agree. All I do say is that at the moment of the conversation the insanity may not be obvious. Our patients are not behaving grotesquely, and talking nonsense, every moment of their lives, they are highly intelligent, charming, and nice, and so on.

4342. But they are nevertheless in a pathological condition?—Undoubtedly, of course.

4343. Now have you had in your large experience any case where a patient has been detained improperly, or has been found to have been detained improperly?—No, I have never had one.

4344. In public asylums such as yours have you any motive for detaining a patient after cure?—Certainly not; one wants to get them out. That seems to be the whole essence of any discussion of this kind, because what possible reason have we got for not wanting to get the patients out?

4345. I think almost the only reason that has been suggested to us has been that some of the patients, particularly those who are most intelligent, may be found to be most useful in the institution?—So they are.

4346. And free, unpaid work may be a great advantage to the institution. That is the innuendo, if I may put it so?—The thing could be said, obviously, because as a fact the work of patients does diminish the cost of the institution; that is a fact. It is a very proper fact, too, in my opinion, that the more these people, who, unfortunately, have to live away from contact with society—the more they are useful to the community in which they live, the better for them and the better for the community, and we do encourage work. If persons do not want to work for the institution they can work for themselves; they can make their own blouses, for instance; but it seems to me a very proper thing to encourage them to work.

4347. No one disputes that, and I can imagine that some wholesome work in carrying on the institution may in itself have a steady effect, and be a part of the cure?—It is the thing.

4348. The suggestion is this, that when a person is found to be very useful in the laundry, or any other part of the institution, that supplies a motive for detaining such a person longer than is proper?—As far as my experience goes, the suggestion is utterly grotesque; it would be criminal to take such an attitude. The bias of the doctor is always to get the patients out, and the more patients he gets out the more he is pleased. There is no possible motive why any doctor should ever wish to detain a patient, so far as my experience goes. I deny that entirely.

4349. Of course you understand why I am putting it to you? It is because we are here to alleviate public anxiety, and one is anxious to find out from your administration whether such cases occur?—I certainly hope not, in my administration.

4350. Now there is another aspect of the detention period, and that is to what extent have your patients means of communicating with the outside world, access by correspondence or by interviews with persons who are not officials of the institution?—They have every possible access. I simply speak from my own experience. I do not think anybody could have more opportunity of airing their grievances than the patients under my care.

4351. How do they air them?—They can air them to me in private; they can have an interview with me at any time they like, whether they are homicidal or whatever they are; they can always have that; they have only to ask. They can see their friends; they can see the committee; and I should like here, if I may, to interpolate what I consider to be the most important thing, namely, that the future asylums should be an organic union, so far as possible, with the towns in which they are located. I think it is one of the most important things of the whole business, that instead of multiplying these enormous asylums, it is infinitely better in every way to have the asylum as a part of the town which it serves. I have had experience of both places, and it is when you get them as part of the town that the personal relationships of the patients to their friends and the community as a whole are very much greater. Now hundreds and hundreds of people visit our patients every month; they have every opportunity of quietly telling their friends what they think, or of making any complaints they have. The committee belong to the town and know the patients and their friends, as a rule; there is a member of the committee from each district. The committee make frequent visits to the wards. Any patient can speak to them, and does speak to them. The patients can write practically to whom they like; possibly I exceed what is intended to be done; I practically always send the patients' letters, even if they are complaining, to societies or whatever it may happen to be; I let them go; so that it cannot be said that the patients have not an opportunity of airing their grievances.

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4352. You have opened a large topic just now, which we appreciate. I understand that you are desirous of doing away with what one may call the isolation of the asylum from the ordinary communal life?—Yes, I am very strongly of that opinion.

4353. Just as the ordinary general hospital in a town is recognised as one of the ordinary institutions of the town to which people go, and in which they take an interest, so also the mental hospital should form part of the ordinary life of the town?—Yes, I think so. Perhaps I may just expand that view. After all, what am I? I am a citizen of the town to which I belong. Everybody knows me, in a sense. Many of the nurses and their friends have been to school with the patients. The nurses live out. The committee are part of the community. The patients can go down the road. They are known by all the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. They can go to the town and shop; they can go to the local football matches, to the pictures, or anything else. They are in organic relationship with the community in which they were born, and I think it is a matter of enormous importance.

4354. You think that this is a step, if it were taken generally, in the direction of doing away with the old idea of the mentally afflicted being a stricken class, apart from the rest of the world?—I do, most undoubtedly. Perhaps I may give an instance. You get a local place; you get a brotherhood choir coming up to sing to them, say 150 men. A lot of these men are the patients' relatives; they certainly know them; they can intermingle together. How can you have concealment? Everything is absolutely open.

4355. Then you would welcome increased publicity in the administration of your institution?—Undoubtedly. I hardly see how it could have increased publicity. Everybody can come in and see the patients. Hundreds of visitors come up every week and sit in the wards, and it is part of the life of the community. The patient has every possible opportunity of stating any grievance he may have. The friends of the patients sit for hours in the wards.

4356. Do you think that system is beneficial as making the patients feel that they are not cut off from the ordinary life of their fellows, but are still in association with them?—I think it is essential. The more social contact of the ordinary kind that a mental case can have, so much the better for him.

4357. Then you must be rather against the policy of having large isolated institutions for the treatment of mental cases, to which cases are brought from various surrounding areas and are treated together?—I am entirely against it; I think it is a legacy of the past. It is much better that Southampton and Bournemouth should have their little mental hospitals than that the patients should be sent miles away into the country. They say it is beautiful to have the fresh air of the country. Nothing of the kind. It is very much better that they should go up to Handley's and do their shopping, and mix with the life of the community.

4358. Of course we have also heard that it is very advantageous to the mental institution to have associated with it a farm and a means of outdoor work. You cannot get that very readily right in a town, of course?—I freely admit that, and I also admit that what I say is a kind of Utopia. How can you have it in a monstrous town like London? You must have it some way out. As a policy I think it should be done as far as possible. It is much better that wherever possible you should have a small asylum attached to a town, even if it costs more. What do a few pounds matter? It is much better to have a small asylum to which the patients can go, rather than to have these immense county asylums very far away, in many cases, from the relations and so on. I fully admit that it is an ideal, but we have to think for the future.

4359. There is one aspect of it upon which you might give us your view. I could imagine that a large institution, of which we have many examples in this country, while it might be farther away from the general life of the community and from the homes of the patients, might be able to supply special curative appliances and so on on a more elaborate scale. We must have a certain concentration in these matters?—I admit that. I admit that the London County Asylum, for instance, in which I used to be, might have much more scientific equipment and scientific people dealing with the matter than I have got.

4360. Take the small institution that you figure: I can quite see the desirability of the homelike atmosphere, but on the other hand it would be very difficult to institute at small local asylums pathological laboratories, and the equipment which we know is becoming more and more elaborate in connection with the treatment of mental disease?—I do not think every place can be expected to be a centre of research, any more than a little hospital in a county town is a centre of research. The main thing is that these elaborate asylums, and the Maudsley Hospital, with which I am connected, may well discover things which we can use; we apply what they discover. Let there be your little asylum, and the local hospital, and the general hospital staff coming up and treating the cases, as long as you treat them on ordinary, reasonable, medical grounds. There is no mysterious treatment we have got that the ordinary doctor does not know about. Treat them on general grounds. It is far better than some scientific research, in a sense, for the patient. He would be happy, being near the town and his friends.

4361. There are such small institutions as you figure in the country, as it is, of course?—There is Canterbury.

4362. Could those small institutions get the benefit of the work of the laboratories and the research equipment of the more elaborate institutions by being associated with them? What I am thinking of is this, for example: A patient's blood might be sent to a central pathological laboratory for examination?—Undoubtedly. I quite agree with that. The ordinary biological methods of examination must be carried out. For instance, we have a laboratory at our asylum which is very little used, because we have not enough staff to do it. All our biological examinations, blood tests, Wasserman and so on are carried out at the local hospital.

4363. Even at present you avail yourself of services outside the institution quite satisfactorily?—Undoubtedly.

4364. That rather answers my point, that the research department and the laboratory department might be centralised, while you might have the institutions more or less dispersed?—Yes, I think it is essential it should be so, because amateurish research is totally useless, as we know. Where you are going to have research you want it concentrated for the purpose.

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4365. Now, there is another point I should like to take you to. Are you crowded in your institution?—Yes, we are.

4366. Is there any difficulty, when a relieving officer desires to have a person destined to your institution, in the reception of the case?—We have not quite got to that stage, but, in my opinion, the place is overcrowded. We have not beds on the floor, or any dreadful thing like that, but we are overcrowded, and it is essential to build very shortly.

4367. Have you any views as to the desirability of removing cases from your asylum, cases which are manifestly chronic and hopeless cases, to a Poor Law institution?—I do not think I have many cases which could be so moved. As a matter of fact, the Poor Law institution itself is crowded; it would be out of the question. One has got a certain proportion of senile cases and so on that perhaps might be moved, but it would not be practical in this case; besides, they do not want to move.

4368. But, in point of fact, in the Poor Law institution properly so-called, the workhouse, there are a considerable number of chronic cases resident, I understand?—Yes.

4369. And you also have some of the same type of cases resident in your asylum?—Yes.

4370. So that one may find a senile dement, a case of that sort, in one or other of the institutions, permanently resident?—Yes, but I think the term "senile dement" ought to be expanded more or less. I only get admitted quite bad cases of insanity. I get cases of senile dementia, but those cases are very restless and excited, and some of the worst sort of cases you can have, and they require very, very skilled nursing. They are restless and agitated. I think I might say that practically all the cases that I have need the sort of care they get. I do not get a big group. Having the Poor Law infirmary, I do not get an admission of the quiet senile case.

4371. I rather gathered from what you said earlier that in Portsmouth the cases that are sent on to you are really cases appropriate for asylum treatment?—That is so.

4372. While the authorities deal with the chronic, quiet, old case, or the case that might as well be in the Poor Law infirmary, without sending it on to you at all?—Yes, that is so.

4373. Have you ever had, in your experience, to give what we know as a barring certificate, that is to say, a certificate by the doctor that the patient ought not to be allowed out under the Act?—I have only given one, I think, as far as I remember.

4374. It is Section 74 of the Act, "Restriction on discharge." You have only had to do that once?—Yes.

4375. It would be interesting to know if you recall the circumstances of that case—we do not want any names?—In this case the patient had delusions against her husband, and the husband was also mentally queer himself. This man wanted the wife out, and as the man was already in some friction with the police, and the woman had delusions against him as well, I thought it was a case in which I would not agree to his request to have her out, and did not do so. The man was totally unsuitable, and the patient as well, so it was a very strong combination.

4376. Was an appeal taken under the provisions of Section 74?—No. The man had the case transferred from a county asylum to me as a private patient. I took the case with reluctance, but he begged me to take it; his purpose was because he thought then that he could exercise this legal right by having the case as a private patient, and he thought he could take her out under that Act. I was of opinion, for the sake of the patient and of her mental condition, that he could not do it, and reported it in the usual way to the Board of Control. Then I think he did not want to pay any more, and the patient went back to the other asylum.

4377. In that case your barring certificate was apparently acquiesced in?—Yes.

4378. There is machinery, you know, under Section 74, for going behind your barring certificate?—Yes. In such a case as that, of course, one gives a very exhaustive report to the Board.

4379. And it was regarded as satisfactory?—Yes.

4380. Is one of your difficulties in discharging patients that some of the unfortunate persons have no place to go to when they are discharged?—It is not much my experience, because in the state of affairs which I cite practically all our patients have homes in the town. I think it is a difficulty that would probably arise very much more in the case of a county asylum; people are very often homeless and so on, but we do not get cases that are homeless.

4381. Earl Russell: Are there not stranded sailors at Portsmouth?—We used to get them a lot when we had Southampton cases, but it is the rarest possible thing now.

4382. Chairman: Have you always found that there is a home to which the patient may go, a relative or somebody, or the patient's own home?—Just very occasionally I find I have to send a case to the infirmary, but I cannot recall a case lately where I have had to do it.

4383. Is there any after-care association in conjunction with your asylum?—I have the mechanism for using it, but I do not use it, because the patients go to their own homes, and I do not think they want a lot of people round them. If they are poorly they can come up and see us again. I think the after-care is a good thing, but I do not find any necessity to use it. After the patients have gone out, they do not want a lot of people going into their homes and fussing round. They want to forget it. But I have the mechanism that I could use; the association for voluntary welfare would do it.

4384. Now we pass to the other aspect of our inquiry, namely, the question of the treatment of cases without certification. Do you think that the present system, whereby a person does not reach an asylum or get the benefit of its treatment until the stage of certification, may militate against cases being dealt with at the earliest possible moment?—I think it is a most serious barrier.

4385. Is it a deterrent?—Do you mean certification is a deterrent to going to the hospital?

4386. Yes?—Undoubtedly.

4387. A deterrent against bringing cases in their incipient stages under medical observation, lest they may be certified and sent to an asylum?—Undoubtedly.

4389. Have you any suggestions to make to us as to how that may be mitigated or diminished?—I think the general principle that no certifiable case should be treated without certification might undoubtedly be relaxed. There are a large number of cases of temporary psychosis, some of them quite severe, which could quite adequately and well be treated either in nursing homes or in separate clinics, with a very minimum of formality. The Scottish system of a simple notification to the Board of Control is perfectly adequate. There is no publicity; there is no stigma; and the thing works perfectly well. I do not think that a mental case, that is to say, a person who is irresponsible, should be treated unless there is some supervision. I am bound to say that.

4390. Of course the difficulty of the problem, as you appreciate, is this, that the particular malady we are concerned with is one which necessitates control in treatment?—Yes.

4391. And control in turn connotes deprivation of personal liberty?—Yes.

4392. And it is just round that aspect of the problem, unfortunately, that a certain element of doubt or suspicion has so long gathered in the public mind?—Yes.

4393. It is from that point of view that one has to tackle the problem?—Yes.

4394. Would it be necessary in dealing with incipient cases, short of certification, or avoiding certification, at the same time to have certain powers of control or detention against the wish of the patients?—No, I do not think so. I think if a patient objects to treatment or resents treatment, that patient should be certified fully because everybody has got to be protected; but where you get a non-volitional type of case—for instance, a great number of cases are purely delirious—there is just as much reason to treat these delirious cases without certification as there is in the case of typhoid delirium. In a case of typhoid delirium you restrain, of course. If a patient wants to get out of the window, he is not allowed to do so, and it is the same with alcoholic delirium. The same sort of restraint would have to be exercised with the confused delirious type of case, which is very often of brief duration, and eminently recoverable.

4395. I quite appreciate that in the voluntary case, that is to say, the person who either himself observes, or whose relatives observe, that something abnormal is happening to that person, just as if they saw the symptoms of an ordinary disease coming on, it is desirable that he might go either to an out-patient department of an infirmary, or ask for admission to the infirmary; so also you suggest that a person at the outset of a mental malady might voluntarily ask for treatment?—That is covered by the voluntary boarder system.

4396. Yes. What rather strikes one as a practical difficulty is this: Supposing a person presents himself for voluntary treatment and desires the benefit of treatment, such a person within a day or two may become very much worse, may become irrational, and may desire to get out. You might then find the purpose of your treatment entirely defeated. You would have no power to detain that patient, and the patient might insist on going out. What then?—I know this is a thing that is criticised. The patient simply has to be certified. There is nothing behind-hand or secretive or wrong in certifying a case. If a case gets to that condition the case will have to be certified. It is said "Oh, the case was brought in under wrong pretences." Not at all.

4397. But certification would ensue in the case you have figured as the means of continued detention against the wish of the patient. But take your case of puerperal mania: It may well be that the state is entirely transitory, although for the time it may be quite an extreme case. Would it not be desirable that you should be enabled to detain that case for a short time with a view to cure without certification, because you seem to me to be defeating your object if every case detained against its will must be certified?—No; that is the very point I make, that certain cases that ought not to be certified in the ordinary way are not covered by the voluntary system; but if a patient insists on going out, and refuses treatment, I think in all those cases the patients should be certified, whether it is to their advantage or disadvantage. It is the case of confusion and indifference to the whole situation that you can treat without certification. It would be a very serious matter for us if a patient who came in as a voluntary boarder became very seriously hostile and so on, and threatened murder, which condition might last a week. I personally should not like to have that case under my care without a certificate.

4398. You are aware that under the Mental Treatment Bill it was proposed that a patient could leave on 72 hours' notice, which seems to imply that during those 72 hours the patient may be detained?—Yes.

4399. Sir David Drummond: How are you going to detain the patient for 72 hours, when the patient is perhaps recovering, and a doctor would not propose to certify a patient who is recovering and elects to go home?

4400. Chairman: You see it is a practical difficulty?—Yes, very. The whole subject is very difficult.

4401. What one would aim at would be that in cases where insanity is a temporary thing the permanent stigma of certification should not be imposed. We have been discussing with other witnesses the possibility of dealing with these cases on a provisional basis; that there should be some method, short of certification, which would give you a certain degree of control, but only a temporary control, over that patient, awaiting the determination of the ultimate fate of the patient. Would something on these lines work: That you should have a notification of the case, communication with the Board of Control, and certain powers, not of permanent detention, but of detention for a limited period, to be used for observation and treatment, during which period the patient might recover and leave without any certification?—Yes, that is what I do advocate. If a Mental Treatment Bill of any sort is to be of any value whatever, it must permit real psychoses to be detained. There is no need to alter the law to put a lot of psycho-neurotics in these places. If the Bill is to be of any value, it must give power of detention on a simple system of notification of people who are really insane.

4402. People who would be certifiable, but whom it is undesirable to certify, because their prognosis is good and they may be relieved?—Yes, that is so.

4403. Earl Russell: What is psychosis?—Insanity distinct from a neurotic or hysterical condition.

4404. Chairman: At present, of course, it is illegal to treat a case of insanity in a nursing home for gain?—It is; of course, they are so treated, I have no doubt, but I do not think it is right that they should be. I think it would be an additional protection, because I think that any place that takes these uncertified cases should be under control by some central authority or local authority. I think there should be a system of notification, for instance.

4405. One has, of course, at the same time to look at it from the public point of view as well as the medical point of view. The medical point of view naturally concentrates on the welfare of the patient, but the public point of view is concerned with the prevention of possible abuses?—I think there certainly should be control of some sort. For instance, I have seen a patient in a nursing home suffering from senile dementia, whose daughter was getting her to write cheques. No one recognises more than I do the enormous necessity of some supervision. I mean, human nature is such—they are not all virtuous, and the people who are queer in mind will be taken advantage of from time to time. I think there should be supervision. All I urge is this very private method of notification. Take a citizen in a town such as mine: She may have a brief psychosis of two or three weeks. She is known socially to everybody; if she has got to go through this process, everybody in the town knows it, and she is at a serious social disadvantage hereafter. I make this point, that the hospitals which provide for the treatment of mental disorder which the community provides are the very last places that I myself should advocate for a friend to go to.

4406. Why?—I will give you an instance. A personal friend of mine came up to me the other day and said, "For God's sake, doctor, take me into your asylum." He said, "I am going to commit suicide; I put my head in a gas oven this morning, and took it out again. I am in a dreadful state, and I want to come in." I said, "My dear fellow, if you come into this hospital, everybody knows you. You are only in a psycho-neurotic state; you can soon be cured. The instant you get in, all the people in the town will know of it, and you will be at a social disadvantage for a long time." I was quite right; the man cleared up. You have the grotesque situation that I actually tell a man not to come to my own hospital.

4407. Now is that because the public asylum is associated in the public mind with certified cases?—I think so. If a different atmosphere were created by these clinics—I know this is a thing which people object to—if I had this separate part for uncertified cases in the asylum, I think it would make a great deal of difference; people coming in and going out of the place would get still more known. Of course, there would always be a stigma of insanity, the same as there is in any disease, because people fear it and they naturally fear it because it is a terrible thing to lose their reason. The fact is that there is a certain biological inferiority in certain cases. The horror of the public is in a sense based on realities, but we ought to diminish it as far as we can.

4408. Then you would find it a positive advantage from your point of view if you felt that you were able to take cases on a voluntary basis, or on a modified basis of temporary restraint without certification?—Yes.

4409. Do you think that the association of such cases with your asylum would have this advantage, that the mere fact of frequenting your institution would not necessarily mean that the person was a permanently afflicted mental case?—Yes. I do not believe in detaching these cases from the asylum and only having chronic cases in the asylum, because what will people think of the certified case? You have not got to make that big difference between them, because the lot of the certified case will be worse than it was before.

4410. One view has been put to us, namely, that simple mental cases might be treated in association with general hospitals so as to promulgate the idea that mental malady is just a form of human affliction like any of the other cases that go to a hospital. Is that feasible, do you think?—I am in the strongest possible favour of it, because this Bill was proposed in order that the local authorities should be empowered to look after cases under this modified form of notification; they could do it wherever they wished; and especially where teaching hospitals are concerned. I think it is absolutely necessary that they should take mental cases because the student at the present time has a most grotesque idea of insanity. If a student walking round the wards saw a case of melancholic stupor next to other cases, or he had a special ward with people suffering from some forms of mental disorder which could be suitably treated in the hospital, I think it would make an enormous difference, and he would see then that he treats these cases on the same biological lines as a case of pneumonia, or anything else.

4411. But must not one keep this in mind also, that, after all, the treatment of mental cases is rather apart? The ordinary case in a general hospital is usually suffering from some more or less defined malady, which is treated and cured, but the insane person, although of course in a pathological condition, may be physically quite fit and quite healthy. Is not that so?—Yes.

4412. Therefore you have to provide in an asylum for a continuous life; people have to live in those institutions?—Yes.

4413. People do not live in ordinary general hospitals; they are there for a special purpose; they are cured, and one knows that their period of residence is only a period of weeks, on an average, but people who go to an asylum may have to live their lives there. That is a different conception from the conception of a general hospital altogether, is it not?—Yes. Do not think for a moment that I consider that the general hospital is a general solution of the problem. All I do say is that certain cases that were suitable would be very properly treated in that way, and it would actually cover a class of case which would not get to the asylum, certainly, in another way. The thing has been actually done in Edinburgh by Dr. Comrie, at the Royal Infirmary. They get their alcoholic psychoses, they get operation psychoses, and a lot of depressions, the type of person who is brought in by the police as being suicidal and so on. I think that, if the law were altered, that would be a valuable thing; it would be valuable for the student, and valuable for quite temporary psychoses.

4414. With regard to those cases which in Edinburgh go to the Royal Infirmary, where would a comparable case go in Portsmouth?—I suppose they do go to the infirmary.

4415. Do you mean the Poor Law infirmary?—Yes. I read this account of the Edinburgh cases very carefully, and they are certainly not the cases I get in my place.

4416. Sir David Drummond: You do not mean the Poor Law infirmary; you mean the general hospital, do you not?—I think they would be transferred from the general hospital.

4417. Chairman: The Royal Infirmary at Edinburgh has no stigma of pauperism about it at all. It is an institution kept up by voluntary contributions, and a patient treated there has merely had that episode in his life, but has no stigma whatever. Do you think that the same case which in Edinburgh receives treatment in that way at the Royal Infirmary in England might find its way to a mental hospital?—As regards my own town, it would find its way undoubtedly to the Poor Law infirmary, where it would at least be made a pauper in the mental block.

4418. Is there no general hospital in Portsmouth supported by voluntary contributions?—Yes, but the point is that the hospitals do not take these cases. The Edinburgh scheme is a very exceptional matter.

Sir David Drummond: Is it not a fact that it is only an out-patient department?

Chairman: I think it is.

4419. Sir David Drummond: They have no in-patient department at Edinburgh, have they?—Yes.

4420. Chairman: I hope we shall have some evidence from Dr. Comrie.—Dr. Comrie wrote a very important article for the British Medical Association quite recently, which was commented on in the Journal.

4421. You think that is a suggestive idea?—I think it is of the greatest importance; not that it would cover all that is wanted, but with the relaxation of the law, the hospital by taking a few of those cases suitable for the hospital, would not be breaking the law, at at present it would.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Before we get away from the question of notification and stigma, would it seem to you that this system of notification, which entails detention, might, after having an admirable effect for a time, eventually become smudged with the same stigma?

4422. Chairman: Sir Humphry suggests that any institution which is associated with the detention of persons of unsound mind is liable ultimately to attract to itself the same unfortunate associations which now gather round the asylum. That is the difficulty?—Yes, I think it will; I quite agree with that. But meanwhile public opinion may be educated not to so regard it. As a matter of fact, if anyone is associated at all with being queer in the mind, people know that it is treated in that way. I have had absolute proof of that in the war. I was in a large general hospital, and I was looking after the mental cases, whether they were psycho-neurotics or hysterics. Everybody looked upon them as "balmy"—that was the term they used; they were Americans. They called it the "balmy" ward; it did not matter whether they were just hysterical or had lost their voices; anybody who had anything whatever the matter with the mind was looked upon as "balmy." That is why we cover it; we say they are suffering from "nerves." If a doctor tells a patient his mind is wrong, he would never be called in again; he has got to cloak it with "nerves." But I think that it will gradually be an educative process, and we have to think for the future.

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4423. Let us follow up that idea?—Take the Maudsley Hospital, for instance; that will be educative, not merely for the patients, but for the public; and gradually, by a process of educating the public as to what is meant by mental disorder, and having an objective proof in the fact that people come in and walk out and so on, perfectly well, this will gradually teach the public to take a more enlightened view of mental disorder.

4424. May one look at it historically for a moment? Of course, in the past one knows the perfectly preposterous ideas that were entertained with regard to mental disease. Do you hope that, as education progresses, and the scientific side of this disease is more understood, there will be greater advancement in the public appreciation of the true nature of the disease?—That is so; that is what we do hope.

4425. Perhaps it is in a state of transition just now. You are hopeful that by proper means of education and publicity we may advance still further in putting mental maladies in their proper place as a social incident?—That is so.

4426. Must not we take into consideration also that we cannot burke realities? After all, insanity is in the general case an indication of a biological inferiority, as you put it?—In a very large number of cases it is.

4427. Therefore there is no use in pretending by expedients of one kind or another that such biological inferiority does not exist in the case of persons who have had to undergo such treatment. One cannot burke that?—Quite.

4428. No amount of altering phraseology or opening the doors of your institutions and so on will remove that inevitable association with mental disease?—No, but the thing is over-emphasised, I think, because after all many sorts of physical inferiority or physical illness is really a form of biological inferiority, and the children of such a person will probably not be as well as the children of other people; but it is setting it in a special class. Any disease by its very nature singularly unpleasant will be regarded by the public with horror, and the children as well. For instance, the subject of cancer is regarded rather unpleasantly by the public; and so are the children. If you tell someone that your mother died of cancer he will think slightly less of you. It is only more marked in the case of mental disorder.

4429. But I think there is a speciality about it, if I may say so, in the case of this malady, because of its seat in the reason, and its effect upon the responsibility of the citizen. It is different from other maladies. Take the kind of illustration that occurs to me: A judge's mind would not be affected in estimating the value of testimony, which is an important public function, by the fact, which might be brought out in evidence, that three years ago the patient had an attack of scarlet fever or typhoid. No counsel would think it worth while to bring out that point; but he might think it well to bring out that the patient had been detained for six years in a lunatic asylum?—It might not be quite fair.

4430. It might not be quite fair, but at any rate in the present state of public education that is just the kind of difficulty you have in mind?—It is rooted in all of us. If my wife became insane I should avoid in every possible way her going to the asylum, for the sake of the children and so on, and one would have a special horror of it. All you can do is by a process of education in some way to diminish it, and get people to realise that there are quite a number of cases that are due to purely physical causes, infection, and so on, and that they clear up entirely.

4431. Just one other point. Have you found in your experience that a very large number of your cases are quite willing to submit to treatment in your asylum?—Yes, a lot of them.

4432. Is this element of compulsion which the public apprehend present to any large extent in your cases in your experience?—No, I think it is very much exaggerated. The compulsion is very slight. Your admissions as a rule are perfectly indifferent to the situation, or thankful to get to a refuge, and so on, and on the whole one does not get an attitude of antagonism; some of them are quite willing.

4433. I think you can give us a survey of your last 50 admissions of females?—Yes, I believe I have it here. This was apropos the possibility of admitting cases without certificate.

4434. You have made an examination of your last 50 female admissions. What has been their attitude to treatment?—Nine willing cases (pleased to be under care); thirty-three indifferent cases (confused, etc.); nine unwilling cases (ascribed their position to the machinations of others—persecutory delusions). So that quite a number of these cases could have been treated without being detained against their wish, apart from certificate.

4435. Mr. Micklem: Dr. Devine, I am anxious not to repeat any question that has been put to you, but I should like you, if you would, to tell me exactly what you understand by notification as distinct from certification?—I should mean by notification that a doctor recommends to the hospital to which it is intended to send the patient, similar to an urgency order; that is what it amounts to. The urgency order is just an order from the doctor and from the relative to send the case to a mental hospital without any other intervention, and this case is notified to the Board of Control as having gone to this place.

4436. You mean that what I will call, perhaps improperly, the detention order should be made simply by the doctor and the relative?—Yes.

4437. Chairman: And notified?—And notified to the Board of Control or to some health authority. I think there should be some supervising authority in addition to the person in the home, and the doctor.

4438. Mr. Micklem: Taking the ordinary case of a poor person, I suppose he would come under some panel doctor, or he would have no doctor?—Yes.

4439. Usually in the case of one of the poorer patients it would be a case of the relieving officer making the order?—One hopes that the relieving officer's business will be done away with. I have advocated complete dissociation from the Poor Law. The panel doctor and the relative recommend this case to go to the public mental hospital.

4440. Do not you think that the notification would be just as much known in the family and in the neighbourhood as the certification? What difference would it make as far as the stigma upon the person was concerned?—No magistrate intervenes, there are no magisterial functions going on; there is no legal process occurring of an impressive kind, in which magistrates are called in, and so on.

4441. But in the case of notification I suppose it would still be necessary, would it not, to have some compulsory order against the patient? Notification, would carry, would it not, compulsory detention?—Yes, it would, certainly. The order would be of a kind, as I say, practically like an urgency order, which exists now, in which only two people intervene.

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4442. But where you have an urgency order you mean an order to operate in three days?—My idea would be that it should be something like an extended urgency order.

4443. It would carry exactly the same right to compel detention as the magistrate's order. Is that your view?—As regards the patient; but, of course, if the relatives want to take them out they can take them out now. It would be just the same as it is.

4444. The petitioner could take the patient out now?—Yes.

4445. At any time, even against your certificate?—You would never give one; it is very seldom necessary to do that. I mean it is quite easy for anybody to get out of an asylum.

4446. Do you think that, as far as regards the feeling of the relatives and the feeling of the neighbourhood, there would be a very considerable distinction between the two orders?—Yes, I think there would be a great deal. There is the formality and distress of getting a magistrate to come in. It is only a matter of practical experience. I see it with private patients; it causes a lot of worry and anxiety.

4447. And to what institution should they be notified?—I think they should be notified to, say, a nursing home, and, of course, that nursing home would be subject to supervision by some authority, or to a hospital, and uncertified clinics, and so on.

4448. That means in an ordinary case having an entirely new institution for them to go to in every town? Take the case of Portsmouth: Should they be certified to your hospital?—Personally I think they should be, if the hospital has the confidence of the town. If it has not, they will not go to it; but if it has, you could have a separate block or villa for these cases; that is the only way you could do it.

4449. Take the ordinary case of a comparatively small town of 12,000 inhabitants, such as mine, where there is nothing but the Poor Law institution and a county hospital near it, which would not take mental cases. What are you to do then?—You would not have a great number of cases. I should think you could easily erect some cottages or villas. What we call a villa in an asylum, with 30 or 40 cases, would cover the whole thing.

4450. A sort of receiving house for all cases?—Yes, that would cover the whole thing.

4451. You send out cases from time to time on trial?—Yes.

4452. Supposing that a patient does not return at the end of the trial period, is he deemed still to be in your custody?—Under what circumstances does not return? Simply does not appear?

4453. Yes?—Undoubtedly he is still in my custody.

4454. Under those circumstances, what steps do you take?—Let me give a concrete instance of a patient I had. It was a young girl; she was out on trial for five months, under the most extraordinarily favourable conditions, with a clergyman and his wife, whom I know. She was living in the town on trial, and she used to come up to see us from time to time. The trial was extended. It was a case you had to keep on trial, because it was of a very difficult kind. The girl gradually became poorly; she came up to see me on a Monday, and I thought she was not anything like as well. I took her back to the clergyman in my car, and hoped she would pull round, but that night she disappeared, and she wandered off to Southampton; walked all the way. She is a girl of education and position. She walked to Southampton. I went to the police and told them that this girl had gone; she was on trial. Later the police rang me up and said that the girl had been picked up by the police in a very confused state in Southampton. What I did was to send a taxi with nurses, and fetch her back.

4455. Supposing anybody disappeared altogether, you would communicate with the police?—Yes; but

I look on it as my case. I am letting her out, and I can bring her back whenever I like, if she is unwell; she is simply on a holiday.

4456. I think there is a time under the Statute; if she escapes for 14 days she is free?—Yes, quite so, with that limitation.

4457. I think you are of opinion that there is no risk of anybody being detained in one of the mental hospitals beyond the absolutely necessary period of their detention?—That is my view.

4458. It was suggested to us, I think, certainly by one witness, that there is just a risk which might be got over by having a periodic revision by the justice. What is your view of that?—I think I can say, as a doctor, that the more responsibility that is taken off me from the point of view of detention the more I am pleased. The detention part of one's work one dislikes intensely. If the justices took it off our hands, so much the better for us, but the only point is that it does seem to me rather emphasising to the patient a rather disagreeable state of affairs. I have a chat to the patients and say, "Well, you had better stay on here," and I explain why. If this girl had got to come before a justice and clerks, and reveal her delusions and so on, it seems to me rather inconvenient, and, of course, it is a big affair, because every day I have a case or two coming into the office, and I certify them. It would be a great burden on the justices.

4459. It would be something off your shoulders, but you do not think it is necessary?—I do not think it is necessary.

4460. Do you think it is desirable that there should be some periodic revision by somebody?—Frankly, I do not. I go on my experience. I know it is being advocated by my own association. All I can say is that, in my experience and with my knowledge, it seems to me quite unnecessary.

4461. You have had experience in what I should call a large isolated hospital, and at Portsmouth, and you have given us exceedingly interesting reasons for thinking that the method you adopt at Portsmouth is the right one in the case of these mental patients. Now, could you say whether, comparing the two hospitals, there was any essential difference in the quickness of the recovery or the number of recoveries of patients as between the two?—No, I could not say that.

4462. Should you say that more cases recover or are relieved in one hospital than in the other?—No, I do not think so; I could not say that. Of course, the great advantage is for the chronic patient rather than for the acute case.

4463. Miss Madeleine Symons: Dr. Devine, on the second page of your précis you tell us that in Portsmouth you adopt the same principle with regard to rate-aided cases as in the case of private patients, and that you let them go to their relatives wherever possible?—Yes.

4464. Do you use Section 57 of the Act and board them out with relatives?—No, we do not do that. I have never used that section at all. The relatives apply, and, of course, they have to apply, to the committee. I do not put a barrier to them; but we do not board them out.

4465. These are really discharged cases?—Yes.

4466. And where you say that the figures lead you to think that many of the chronic inmates could be cared for at home if the conditions were more favourable, do you mean the housing conditions and social conditions generally?—Yes, I do; and, of course, the fact that the world has no use whatever for the person who is not efficient and able to carry on; there is not much scope for him. If it were an agricultural country a lot of these people might be working in a simple capacity on the land, but it is out of the question in this country.

4467. You have never tried the boarding-out provision at all?—No, I have no experience of that.

4468. When you were telling us about the advantages, in your opinion, of having the hospital in a town, you said that the nurses live out. Does that apply to the women nurses as well as to the men?—No; I did not mean that. I meant that the majority of the nurses have their homes in the town, and that they come from the town; that is, that they are part of the town. I do not mean that they live out of the asylum, but they are local nurses, and they are known to the patients and their friends and so on.

4469. I misunderstood you. They actually sleep in the institution?—Yes, except a few of them. They can if they like, but some do not do it.

4470. What hours do they work?—They have three weeks' holiday a year. They work from 7 to 7, with a day off, and that includes the meal times; the hours of service are those agreed between the workers themselves and the committee; they are the hours set down by the Mental Hospitals Association; we always follow that. The hours are slightly longer now than they were.

4471. Do you experience the same difficulty as some witnesses have told us of in getting nurses, particularly women nurses?—Yes, there is a difficulty in getting nurses. The basic body of the staff is a very good one—I mean the trained nurses, and so on—but there are a fluctuating lot of people who come and go; they do not stay long; they do not take it up as a career; they just come, and do not like it, and marry, or something like that, and they go. There is a difficulty in getting the best candidates amongst the probationers, but you get quite enough of very good nurses to be gradually trained up to build up the body of the asylum staff, of course.

4472. Do you have any children in the admission ward you have told us about? We have heard from some witnesses that cases of children—I think they were usually cases which could be dealt with under the Mental Deficiency Act—came into the mental hospital?—We have very few; unfortunately we have got two or three, and they are difficult to get rid of; they are bad cases. Of course, we strongly deplore having them at all, not so much for the children's sake, because they are generally very bad cases, but for the sake of other patients. Nothing could be worse than a patient coming in and seeing an idiot child, because the patient would think, "Oh, that is what I shall become." We do not take many.

4473. Earl Russell: You know the provisions of the Mental Treatment Bill I suppose?—Yes.

4474. It provides roughly for six months voluntary treatment, which may be extended if the Board of Control approve?—Yes.

4475. And during that time the patients are there voluntarily, subject to the fact that they may not leave for 72 hours?—Yes.

4476. That gives time, if necessary, for certification?—Yes.

4477. Now supposing the voluntary treatment were not quite enough, would it be possible for them to go through the initial process of certification, and then for the justice to suspend his order, as he now does, for 14 days, and to have power to suspend it for a longer period so that the patient may never be certified?—I think it would be a very good idea.

4478. If you gave him power to extend it from time to time the patient need then never be certified?—Yes.

4479. Whereas if anything went wrong everything would be ready for certification when required?—Yes.

4480. The Bill, I see, provides for two medical certificates. You would not think that necessary in this case?—No, I should not.

4481. Then I wanted to ask you about the earlier stage of the patients. They come into the workhouse infirmary and we know that they can be detained there for three days and for 14 days, and perhaps sometimes for another 14 days, but I did not understand how it was possible for them to be detained for longer periods. Can you tell us that?—I think there is some provision for it.

4482. Chairman: It is a permanent order under Section 24?—Yes, there is some permanent form.

Earl Russell: A permanent workhouse order.

Chairman: They may not be detained for more than 14 days unless you get an order under the hand of a justice, which must be backed up by the medical certificate of a medical practitioner, not an officer of the workhouse.

Witness: Those are the cases I get; they have been in some time under that provision.

Earl Russell: They remain in the workhouse after certification?

Chairman: Yes.

4483. Earl Russell: Can you give us, or can you get for us, the proportion of those who are taken to the workhouse by a relieving officer, or otherwise, with a view to certification, and how they are dealt with, say, within the first 14 days, how many are discharged, and how many recover?—I have no idea of that.

4484. In some cases the proportion that has been discharged at an early stage has been very large. You do not know?—No, I have no idea of that.

4485. With regard to the continuation order, you do not find any difficulty, you say, in filling it up in the form in which it now is?—No, I have found no difficulty.

4486. We had a witness yesterday who said it was somewhat of a strain upon his conscience to say that a patient was still of unsound mind, when he was convalescent?—I have not felt that strain on my own part.

4487. Do you think that can be got over, either by modifying the words of the certificate, or, while keeping the formal words the same, by allowing the person who signs the certificate to add a qualifying note at the bottom, as I understand you do?—Yes, I think that should cover it. Possibly as it is so stringent I think it might allow for these facts to be stated: that the patient is convalescent but might stay a little longer.

4488. The form of the certificate does require you to state in terms that the patient is at the time of unsound mind?—Yes, quite. Of course, it does not often happen, because in a case that is recertified at the end of a year the patient either is or is not fit to go out, and if I discovered a case fit to go out I should immediately discharge it.

4489. But their point more or less was that the patient may at the moment appear to be comparatively of sound mind but unfit to go out?—Yes, I think that ought to be allowed for in the statement.

4490. In considering whether you should make the continuation certificate you said you had the patient up and made a special examination for the purpose of the certificate, but in actual fact you are required in your own mind to make continuation orders every day. I mean if you think the patient has recovered it becomes your immediate duty to discharge?—Quite; in a sense one does do it every day. We have a weekly committee meeting, and you make all inquiries and approach the medical officer and matron.

4491. You do not wait for these periods to consider the cases?—Oh, no.

4492. It sounded as though you meant that?—No, you make a weekly discharge of all who are fit.

4493. I did not quite understand whether it was your patients who went shopping in the town?—Yes.

4494. Do you give them short leave for two days under one of the sections?—Yes, we do that a great deal.

4495. Without a regular trial?—Yes. You can do it so easily in the towns; they go out for week-ends.

4496. When you speak about these numbers of visitors, do you have limited visiting days, or do you allow them on every day?—We have six official visiting days a month, the first and third Wednesdays, the first and third Saturdays, and the first and third Sundays. Of course for sick cases visitors come in at any time, and in the private villas they come in at any time. The only possible objection to daily visits is that you could not administratively do it, because the law demands that a nurse must be in attendance when a person is visited, in the vicinity, and you simply could not do it. As a matter of fact people do come when they like 4497. So that although you have a good many people on the visiting days the actual number of visiting days is only six in a month?—Yes, officially.

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4498. Do you when you discharge patients generally discharge them outright or send them on a month's trial first?—Practically always on trial.

4499. That is, I gather, the modern practice now?—Yes.

4500. Mr. Snell: Dr. Devine, you must forgive me asking what may appear to be an ignorant question, but it is very important that we laymen should really understand the difficulty. Are the symptoms of unsound mind fairly obvious and convincing to a doctor, or are there border line cases in any considerable number where there would be reasonable doubt?—I think there are a lot of cases in which it is definitely difficult.

4501. Cases that require observation for some time?—Yes, definitely. There are heaps and heaps of cases that I think no doctor can certify on a single visit. May I add that I think very often the most dangerous cases are the most difficult. The paranoias and the delusions of persecutions are the most difficult. That is the trouble.

4502. In your précis you say that you have known of many cases which justices have refused to certify. I would like to know how far a justice of the peace is capable of deciding on any other than social grounds in a case of this kind?—I do not think he is qualified to do so at all beyond the social grounds.

4503. But in the majority of cases he accepts the decision of the doctor, whatever it may be?—Yes, in the majority of cases.

4504. You said that the ordinary facilities of the Poor Law infirmary were not suitable for cases requiring careful nursing. If the cost of upkeep and administration, and so on, in public mental hospitals, were reduced very much, would it result in a reduced standard of efficiency?—Yes, undoubtedly; I do not think they ought to be reduced.

4505. The point I want to bring out is whether a bigger proportion of cases might be cured if the facilities for nursing and treatment were increased?—I think a certain proportion might, but I do not think we have experience enough to say. I think the ordinary treatment that any well-managed mental hospital provides at the present day is adequate. I do not think I could suggest anything that would make a very marked difference.

4506. You would not feel that the small hospitals attached to little townships that you are advocating would result in a lower standard of treatment?—No, I do not think so.

4507. Would the possible loneliness of a private ward or room be worse for a patient than the average association with fellow patients?—No, not the sort of cases that would be put in one of these side rooms. The case you put in a side room is a person with regard to whom you want to avoid any stimuli, and to shut off every distracting stimulus. The side room is definitely a special method of treatment which is necessary.

4508. Then you said that you, as a doctor, and doctors in your position have no sort of interest in detaining a person, but rather an interest in getting rid of them?—Quite.

4509. Do you think that same reason might apply in any institution where considerable private fees were paid for treatment?—I have no experience of it. I suppose so.

4510. You think the same reason would apply?—I should think so undoubtedly. I hope so, at any rate. I think so, too.

4511. Mrs. Mathew: Dr. Devine, have you many cases of mental defectives?—No, not very many. If we get them, they are mental defectives with psychosis and symptoms of insanity on top of it. Sometimes the symptoms of insanity clear up and leave behind a mental defective.

4512. You have not got many of those?—Not many.

4513. I was wondering if it would not be possible to combine the senile demented with the mental defectives in some way so as to clear some of your villas or wards for the more, shall we say, effective cases, the cases you can treat more effectually?—It might be possible; there are quite a number of cases that could be moved into a suitable institution and other more acute cases brought in, of course, but the mental defectives require a very expensive mode of treatment and facilities for the work, and grounds, and so on.

4514. There would be a difficulty, I suppose, because they are not legally under the same Act?—It is rather troublesome mechanism to get a case transferred from the Lunacy Act to the Mental Deficiency Act.

4515. That would be difficult?—It is possible, but it is rather a difficult thing; and, of course, the other point is that it is impossible to find enough homes for these mental defectives. In the mental defective work Porstmouth is simply crowded with cases I have examined and which urgently need to be put into homes, and there is no home for them. It is a most distressing affair. They are really bad idiots and that sort of thing—really bad cases; there they are in these slums, looked after by the mothers, and you cannot get them away anyhow. It is dreadful.

4516. Have you thought at all of any reason for the number of mental defectives; have you any view on that point?—It is difficult to say whether there are more now than there used to be; it is a very moot point. The high grade mental defectives, but for the complexity of life and the conditions of life in civil communities, would have been regarded as normal and would have carried out their work in the world, but they cannot react to our complex civilisation; there is no place for them.

4517. In our overcrowded cities?—Quite.

4518. Then I wanted to know the cost of food per head. You gave the figure of 24s. 11d. I want to get an idea of the cost of food per head?—This is last year's report; the total amount was 24s. 9d.; 6s. 0½d. for provisions a week.

4519. Per head for food?—Yes; 6s. for food; clothing 7s. 8d.; salaries and wages 11s.

4520. How many medical officers have you on your staff?—Two besides myself.

4521. That is three; for how many patients?—800.

4522. I think you said you had a private case?—Yes.

4523. How much does it cost?—It costs about 30s., and I think one case is paying five or six guineas a week, but the average would work out at, I think, about 2½ guineas a week.

4524. That is the charge?—Yes.

4525. What is the cost?—I have no idea of the cost.

4526. Could you tell us about your verandah; what sort of a place is it?—The verandah is external to the ward, a broad structure with beds all round and a garden opening in front.

4527. Really a sort of open-air ward?—Yes.

4528. Sir Humphry Rolleston: I should value your opinion very much on a subject which perhaps you can judge of better than people who are more likely to be affected. It is this: Do you think that the Act should be modified in any way in order to protect doctors who certify from actions brought against them which are vexatious and unjustifiable? It is obvious that the patients must be protected from any possibility of conspiracy, and so on; but we must also look at the protection of the doctor. Do you think that the Act could be suitably modified so as to protect the doctor without removing the protection from the patient?—I think it might be, because there is no doubt that the doctor merely takes the part of a witness in this procedure of certification. He states certain facts which are obvious to the magistrate, and so on, and the magistrate either agrees or disagrees. Throughout the whole of society the community settles whether a man should be detained or not; whether it is in a police court or anywhere else. We are only giving evidence. As a matter of fact, of course, the reluctance of doctors to certify is very great; they simply dislike it intensely; many of them will not do it even. Of course, if vexatious litigation occurs frequently, they will still less be inclined to do it. I think they should be protected to an extent.

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

4529. How would you do it? You would not propose to remove all liability from them, I suppose?—No, I really think it is more a matter for the law. I do not think I could make any recommendation of that kind. One is a doctor, and you can merely assert that you think you ought to be protected when you are doing your duty.

4530. The certification by two doctors of private patients, of course, is designed to prevent any conspiracy, is it not?—Yes.

4531. Do you think it would be of advantage for a second medical certificate to be given by an expert, the first certificate to be given by the general medical attendant. He might in a case of suspected conspiracy call in a friend of his?—An independent psychiatrist would be valuable, there is no doubt about that.

4532. And in many cases it would be quite practicable to do it?—Yes. I think an expert is of value. My own experience is that I go out to see cases that doctors in the neighbourhood want me to see, and they are most thankful for advice about this problem, and are often very much at sea with mental cases. I think it would be a good thing to have an expert, if possible.

4533. Of course the suspicion of conspiracy arises almost entirely in the case of private patients?—Yes, quite.

4534. With reference to what you suggest and what other witnesses suggest, namely, that there should be two certificates for the rate-aided patients just as there are for private patients, would it not be possible to have as the second certificate the certificate of a medical officer of the mental hospital to which it is designed that the patient should be admitted. He has got nothing to gain from detaining a patient. He would not be open to the suspicion which might be attached to a medical officer interested in a private institution. It seems to me it might be a great advantage?—I think it would be a great advantage. Of course, it is suggested at Portsmouth that I should act as consulting psychiatrist to the infirmary. The thing has not actualised at present, but if it did do so, it would mean that I should take a part in prejudging the removal of a case to my hospital. But, as you say, no one could possibly object to that, because it is no advantage to me the patient coming there. I should think it would be a good thing.

4535. You would know rather more about the patient when he arrived?—Quite.

4536. Sir David Drummond: Dr. Devine, would you tell us something about your private patients. What difference obtains as between the treatment received by the private patient and the rate-aided patient?—I have three villas—one for male and two for female private patients. I agree to take a private patient for a certain sum, which does not depend upon what they are going to have, but rather on what they are in a position to pay. If people are poor you would take them at a reduced rate. I want to make the point that you do not alter the treatment according actually to what is paid. The patients are admitted to these private villas, where they have different amenities altogether to the other patients; they have people of their own social standing, and they have different diet; a different sort of table; it is like a little boarding-house in short. In all these cases, whatever they pay, or say they are going to pay, I always tell the friends that if their mental condition alters in such a way that they require treatment anywhere in the hospital, I will do it; so that I should transfer these cases to any part of the mental hospital that I desired, if it were necessary for treatment.

4537. Then the distinction in practice is not so very great?—It is great, because they quite definitely have special amenities in the form of a private villa; I mean the conditions are quite different; they get definite advantages in view of their social position, and so on; they are clergymen and doctors and that class of people.

4538. If a patient pays 30s., I suppose the hospital bears the difference?—Yes.

4539. That is to say, there is some other means of making up the difference?—It becomes very hard on the local ratepayers; we are very lenient with the local ratepayers, but if a person has got to be in an asylum for 10 years, it is not like a nursing home; there might be people of high education who could not afford more than that, so the committee would meet them very much as local ratepayers, but we should not take cases away from our district. We have a lot of cases from all over the country, but we should not take those at a reduced rate. You may say that in a sense they help to pay for the others.

4540. With regard to medical certificates, do you find them often defective?—I find little defects.

4541. Are these defects due to imperfect general education, or is it a question of inexperience in lunacy? I am speaking as a doctor interested in medical education?—I think they might be better done probably if doctors were taught more about psychiatry, but we are all pressing our claims for our special things to be pushed on to the unfortunate student. I mean it takes a long time to get into the way of describing a person's attitude.

4541A. It is not a question of imperfect general education on the part of a doctor?—No, I do not think so. There are little technical errors, not filling up the form in the proper way, and so on.

4542. Now with reference to early treatment, and this proposal to institute hospital wards and out-patient departments, do you not think that in the course of time these institutions would become so popular that they would be sought after by the public, and there would be no necessity to impose compulsory detention in any way? Take our general hospitals; you could hardly get patients to come into our general infirmaries. Now the hospitals are so popular that they are clamorous to get into them?—I think it would apply to a lot of cases who shun the asylum now, but I do not think it would be entirely general, because of the fact that a great number of people with mental disorder do not realise that there is anything the matter with them, and that is the whole trouble. Take the paranoiac case: You say, "What is the matter with you?" They say, "There is nothing the matter with me. You are persecuting me by putting electricity on me." There are a large number of cases of that kind.

4543. There are a large number of cases that might be treated purely in a voluntary way?—Yes, I should think 60 per cent. of the admissions, and even more.

4544. I am afraid doctors would object to notifying these cases. They objected in the early days to notify scarlatina and measles, and so forth. I am afraid they would object to notifying people as insane?—I think the only point is that they would welcome anything that would make it easier than it is now. I mean to say they so strongly object to certifying, and the friends as well, that where a case was necessary they would welcome that alternative.

4545. Sir Ernest Hiley: Could you tell me how long the practice at Edinburgh to which you have referred has been in vogue?—I think about ten years, because I have looked up the point in an old article.

4546. Has it been running so long as to have caused any appreciable difference in public opinion with regard to the stigma?—I could not say that because, of course, I am not an Edinburgh man, but I think there is no doubt that in Scotland there is a much happier spirit about the whole thing from the very fact that the notification I suggest is in operation, and that many nursing homes take these cases.

19 November, 1924.]

Dr. H. DEVINE, O.B.E., M.D., F.R.C.P.

Professor Robertson has several homes in which they are merely notified; and the whole attitude is more agreeable in Scotland than here. The opposition is not so great, because the facilities are greater, but I take it that these cases are not certified at all.

4547. Public opinion then is more educated in Scotland in consequence of this innovation than it is in England?—I should think it is, yes.

4548. Then it has been suggested to us that not in every district, but in groups of districts, there should be established places of observation or homes of rest (they have been called both names) where the patients should be removed before they are certified and sent to an institution. Do you approve of that idea?—Do you mean clinics?

4549. Rather more than clinics. The point was that they should not be attached either to the Poor Law infirmary or workhouse or to the county mental hospital, but that it should be as it were a clearing house?—There would be the enormous expense of the thing, the expense of getting the nurses and the psychiatrists. They would only be mental hospitals.

4550. I wanted to get that from you, because the idea has been put to us. You would prefer that a small institution in the nature of a clinic should be established in a district?—Yes, I should do that in connection with a mental hospital if it were in the district, though I am quite aware that people say how undesirable that is, but that is what I think. All these clinics must be clearing houses, unless like the Maudsley hospital they start on a specific line, and do not make it a clearing house. The Boston psychiatric clinic is only a clearing house, and, probably, the community looks upon it as a lunatic asylum as much as other mental institutions.

4551. Could you give me the proportion of recoveries in your own institution?—They were 25 per cent. last year; they are considerably less this year, but, of course, the recovery rate depends upon the material you get. If you get your cases direct from home, the kind of case that goes to the infirmary in my town, of course you get a high rate of recovery. If on the other hand, you get the chronic incurable types, then we cannot cure them.

4552. From what you have told us you get more chronic cases than acute cases, therefore naturally your rate of recovery would be low?—Yes, I am afraid it will be deplorably low this year.

4553. Could you also tell me what is your percentage of re-admissions?—They are not very many. They are well-known people to us, and they come in and go out. I could not say without looking it up. The remarkable thing is they all come from the same district, and they go out, and it is surprising how few do return over a period of years.

4554. Do you get many cases of the recurring decimal sort that come back?—Yes, we get that. You get a man coming in, and directly he clears up, you send him out knowing that he will come back again. He works for a few months and back he comes again. I should think we have four or five of those cases.

4555. When you are discharging a patient, do you ever take into consideration his environment, or the environment you are going to send him into when you discharge him?—You know what it is, but one has little capacity for modifying it. If he is going out on trial you give him money for the time he will be out, but after the trial they get on; of course they go back to the environment they are used to.

Mr. Stewart (Counsel for the National Society for Lunacy Reform): Mr. Chairman, would you put this question to the witness, if it commends itself to you? The witness has said that with regard to certification he holds the view that the doctor should play the part of a witness and not of judge. Does the witness hold the same view with regard to the question of discharge or detention in cases which are doubtful?

4556. Chairman: Do you follow the line of question, Dr. Devine? You have suggested that in the process of certification doctors are giving testimony upon which the magistrate proceeds. Then at the other end of the process, when discharge comes to be considered, are you not in that case acting in a judicial capacity?—No, I am still a witness.

4556A. Mr. Stewart: Now, may I put this question through you, Sir? In doubtful cases is it not of essential importance that the medical man should have opportunity for sustained observation of the case—long personal observation of the case?

Chairman: Do you mean the medical superintendent?

Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Chairman: If a question of discharge comes up, is a person who does not know the whole history of the case competent to deal with the question of discharge?

Witness: May I expand the thought. One is a witness in this sense exactly as you are a witness in certification; in other words, you bring this patient up to the committee, and say, "I think this patient is fit to discharge," and the committee says, "How do you feel now?" The patient says, "Quite well." The committee say, "Have you been kindly treated?" and he says, "Yes." The committee then discharge the case. I do not discharge the case.

Mr. Stewart: I think the witness has not answered the question, whether it is necessary that there should be opportunity of sustained observation on the part of the person who has to give the evidence.

Witness: My observation is sustained.

Chairman: You, as Medical Superintendent, have charge of the institution generally. The question is this: When a matter of discharge comes up, very properly you put your views before the discharging authority, namely, the visitors, or the Commissioners. It is necessary that whoever is charged with the task of discharging should know the whole history of the case, should have the means of judging, in short?

Witness: Yes.

4557. Are you as Medical Superintendent the vehicle of that information?—I cannot say that. When I recommend a person for discharge I do go exhaustively with the committee into the whole history. I say the person is well, and they talk to the patient for four or five minutes and see themselves that the patient is better, and they discharge him.

4558. It may be all right in the case of discharge, but suppose you are refusing the discharge, or recommending that the case be not discharged: Do you then put before the visiting committee the whole history?—Certainly.

4559. Have you means of knowing personally the record of the patient and all the facts that are relevant to be considered?—Of course, I am the doctor. Who does know them if I do not? Is that what you mean?

Mr. Stewart: Not quite. Is it possible in practice for the medical superintendent of a large county institution, for instance, with all the executive duties he has to perform; to maintain sustained observation on each doubtful case?

Chairman: Will you just answer that question? I have no objection to it being put.

Witness: I think he knows his cases very well in my experience. The doubtful cases are congregated in the convalescent ward in these big places. Take Long Grove Asylum. The Superintendent sees those cases from time to time, has them brought up to him, and when he recommends a discharge he goes into them very exhaustively. That the medical superintendent of an asylum with 2,000 cases can know anything like as much about them as I do with 800, or, in the case of a small one, still more so with 20, of course it is obvious he cannot.

4560. Chairman: Of course, on the other hand, you would know much more about the case than any person who was brought in from the outside?—Undoubtedly.

Chairman: We are much obliged to you, Dr. Devine.

(The Witness withdrew.)

(After an adjournment.)

Dr. HERBERT WOLSELEY LEWIS, M.D., F.R.C.S., called and examined.

4561. Chairman: Are you Medical Superintendent of the Kent County Mental Hospital, Maidstone?—Yes.

4562. How long have you occupied your present post?—For 20 years.

4563. And you are familiar, I think, with the terms of reference to this Royal Commission?—Yes.

4564. I think I observed you were in the room during the examination of the preceding witness, Dr. Devine?—Yes.

4565. And no doubt you listened with interest to what he told us?—Yes.

4566. It occurs to me that we might shorten your stay in the witness chair if I ask you, having heard his views, if you have anything to add by way of criticism or supplement to the views he put before us?—There was one point particularly I took exception to, and that was that in speaking of clinics he rather inferred that they should be clearing houses for certified cases—that is to say, that cases should be certified from them. Now my notion of clinics, especially as applied to a county, is that they should be brought as near the homes of the people as possible, that they should be entirely voluntary, and that there should be no fear of certification from them—that either a patient should be suitable to be treated in the clinic or not, and that if he went to a clinic he should go there voluntarily, and if he was not a suitable case he should be sent back to his friends.

4567. Your idea being to dissociate the certification from the clinic?—Exactly. The object being that, as it seems to me, it is very important to get hold of these cases as early as possible, and to afford them really expert treatment at the earliest possible moment; and in order to do that you want to make the clinics of such a nature that the public would be rather encouraged to go to them voluntarily.

4568. Do you think it would be a discouragement to the public in resorting to a clinic, if they thought the ultimate fate might be certification?—I think so. I think it would be a pity to have formal powers of detention of any kind in a clinic.

4569. Of course, one can see difficulties—in that an incipient case might go to a clinic, and after being treated and advised, might deteriorate, and perhaps suddenly develop graver symptoms?—Yes.

4570. And it would be unfortunate if such a case might have to be sent back to his home?—Of course, if the friends were unable to remove them, you would have to report the case, as now, to some authority to deal with. I do not know that the relieving officer would be the best authority.

4571. You could not interpose another institution, could you?—No, I am not suggesting that. I am only anxious that clinics should be quite free from the suggestion that it was a preliminary to certification. I think that would do harm.

4572. With that reservation, may I take it generally that you agree with the outlook on the whole problem which has been expressed to us?—Very largely, yes.

4573. In that case I do not think it would be desirable to duplicate evidence, but I think you have a special contribution to make to us on one or two topics. In relation to the very matter of dealing with cases which are incipient, would you tell us what your experience has been at Maidstone with regard to the number of cases which have manifestly been ailing for some time before they reach you?—Sixty per cent. of all the cases admitted to the Kent Mental Hospital at Maidstone for the last 20 years are known to have been ailing a month or more previous to admission, which seems to me a serious indictment on our present system. That is to say, that in these cases the patients have been unable to get any expert treatment until they have been allowed to get bad enough to be certified, and until the general practitioner, if I may use the expression, has been driven to certify. That seems to me a great indictment on the present system.

4574. We all know the effort which is being made in preventive treatment nowadays, and the prevention of the causes of disease at the earliest possible stage. Do your views fall into line as to that?—Yes, because at a clinic you would have, not only the in-patients, but an out-patients department, and I think it is quite probable that you might prevent a considerable number of cases getting worse by treating them in the out-patients department. I think that would also apply to some extent to recurrent cases, because in one's experience there are a good many patients who are liable to recurrent attacks, and would seek treatment.

4575. But they wait until the last moment, just because of the fear of certification?—Perhaps that; but they have nowhere to go to for advice—they have nowhere, if I may say so—and I say it with every reservation—except the general practitioner who is not very expert in these cases.

4576. And they cannot get the facilities for treatment which you can afford?—Yes.

4577. And the only means of securing the benefits of your institution is to have been certified?—Yes.

4578. But you would like the treatment to be at the incipient stage when it might be most beneficial?—Yes.

4579. Would you advocate the clinics being associated with public asylums such as yours?—Not directly. I think it would be wise for the whole of the mental health of the community that it should be under the control of one central authority, and I also think it would be a great advantage if the mental health was not associated with the Poor Law at all, but was associated with the local, county, or county borough authority and a Government Department only, and all branches should be under that.

4580. One quite realises the desirability of dissociating the element of pauperisation, but I am thinking of the facts at the moment. This clinic would obviously have to be either a separate institution altogether, or an institution running alongside the asylum, or running alongside some general hospital?—Exactly.

4581. It would have to be either independent, or associated with another institution?—Exactly.

4582. Now an independent institution might cost money, and would not have enough work to do. Which of the methods commends itself to you?—What I recommend is the introduction of separate institutions which may or may not be associated with a general hospital. Where there is a general hospital, by all means associate it with a general hospital, but where there is no general hospital, I should say have a separate institution; and I do not think it would be necessary to build such an institution at the present time. You could find probably large country houses, a great many of which are in the market at the present day, in the neighbourhood, or on the outskirts of large towns, which could be rented for the purpose in an experimental way.

Dr. HERBERT WOLSELEY LEWIS, M.D., F.R.C.S.

4583. There is this to be said, of course, that if you had all the curable cases, the hopeful cases being dealt with in the clinic, would not you rather depress the atmosphere of your asylum as a place where you must abandon all hope?—Not at all, because a clinic should deal only with the willing—with purely voluntary cases. Now there are a very large number of curable cases, the most curable cases, perhaps, which would still have to go to mental hospitals, either because they were definitely unwilling, or because they were indifferent, or because they were noisy and could not be kept in the clinic, and did not care how or where they were treated.

4584. That seems to me to leave one class of cases uncovered. Take the case where for the time being a man is no doubt insane, it may be of short duration, but for the time being detention is absolutely essential, or take, for instance, puerperal mania, which might be violent—now if there were no powers of detention in the scheme you are putting, that case would have to be certified?—I would suggest some form of provisional certificate, and such a case should go to the mental hospital. I am not saying that a noisy case should be treated in a clinic, because other patients would object. Those cases, no doubt, would have to go to the mental hospital, and personally I should like to see perhaps something on the lines of the Mental Treatment Bill—some powers on the lines of temporary detention, but they should be exercised at the mental hospital.

4585. Then we are getting three stages; we have the clinic, where the case is one which is not pronounced, and where treatment and advice may be given, altogether apart from certification. Then you have the case where it is desirable that there should be a provisional period of observation, during which the case may recover, possibly without certification; then you have the last and most unhappy state, where the patient has displayed symptoms which are likely to be of long duration?—Precisely, with this addition, that you would have in these big county mental hospitals, I think, in time a large number of voluntary patients; that is to say, you would allow a very large number of chronic cases to remain as voluntary boarders.

4586. It rather occurs to one that this system of different stages might be quite conveniently carried on in association with existing asylums. Why should not you have an out-patients department at Maidstone, and one or two wards or a detached pavilion where you could deal with cases which had not been certified, but could yet get the benefit of your specialised treatment?—For one very good reason. I receive patients now from a distance often of 30 miles, but I want to bring these clinics as near the homes of the patients as possible, so that they can attend them. I am also anxious that these clinics should be attractive to persons suffering from mental diseases. People suffering from mental diseases are very shy birds, and are not likely to take a journey of 30 miles to consult a doctor.

4587. Earl Russell: On what population basis would you provide the clinics you suggest?—I should say, to take a concrete instance, that the whole population of Kent is about a million, and the population of Chatham, Strood and Rochester, one town, is about 100,000. Well, I should think one of these clinics would be necessary in a place like that, and you would want to have perhaps 20 beds and an out-patients' department.

4588. Chairman: As regards these people who are suffering from a mild form of mental disease, do you contemplate that they would be certifiable cases?—Yes, certifiable, but not necessarily certified.

4589. But then you have the difficulty that they are certifiable persons, but not under any form of legal control?—I have already said I should like these places to be open to the inspection of some Government Department and a local authority too.

4590. But from the point of view of the patient, the patient might say, "I am going to be put away," would not that be the very worst thing for the patient?—But he would not be any worse off than now, would he? It would mean that he would have to be certified by a modified form of order, or under the Lunacy Act as he is now.

4591. If the case developed suicidal tendencies, what then?—One would notify the friends.

4592. Then you do contemplate some restraint?—Obviously you would notify the friends in a case like that, and ask them to take him away.

4593. What if there were no friends?—Then you must have some authority. I should like to avoid the relieving officer if possible.

4594. But it would not give you time to communicate with any authority. You must surely have some hold on a patient of that kind? Supposing a person attending one of these clinics has been put to bed and is getting the best possible treatment, but unhappily is not recovering, and he says suddenly, "I want to get up," and threatens to drown himself or throw himself in front of a train, what power have you there?—Merely the power you have in a general hospital. When I was surgeon at one of the large London hospitals, I remember a case of delirium tremens—a man who actually said, "I am going out to jump into the river." Our duty under those circumstances was to inform the local policeman; that is all we can do.

4595. But what would he do in the meantime?—You would simply take the ordinary precaution to prevent a person jumping into the river.

4596. You would see he did not get out—lock him up if necessary?—Within certain limits you would use a certain amount of restraint.

4597. I was thinking whether there could not be some resource provided—something short of an absolute order of certification, which would entitle you to keep the patient, say, for 72 hours. Is something of the kind not appropriate, do you think, or do you like to keep out of view altogether the power of detention?—I should like to keep it out altogether.

Earl Russell: And when you exercise compulsion, you would do it illegally?

4598. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Is it not the fact that in a general hospital you have to exercise it illegally?—Yes.

4599. Chairman: Of course, every operation on a patient's body is an assault, but a person may be brought in whose only chance of life is an immediate operation, and you commit the most violent assault on his body, but it is done in the interest of the patient. Would you rather leave it in a somewhat indefinite position?—I would, because I am so anxious to popularise the clinic.

4600. But what about popularising the asylum by taking from it the elements of hopelessness?—I would like to do that, too, but I agree with what Dr. Devine said this morning; I think the popularising of the asylum is coming about, and I believe it is an educative process. Unfortunately, we suffer from the sins and superstitions of the past, but there is no doubt we are becoming much less suspect and much more popular than we used to be. I mean that in common, of course, with most Superintendents of large mental hospitals, I have not infrequently received letters from ex-patients asking that they may be allowed to come back to the hospital for treatment, but unfortunately I have to refuse them, and say, "You must go to the relieving officer."

4601. You are in favour, I gather, of being empowered to receive voluntary patients in the asylum?—Certainly.

4602. As well as in the clinics?—Yes. You will observe that in mental hospitals under those circumstances you would have three classes; you would have voluntary boarders, who, I think, would be an ever increasing proportion of the population—you would have definitely certified people whom it was necessary to detain there for their own welfare or the welfare of the public; and you would have also people who are under some detention order, obviously recoverable cases, but over whom you would have to have some temporary power of detention.

19 November, 1924.]

Dr. HERBERT WOLSELEY LEWIS, M.D., F.R.C.S.

4603. And the first and last of the three classes are now inadmissible?—Exactly, and I think if those classes were in the institutions, it would educate the public to seeing that we would not detain people if we could help it.

4604. In the case of such voluntary boarders, I suppose you would contemplate that they would come under the purview of the Board of Control under some machinery of report?—Yes, you would have to report them to the Board of Control, or send a report on their mental condition at stated intervals to show that they were proper people to keep.

4605. Have you any suggestions to make on the subject of continued detention in and discharge from institutions?—Yes. I ought to say, it seems to me the question of detention under certificate is more a legal question than a medical one—it is a question of depriving the patient of civil rights, because he is unable to live as an ordinary citizen; and, I think, while it is necessary that there should be certification, every legal precaution should be taken in the case of people certified, and I do not think the onus should be put upon the medical man—it certainly should not be put upon the superintendent of the particular mental hospital in which the patient is confined. His object is to do everything he can for the welfare of the patients, and it very seriously militates against that object if the patient knows that the superintendent, in fact, is the person who is detaining him. I think it would be much better if the question of detention was entirely a matter for an outside authority.

4606. But, of course, no outside authority can judge of the propriety of the detention of a particular case, except on the evidence of a doctor?—Quite.

4607. Take myself or any of my legal colleagues here, we should be quite incapable of judging of the propriety of the detention of any particular person brought before us, but we should have to proceed on the evidence before us?—Quite.

4608. And that evidence is only available from the superintendent or other medical man who has been in contact with the case?—Yes.

4609. While you rather welcome the idea of the intervention of a legal or judicial personage, such personage would proceed on your evidence, would he not?—He would proceed on the case book notes really—in practice every patient has a medical sheet, which is duly filled up, as in any other hospital.

4610. Is your idea this, taking the periodical reports you have to give on cases, that these are really a warrant of the condition of the patient?—Yes.

4611. Do you suggest that on those reports the question of discharge should be decided?—Not necessarily. I think it would be much better if an independent doctor from outside did it.

4612. We have heard a great deal about the reluctance of doctors at all to certify nowadays, because of the legal terrors which surround them?—Yes.

4613. The point you are putting now is rather differently expressed. You say there should be another medical opinion, but I thought you wanted a legal or judicial person to intervene?—What I feel is that it would be very much better if, instead of it being in the hands of the committee, there should be some judicial authority who at stated intervals would act. There might be some system by which a number could be called together, and decide that such and such an authority should attend and deal with certified cases, and should call to his aid any medical opinion he likes.

4614. Then your view is that cases should be passed in review at stated intervals?—That is practically what it comes to.

4615. And I suppose the material such reviewing authority would have would be the case records—the evidence of the medical superintendent or any person he might like to call before him?—Certainly.

4616. And if the case is a difficult one, possibly independent medical testimony could be called in?—Yes, or the nursing staff, or anybody they might think it proper to examine.

4617. And possibly an interview with the patient himself?—Yes, certainly.

4618. This difficulty presents itself to one's mind, that this machinery might cost money, and there must be many cases as to which it might be idle, because the case is one of hopeless insanity, and I am a little puzzled to see how one can discriminate. There are, no doubt, many cases in which the process you suggest might be desirable, but are not there cases of mental degenerates as to whom nothing could be done whatever?—I think it would become very largely formal in those cases, but I rather visualise that a great number of our chronic cases would become voluntary boarders. I do not know whether the Commission are aware that at the present time I have some 1,800 patients in the hospital of which I am in charge. Out of those, 300 to 400 of the women are in open door wards, and there is nothing really to prevent their going away. Some 200 of the men could escape if they wanted to; they are not locked up in any way; they are in open door wards, and a considerable number have parole. They are allowed in certain hours to go down to the town and shop and come back again; and a good many of the chronic delusional cases have sufficient insight into their condition to recognise that they are really better off in a hospital than they would be outside.

4619. Still following the idea of the periodical review, a topic which one wants to explore a little, it seems to me with regard to certain of the asylum population, a considerable number of them, indeed, it would be a very idle ceremonial, would it not?—Yes. I think as to a number of them if they had been seen once or twice by an expert he would be satisfied, and would say at once, "I am satisfied that this is a case for detention."

4620. But it would be a valuable thing to have, and time would not be occupied, except in cases of difficulty?—Quite. In practice I do all the continuation cases at my institution myself.

4621. In your view, as the initial delegation to your care has been done by some legal personality, so the periodical certificate of detention should be given at the sight, shall we say, of a legal authority?—Yes.

4622. And the discharge also should be done at the sight of a legal authority?—Exactly, with certified cases.

4623. And that all being for the reason that in the case of certified cases this element of legal restraint is necessary, which you think should not be imposed or continued or relaxed, except with some legal sanction?—Exactly.

4624. Mr. Micklem: Taking the common case in an asylum where you send out patients from time to time on trial, say for four weeks, if they get a certificate from a doctor in the meantime that they are quite sound, might not they get their discharge?—At the end of the period of trial, yes.

4625. They are discharged?—Yes.

4626. They do not come back?—No.

4627. They send the certificate?—That is right.

4628. In that case do you think they should be discharged without a judicial order?—Not in the case of certified patients.

4629. But all these are certified cases?—But I am pre-supposing that we should have a number of cases which are not certified cases—people under detention orders, or voluntary patients.

4630. I am putting the certified cases?—Yes.

4631. In that case, you see, you would be interfering with a very common method of discharge now, would you not?—Yes. Those would not be for the most part the cases that are necessary to certify. The cases I am visualising in connection with judicial review are delusional cases of the paranoid form. Those are cases which are not likely to be discharged on trial, or anything of the kind.

19 November, 1924.]

Dr. HERBERT WOLSELEY LEWIS, M.D., F.R.C.S.

4632. Still, you appreciate that the suggestion you are making would make it much more difficult than it is now, or would add an additional formality to the present process by which they can get discharge?—In certified cases, yes. I should like to see formal certification only used in cases in which it is, shall I say, absolutely essential; that is to say, I should like to eliminate voluntary and curable and temporary cases.

4633. The difficulty is, is it not, to say which are the necessary cases?—I do not know that I should be willing to admit that. I know pretty well when cases are going to get well or not. If they are going to get well, I do not want them certified; that is what it amounts to.

4634. Would it be possible to indicate a certain class of case which should come, and another class of case which should not come before a judicial authority?—I am not quite sure that I understand what you mean.

4635. Chairman: What is your criterion?—Whether it is necessary for their own sake or the safety of the public that they should be certified, is really what it amounts to.

4636. Mr. Micklem: I find that you, in common with many other witnesses, seem to have a great prejudice against the Poor Law authorities having any control in these matters, or anything to do with it. Why is that?—It seems to me a great hardship that a very large number of the patients who come to us should be pauperised in order to get treatment, when they are not paupers. A very large proportion of my patients are not paupers at all, and yet it is necessary that they should apply to the Poor Law authorities in order to get treatment.

4637. I follow that. But your suggestion with regard to clinics is that they should be established by the municipal authority?—Or the county authority.

4638. Do you know at the present time we have no hospitals of that kind?—The county authority runs the Mental Deficiency Act, which is a tendency towards it.

4639. I was thinking rather that so far as either medical or other relief can be given to people who cannot afford it, the Poor Law authority is the only authority existing?—Yes, but is there any reason why it should not be done in the same way as on the principle of the Education Acts, that it should be done partly by a Government grant and partly by a county grant?

4640. I do not know, but there is nothing of the kind at present. Taking a general hospital, you get no grant?—No, but for the medical treatment of school children you get a grant.

4641. Under the existing system a great deal of work is thrown on the relieving officer in mental cases?—Yes.

4642. And commonly a case comes through the relieving officer?—Yes.

4643. Have you found generally that the work done by him is well done, or not?—Very well done, as far as I am acquainted with it. I think the relieving officers as a body do their work very well.

4644. You know that in common cases they are sent to the workhouse for three days, and an extension order for 14 days is made for observation, which is sometimes extended to 28 days?—Yes.

4645. In your opinion is that period of observation wisely given, or would you send the patients direct to the asylum?—I should think it would be better to send them direct from their homes, and I think it could be arranged that better facilities for taking them from their homes could be devised. There might be ambulances in connection with a mental hospital, and a trained expert staff should attend with those ambulances, because one finds in practice that a very large number of patients are brought to mental hospitals under false pretences; they are told, for instance, that they are going to convalescent homes, but I think that is absolutely wrong.

4646. Miss Symons: I think you heard the evidence this morning about the structural difficulties. Are you faced with the same difficulties?—No, not particularly. To describe it shortly, both on the male and the female side of the Maidstone Hospital there is a floor on which all the recent cases go in the first instance, and if they are recoverable cases, they do not go off that floor; that is to say, they are in one of three wards, and are discharged from that floor. I mean, they do not mix with the chronic cases.

4647. Have you facilities for segregating in cases of noisy patients?—Yes. We do not have noisy patients in these admission wards—as far as possible, we eliminate them from the admission wards.

4648. Could you tell us what staff you have?—The proportion of staff is about one to nine; it varies.

4649. Earl Russell: With regard to discharge, I understand your view to be that the relations between yourself and the patients would be better if they felt you were only their doctor, and not also their gaoler?—Exactly.

4650. I entirely sympathise with that point of view, but as to the remedies you suggest, do not you think in the instances the Chairman put to you that they are not very suitable?—I am rather reluctant to say they could not be carried out.

4651. Let me put the cases separately. Take first of all the obvious cases for discharge; in those cases you agree the tribunal you suggest would be a mere formality, would it not?—I beg your pardon; the case I am visualising is more the case of people who are under a detention order, who are essentially recoverable cases. Those are cases I do not want under certificate.

4652. Then are we to take your evidence on this head as not applying to the present system?—As not applying to the present system, quite.

4653. Then whatever system it applies to, in the case of an independent outside doctor, unless he spends at least some days on a case, and very possibly some weeks, can he do more than repeat second-hand the information you give him, and the information in the case book?—It depends on whether he has had experience of this kind of work. There are a considerable number of delusional cases, in which, if you are accustomed to them, you can very soon get at them.

4654. But these are ex hypothesi cases which have recovered?—The question of discharge, you mean?

4655. Yes. What can an outside doctor say in a case like that, beyond what he learns from you?—Nothing, if they are recovered. When I say discharged, however, I do not mean only discharged recovered cases. Of course, there are other cases discharged besides recovered cases.

4656. If you desire to avoid the appearance of the air of a gaoler, I am entirely with you; but I put it that it does not strengthen in any way the facts on which the discharge is granted?—No—quite.

4657. I want to ask about another matter in your précis, about the judicial authority. Do not you say something about patients being certified by a special magistrate?—Yes.

4658. You say, "If unwilling, under a reception order made by a judicial authority appointed as having special knowledge of the subject"?—Yes.

4659. Are you suggesting there that the judicial authority, who represents the public, should to some extent take the place of the doctor, or act as a third doctor?—No, but I think instead of any justice of the peace, certain justices of the peace should make it, as they do now, to some extent, their business to know something about these mental diseases.

4660. But the justice of the peace is interposed, not as an expert, but as a person representing the public, for protection?—Yes, quite.

4661. Surely that could be done by any reasonable man who gives his mind to the matter?—Yes, but I fancy in practice some are much more expert than others.

19 November, 1924.]

Dr. HERBERT WOLSELEY LEWIS, M.D., F.R.C.S.

4662. I dare say they are, but if you appoint them as experts, do not you get the danger that the justice may be looked upon as no longer representing the public?—Yes, there is that danger.

4663. And, therefore, you would rather shake public confidence by your suggestion?—Yes, there is that danger.

4664. Mr. Snell: You say in your précis that "Over 60 per cent. of all patients admitted to the Kent County Mental Hospital at Maidstone during the last 20 years are known to have been ill for a month or more previous to their admission." Would it be permissible to assume that some proportion of that 60 per cent. would not have been certified if earlier treatment had been provided?—Exactly; that is the inference.

4665. Would you care to mention any proportion in your mind?—No, I should not like to commit myself to a proportion, but I think an appreciable proportion.

4666. It would not be a negligible proportion?—No. It would be an appreciable proportion.

4667. Have you any system of training for your attendants and staff?—Yes.

4668. They must conform to a certain standard?—Yes.

4669. Do they receive any special training in mental treatment?—Yes.

4670. There is a feeling, I understand, that the amount of training required now is rather hard on the staff which is there; a man may be a good attendant or nurse, and may not have given in his younger years attention to these things, and therefore cannot meet the obligations?—Quite.

4671. Is that enforced?—No. I think as a matter of fact the whole of this matter is dealt with in the Nursing Report just issued by the Board of Control, and you will notice that we have recognised there that probably always—at any rate, for many years—there will be a certain number of attendants as distinguished from male nurses—people who are very excellent up to a point, but who are not highly-trained nurses.

4672. Would it be your general view that new attendants would have to meet certain technical standards which would not necessarily be enforceable on the existing staff?—Yes, quite so.

4673. Mrs. Mathew: You said that clinics should deal only with the willing patients—do you mean they should be residential houses?—Yes, with both an in-patients' and out-patients' department.

4674. Then you suggested a sort of medical board to pass out cases which should be discharged. Do you mean a sort of visiting medical board?—No, not quite that. In the cases of the unwilling, that is to say, patients who are certified and detained against their will, I think it wise to have a judicial authority responsible for their discharge, with any medical assistance they like to call.

4675. I think you said your staff is as 1 to 9?—Yes.

4676. Is that what one might call a practical staff, or are some of them away?—No, that means on duty.

4677. Sir David Drummond: On the question of voluntary hospitals, do not you think it is conceivable that a department of that hospital might be set apart for the treatment of puerperal cases and acute mania cases?—Yes. In the experience of people who have such places—and I am speaking now of the Edinburgh Infirmary mentioned this morning, and also of the Maudsley Hospital, they manage to retain a considerable number of acute cases without any forcible detention in fact, and I should be very hopeful that in clinics a very considerable number of such cases as confusional insanity would be treated there and recover.

4678. You would like to see the voluntary hospital enlarged to that extent?—Yes, quite.

4679. Sir Ernest Hiley: Would you propose to take away the powers under Section 77 of the visiting committees to discharge, and give them to somebody else—is that your idea?—My idea is that in these recoverable cases, or cases discharged recovered, and the willing cases, the cases of voluntary boarders, they should be discharged on the authority of the doctor alone; but in the unwilling cases, the certified cases which must be compulsorily detained, they should call in some outside judicial authority.

4680. What do you mean exactly by a judicial authority?—I mean a justice of the peace.

4681. I had rather in mind that you were suggesting another doctor should be called in?—If the justice of the peace or judicial authority thinks it wise, he can call in a doctor.

4682. Would you have visiting justices, then, in all the county towns?—I think it could be fairly arranged. There is generally a local justice who lives somewhere near, who could make it his official business.

4683. Then in effect it would mean that the man who certifies the patient should discharge him?—Yes—it is the same body, not perhaps the same individual.

4684. But very often it would be the same individual?—Yes.

4685. Chairman: Have you any idea as to the branch of local government to which the control or supervision of those clinics should be entrusted?—Yes, I would have a committee of the county council.

4686. Sir Ernest Hiley: Would that apply to a non-county borough?—No, the county borough would have their own control.

4687. I mean the non-county borough?—They would be included in the county council.

4688. You mean everything but a county borough?—Yes.

4689. Chairman: Your idea being, I take it, to dissociate from these non-certified cases any element of certification, one of which is the Board of Control—is that the idea?—No, I do not think so. It seems to me that the mental health of the country should be under one central governing authority and one local government authority.

4690. But the Board of Control has very important duties confided to it?—Quite.

4691. And those duties relate primarily to the supervision and care of certified persons?—Quite.

4692. Now you are proposing that persons should be dealt with without certification, and the question is whether the uncertified cases should be associated with the Board of Control from the point of view of supervision, or should be associated with the local authority in its health aspect?—I should say the Board of Control. All that it amounts to in these clinics is to see that they are properly run. You are not going to certify these people, and it means that you must have some sort of inspection to see that they are properly run.

4693. But could not the local authority through a committee carry out that duty under supervision?—Then you surely would have the Board of Control accusing you of taking certified cases in an uncertified place.

4694. I do not think they would, if legislation imposed the duty on them?—The Board of Control, I understand, are quite in favour of people being treated without certification in proper cases.

4695. As far as one can judge from the material before us, they are quite in favour of treatment without certification, but at the same time they advocate, if such treatment is introduced and becomes a branch of our mental administration, that it should be in their hands. Now the question is whether you approve of that, or whether you would rather have this branch of medical treatment out of the hands of the Board of Control and in the hands of the local authority or under the Ministry of Health?—The Board of Control are now attached to the Ministry of Health.

4696. But they are more or less independent?—Yes, but it is a pity, I think, to multiply the authorities which have to do with the mental health of the country.

4697. Chairman: You approve generally of the recommendations of the English Lunacy Legislation Committee?—Yes.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E., called and examined.

4699. Chairman: Are you Chief Officer of the Mental Hospitals Department of the London County Council?—Yes.

4700. Have you been authorised to attend before this Royal Commission for the purpose of giving us evidence on matters falling within your particular province?—Yes, evidence limited to facts.

4701. You are not going to favour us with views upon policy, I understand?—No.

4702. We shall be glad to have from you quite shortly a description of how the local authorities in this country come into contact with lunacy administration?—In the first place, the local authority under the Lunacy Act is the council of every administrative county and county borough, and it is constituted under the Local Government Act of 1888. There are certain boroughs, 28 in number, that have their own special authority under the Lunacy Act.

4703. In the case of the City of London, I think it is the Common Council?—In the case of the City of London it is the Common Council. The Lunacy Act also provides that the local authority is to appoint a visiting committee consisting of not less than seven members for every asylum. Then there is a provision for visiting committees of asylums which belong to more than one authority. In the case of a local authority having more than one asylum, it is allowed to appoint one committee for the management and control of all the asylums, and the committee appointed has power to appoint a sub-committee for each separate asylum, delegating to the sub-committee such powers and duties as the committee from time to time think fit.

4704. One is anxious to see the points on which the local authority which is the general administrative authority of the district comes in contact with the lunacy administration. You say one of their duties is the duty of appointing committees, which varies according to the particular case?—Yes.

4705. Is the purpose of the visiting committee to bring the local authority as the representative body of the district into contact with the administration of the lunacy laws within its area?—Yes.

4706. I do not think we need consider the position under the Mental Deficiency Act, because that is excluded from our consideration. But in the case of the London County Council under the powers given by Statute, and by authorisation of the Home Secretary, I think the Committee appointed for mental deficiency work is also the visiting committee for the purposes of the Lunacy Act?—Might I say that in a sense the Mental Deficiency Act does help you, because the committee that is appointed under that Act may also be the Lunacy visiting committee, and it is important in this way, that the power under the Mental Deficiency Act is to appoint the committee with co-opted members, and if that visiting committee becomes the visiting committee under the Lunacy Act, as it may under section 28, it has co-opted members, some of whom are women.

4707. In that way you mean you can get your visiting committee to contain co-opted members?—Yes, that is important. It is section 28 of the Mental Deficiency Act.

4708. Where does one find the provision whereby the committee for the purposes of the Mental Deficiency Act may become the visiting committee for the purposes of the Lunacy Act?—Section 66.

4709. Consequently, by invoking the provisions of the Mental Deficiency Act, you may get your visiting committee under the Lunacy Act to have co-opted 4698. That is accessible to us, and if necessary we can refer to it, and you approve generally of their policy?—Yes.

Chairman: Thank you very much.

members?—Yes; the London County Council took advantage of that before obtaining special powers to take over the duties of the visiting committee.

4710. Why did it do that—what was the advantage of it?—It enabled it to get sufficient members to carry out the work under the Mental Deficiency Act and the Lunacy Acts.

4711. It had the advantage of obtaining persons who had a special interest in that particular department of work?—That is so.

4712. Are there any co-opted members in the case of the London Committee?—There are ten co-opted members.

4713. And they visit the public asylums, of course?—They do.

4714. I think some of the areas in England have special Acts dealing with them?—Yes, there are three, I think: the Lancashire Asylums Board, the West Riding Mental Hospitals Board, and more recently the County of Stafford has a special Act appointing a Mental Hospitals Board.

4715. There is a peculiarity, I think, in the case of the London County Council that the executive authority obtained in 1915 all the powers of a visiting committee under the Lunacy Act, and they have been transferred to the County Council itself?—That is so.

4716. And all matters relating to the exercise by the Council of the powers so transferred stand referred to the Committee for the care of the Mentally Defective, as you have explained?—Yes.

4717. Is the result this, therefore, that the County Council of London, having all the powers of the visiting committee, must exercise those powers through the medium of some committee of its members?—That is what it comes to; all matters stand referred to the Committee appointed under the Act, which we know as the Mental Hospitals Committee.

4718. But taking certain things which can be done under the Statute by the visiting committee, are those performed formally by the London County Council as a body, but in practice through the medium of the Committee?—In practice the powers are delegated; there is very full delegation to the Committee.

4719. In the case generally, apart from the speciality of London to which you have alluded, will you give us an outline of the powers and duties of a local authority and visiting committee with reference to lunacy administration?—Yes. In the first place the local authority, that is the council, has to provide accommodation for the insane, and it has power to provide for private as well as pauper patients. They may provide separate asylums for the pauper and private patients, or make provision in the same asylum, and they have power to provide separate asylums for idiots or patients suffering from any particular class of mental disorder. But the local authority again, under the Lunacy Act, Section 239, is required to exercise its powers in regard to providing this accommodation by a visiting committee, subject, if it thinks fit, to its directions as to which of the methods authorised by the Act shall be adopted. Then the committee which has this authority may agree upon plans and estimates, and contract for the purchase of lands and buildings, and for the erection, restoration, enlargement and furnishing of buildings, and for the supply of clothing, and for all matters necessary for carrying into effect the authority conferred upon them to provide accommodation.

4720. To pause there for a moment, before going to the machinery by which they exercise those powers, is it an obligation upon the local authorities of this country to see that adequate provision is made in a district or in co-operation with other districts for the care of cases of mental illness?—There is no doubt about it being an obligation on the local authority, as there is a provision in the Act for the Secretary of State to step in if the local authority fails to provide the necessary accommodation.

4721. But there is a general statutory obligation on the local authorities to see that adequate provision is made throughout the country for dealing with mental cases?—That is so. I ought to say that it is only for pauper patients, because it is not obligatory to provide for private patients—it is permissive.

4722. With regard to that, of course, having the means, the demand creates the supply within the limits we know of. But that is the general obligation as far as the local government of this country is concerned?—Yes.

4723. Take, for example, a question which occurs to one, following on previous evidence—suppose an institution is rather antiquated, and suppose that the medical superintendent says he would like to have structural improvements carried out for the purpose of enabling him to deal with his patients in a more up-to-date way, to whom would he address his recommendations?—In the first place, I should think he would address his recommendations to the visiting committee. Some visiting committees might have power to carry out the alteration, provided that the cost was not prohibitive, or if it were a very small alteration it might be done under a provision which allows a visiting committee to spend not more than £400 a year in alterations. But there is also another provision in the Act for a building and repairs fund. This is a fund to which excess profits on certain patients—private patients and patients from other counties—are put, and I know that in some counties they have this fund. In the case of the London County Council the money is always paid over to the county council by the visiting committee, and the London County Council, being the visiting committee, has full charge of any such improvements. But in the ordinary way, if the sum is more than a few hundred pounds, it would be necessary for the county authority or the local authority to vote the money, and the visiting committee would, no doubt, make recommendations to them.

4724. One looks at it from the point of view of the responsibility of the local authority to meet requirements, and then from the point of view of persons interested in lunacy, more particularly the medical superintendent—whom should he set in motion? It would really mean that the visiting committee would be the first persons approached, but they might have to carry the matter further for the necessary authority, if it was a large expenditure?—Yes, that is so—of course, the visiting committee might not have funds; the only fund they would have would be the £400 a year, which is of course a very small sum to carry out any alterations—and the amount they have in their building and repairs fund.

4725. One so often wants to know in public administration who is the body really responsible. Suppose it was felt on all hands that a particular institution was so antiquated or so imperfect in its methods that it ought to be replaced by a more modern institution, who would be the body responsible, or on whom would lie the duty of modernising or rebuilding?—In the first place, the visiting committee would be responsible, and if the visiting committee made representations to the local authority, and the local authority did not act on them, the local authority would take the responsibility.

4726. They would be answerable?—Yes.

4727. You were speaking as to the actual machinery provided by the Act for dealing with plans and estimates, and so on, for accommodation, and I think we had got to the point that any plans and contracts under consideration could only be provisional, except on the approval of the Minister of Health?—Yes, that is so—that is on the recommendation to the Minister of Health by the Board of Control.

4728. The Board of Control is the first body to whom the plans are submitted, and they pass them on to the Minister of Health?—Yes.

4729. That is provided for by Section 254, subsection (2) of the Act of 1890, as amended by the Order made pursuant to the Ministry of Health Act, 1919. In addition to the submission of plans and contracts to the Board of Control and then to the Minister of Health, what else is necessary?—The approval of the local authority itself is necessary, if the sum to be expended is more than has been already authorised by the local authority.

4730. Then a matter we may note is that the visiting committee also have responsibility for providing for the burial of patients who may die in the institution?—Yes; they have the power to provide burial grounds for the patients, or to make arrangements otherwise by contracting with the ordinary cemetery authorities of the neighbourhood.

4731. That is not merely for the patients, I think, but also for the officers?—Yes, for the officers of the institution as well.

4732. Then may they order all necessary repairs?—Yes.

4733. And you have already explained about the £400 limit?—That is for additions and alterations; but ordinary and necessary repairs may be ordered to any extent, and the committee is authorised to make an order for the payment of any expenses so incurred upon the treasurer of the local authority, and the treasurer is bound to pay the amount mentioned in the order.

4734. You have told us of the relation of the local authority to lunacy administration, first of all in the matter of the appointment of the visiting committee; then in regard to the provision of accommodation and the responsibility of upkeep of the institution. Do we next find the local authority concerned with the staff of the asylum?—Yes.

4735. What is their function in that relation?—It is the duty of the visiting committee to appoint the staff of the asylum, and to fix their salaries, wages and remuneration, and they are required by the Lunacy Act to appoint a chaplain, who must be a priest in orders, a medical officer, a superintendent, or, if there is more than one division of the asylum, a superintendent of each division, who is to be the resident medical officer, or one of the resident medical officers of the asylum or the division of which he is appointed superintendent, unless the Ministry of Health authorise the committee to appoint some other person than a medical officer to be a superintendent. They also have to appoint a clerk of the asylum, and a treasurer, and they may appoint a minister of any religious persuasion to attend patients of the religious persuasion to which the minister belongs. They may also appoint visiting physicians or surgeons.

4736. That is under section 276?—That is under section 276.

4737. So that they really seem to be responsible for the staffing of the institution?—Yes, for the whole of the staff. There are some officers they must appoint, and those I have given you.

4738. Some are discretionary?—Some are discretionary.

4739. And they have the responsibility of fixing salaries, wages and remuneration?—Yes.

4740. Then you tell us of the duties of the visiting committee regarding the patients personally who are in institutions?—Yes. One of the duties of the visiting committee, or at any rate of members of the visiting committee, is to make a visit every two months at least to inspect every part of the asylum and see every patient, so as to afford full opportunity of complaint, and to examine the order and certificates for admission of every patient admitted since the last time a visitation was made, and they have to enter in the visitors' book any remarks they think proper with regard to the condition and management of the asylum and patients, and to sign the book on every visit.

19 November, 1924.]

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E.

4741. That is under section 188?—Yes.

4742. Is that duty imposed upon them for the purpose of keeping the patients in touch with the outside responsible authority?—I think one must assume that is so.

4743. Then is the visiting committee of the local authority again associated with the matter of discharge?—That is so.

4744. In what way?—The majority of patients in a county or borough asylum are either wholly chargeable or partly chargeable to a parish or union. The Act, as the Commission knows, refers to these patients as paupers, and patients who are not so chargeable are private patients. A private patient can be discharged if the person on whose petition the reception order was made so directs in writing. If there is no petitioner, as in the case of a patient admitted as a pauper patient, and who has afterwards been classified as a private patient, then the person who made the last payment may discharge, or the husband or wife, or failing there being a husband or wife, then other relatives named in section 72 of the Lunacy Act. If there is no person qualified or willing to direct the discharge of a private patient, the Commissioners of the Board of Control may order the discharge. Where the patient is ordered to be discharged under this section, and the medical officer of the institution certifies in writing that the patient is dangerous and unfit to be at large, with the grounds for his certificate, then the order is of no effect unless two of the visitors of the asylum consent in writing to the patient's discharge.

4745. That is the barring certificate we have heard of?—That is the barring certificate. Then the Commissioners of the Board of Control have no power to discharge a pauper patient in a county or borough asylum—that duty is cast entirely on the members of the visiting committee, and section 77 of the Lunacy Act provides that any three members may order the discharge of any patient, pauper or private, whether he is recovered or not, and any two visitors, if advised in writing by the medical officer, may order the discharge of any patient detained in the asylum. Then there is a provision in section 79 of the Lunacy Act—and this is a section which is at any rate called very much into use in the London County Mental Hospitals—this section provides that where a friend or relative of a pauper patient confined in the asylum applies to the committee for the patient to be handed over to their custody, any two members of the committee may, if they think fit, discharge the patient on the undertaking of the relative or friend, to the satisfaction of the members, that the patient will be no longer chargeable and will be properly taken care of and prevented from doing injury to himself or others. In the London Mental Hospitals during 1923, 178 patients, 56 men and 122 women, were discharged under the provisions of this section.

4746. You do not utilise that section, I understand, in the case of patients who are fully recovered?—No, there is no necessity to do that.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E., recalled and further examined.

4747. Chairman: Mr. Keene, since we last met, you have been good enough to supply us with two documents, one dealing with the patients' dietary, and the other dealing with the salaries and wages of the officers and servants in your employment?—Yes.

4748. I do not know whether there is anything you wish specially to draw our attention to in connection with these documents. I have read the dietary with much interest. It was apparently instituted as an experimental scale?—Yes; the superintendents reporting every six months as to the result of the new dietary.

4749. How is it working out?—It is working out very well indeed; very satisfactorily.

4750. It provides, I see, for a certain amount of elasticity?—Yes, that is really the object of it; it supersedes the old dietary scale which was based on a per capita allowance, and afforded very little elasticity.

4751. This is much less rigid, and a different provision is made for those who are doing manual work from that for those who are not so engaged?—Yes.

4752. I am interested to see the provision for more green food, which we are told is a very important thing?—Yes, there is provision for the vitamins.

4753. It is really based on a more or less scientific theory of the food value of the diet?—Yes. It was very carefully considered by the medical superintendents of the London mental hospitals, and was put forward by them, and was adopted by the Council on their recommendation.

4754. Then although it was only instituted for six months, an experimental period in 1923, it is still in operation?—It is still in operation.

4755. I see there are one or two variations in manuscript upon it?—Yes.

4756. Have you a farm in connection with your institutions?—We have farms at each of our institutions.

4757. Do they supply the fresh food—dairy produce and vegetables?—They supply milk. We have cows; we keep pigs and poultry, and we have market gardens.

4758. And are you able to supply yourselves entirely with market garden produce from your own farms?—Entirely with green food, but such produce as potatoes we have to buy a certain amount of.

4759. Then as regards the salaries and wages, the scales are evidently somewhat complicated, to judge from this paper which you have handed us?—It refers to a very large number of grades of staff.

4760. It is all on the principle of a basic scale with bonus additions?—Yes.

4761. That, of course, always complicates matters a little. Then at the different institutions you have different staffs, dependent I suppose, upon the size and character of the institution?—The salaries of some of the officers at the smaller institutions are less than those of the officers at the larger ones.

4762. Each institution has certain officers of its own with separate salaries of their own?—That does not happen very often. I think it only refers to some of the chief officers. The medical superintendent of a small institution would not get the salary of a medical superintendent of the largest institution.

4763. Naturally; and similarly with regard to the other superior officers I notice there are different rates of pay for officers of the same standing?—Yes.

4764. But when one comes down to the people perhaps most important for our purpose, the actual attendants—is your scale uniform for them?—The pay of male and female nurses is the same at all the institutions.

4765. That is naturally a part of your table which is of most interest to us, because we have to consider whether the remuneration of these attendants is adequate to attract a good class of officer?—Yes.

4766. And also whether there are prospects in their work which are likely to encourage them to remain?—Yes.

4767. I think you have a rising scale of remuneration, have you not, according to the period of service?—The probationer nurse at the present time has an increase on passing an examination of the Medico-Psychological Association.

4768. One finds that on page 7, I think—is it 4s. a week extra?—You find that first of all on page 4—the nursing staff.

4769. Yes, I beg your pardon. So that there is some pecuniary inducement to the staff to improve their qualifications?—The male probationer nurse starts at 34s., and there is an increment of 3s. a week on passing each of the two examinations of the Medico-Psychological Association. That makes a total of 6s. The period during which they have to prepare and sit for this examination is about 3 years. When they get the diploma they become staff nurses and receive 40s. a week, and they have then four increments of 3s. a week a year, and one of 2s., which brings them up to 54s. a week.* These scales are inclusive. Out of that the members of the staff have to pay for their board, lodging and washing. The charges are given on page 4.

4770. Then I suppose they have prospects of promotion to the higher grades, have they?—They have prospects of promotion to the position of charge nurse, and special charge nurse—head nurse; and male attendants may become inspectors. There is only one inspector at each institution. The women nurses may rise to the position of assistant matron or matron, and much has been done recently to encourage the women nurses to go to general hospitals for training, so that they have that experience which would make them much more fitted for the higher positions on the nursing staff.

4771. That is alluded to in the recent report, I see, as being a desirable feature?—Yes.

4772. Then may one say that there is a career offered in your institutions for those who show efficiency?—There is no doubt about that.

4773. Are the scales of wages subject to adjustment by any Board, representative of the employees of the Council?—Not with the London County Council. Outside the Council there is a Mental Hospitals Association which, I believe, negotiates with the Asylum Workers' Union; but the Mental Hospitals' Committee is in close touch with representatives of the National Asylum Workers' Union, and we always negotiate with them on any question of rates of pay for the nursing staff.

4774. One is familiar with this that in some of the departments of the London County Council wages are adjusted by a Conciliation Board, are they not?—Yes.

4775. But you do not have that formality in your department?—We do not have that formality with the nursing staff.

4776. But you are in touch with the representatives of the Association?—We are in frequent negotiation with the National Asylum Workers' Union representatives. As a matter of fact we have followed very closely the arrangement come to between the Mental Hospitals Association, which represents many of the Lunacy Authorities in England and Wales, and the National Asylum Workers' Union.

4777. Then you have given us the scale with regard to the male nurses; I think we find on page 6 the corresponding information with regard to the female nurses. We find item 87, "nurse probationer." There are certain manuscript alterations on the print?—Yes.

4778. They appear to start at 27s. 3d.?—Yes.

4779. Then they also have an inducement to obtain qualifications?—Yes, they get 3s. on passing the first examination, and another 3s. on passing the final examination.

4780. That is the same as the men?—Yes. Then when they become staff nurses they have 33s. 3d., and they can rise to 43s. 11d. by four increments of 2s. 5d. each, and one of 1s.

4781. Then similarly in their case one observes various higher grades with better remuneration and better conditions of employment, which are held out to them should they prove satisfactory; rising, I suppose, to the post of matron?—Yes.

* Note.—At the present time the male nursing staff receive in addition war wages of 17s. 6d. a week and the female nursing staff of 12s. a week.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E.

4782. I think that gives us information which will be of great use to us. We might now resume the general evidence you were giving us; and we had reached this stage. You have, I think, given us some information regarding the discharge of patients, and in that connection you might tell us to what extent you avail yourselves of the power to allow patients out on trial?—It is the usual practice in the London County Mental Hospitals for patients before being discharged as recovered to be allowed out on trial under the provisions of section 55 of the Lunacy Act. The authority is given by two members of the committee on the advice of the medical officer. A money allowance is given where necessary, and the usual period of trial is four weeks. This affords an opportunity of ascertaining whether the patient's mental condition has sufficiently improved to allow of him resuming his normal life and activities.

4783. Then do you find that as a result of the trial period a considerable number of patients do not require to return to your institutions?—They only require to return to be discharged. Usually they make an appearance and see the committee; the committee hear from the friends who have taken them out how the patient has behaved, and the order for discharge is then signed.

4784. Do you get a medical certificate from the medical practitioner who is attending the case at that stage?—At times, where there is any difficulty in the patient returning, a medical certificate from the practitioner who has been looking after the patient is accepted; but the members of the committee encourage the patients to come back, because they are anxious to know that they have been doing well.

4785. Is the trial sometimes a failure?—Yes, at times, patients are brought back before the period elapses.

4786. But on the whole do you find that the trial period is a valuable interregnum, so to speak, between residence in the asylum and complete restoration to normal life?—It is most valuable.

4787. During the period of trial the patient, of course, remains certificated?—Yes.

4788. And is therefore under the control of the asylum authority?—Yes.

4789. And can be taken back at any moment if necessity requires?—That is so.

4790. Now in the case of private patients, there is some difference in procedure, as we know; and in particular there is a requirement that at the end of the first month of the patient's residence in the institution a formal report shall be made to the Board of Control, what we call the month end report?—Yes. We have some private patients in the London mental hospitals, and we are required to carry out the Commissioners' desires. The report of the medical officer is sent to the visiting committee, and one or more members will see the patient and report on the condition of the patient.

4791. So that a special visit follows upon the lodging of that report with the Board of Control?—The members would see the patient, but in practice the Commissioners themselves do not visit for the purpose of examining the patient. They can do so under the provisions of the Act.

4792. But the work is actually done by the visiting committee?—Yes.

4793. May one regard that as a real investigation of what I may call the merits of the case?—The members who see the patient would satisfy themselves that the patient is a person who is proper to be detained. However, that only affects quite a small number of the patients with us.

4794. It would be interesting if you gave us some statistical information as to the number of re-admissions?—I thought this information would perhaps be very interesting to the Royal Commission. Statistics were started in 1895, and as the London County mental hospitals have so very many of the lunatic population of England I think the figures are rather valuable. 3,153 patients—that is, 1,382 men and

1,771 women—were admitted to the London mental hospitals during 1923.

4795. Are those new admissions?—Those are new admissions.

4796. Would it include those who are re-admitted on a relapse?—Yes.

4797. Those are persons who have entered or re-entered the institutions in that year?—They would come in on new certificates. It would not include patients transferred from one institution to another; they are all newly certified cases.

4798. Now of those admissions how many were discharged recovered in the course of the year?—The recoveries for the year 1923 were 348 men and 533 women.

4799. Let us just pause there a moment. That looks as if about a quarter recovered within the year of those who entered in that year?—881 is the total number of recoveries for 1923, and would include patients admitted prior to 1923.

4800. Then you have kept track of your patients in order to see which of them are re-admission cases?—Yes. In 29 years 30,718 patients were discharged recovered, and 9,177 of these patients, that is 29·87 per cent. were re-admitted at some time or other to one of the London mental hospitals. 3,375, or 10·98 per cent. were re-admitted within 12 months of their discharge. We cannot follow all those cases. Some of them may be admitted to institutions outside our ken.

4801. That just occurred to me, that you cannot keep track of them all, because some of those patients may after discharge be removed into another area, and may have been admitted to an institution elsewhere?—That is so.

4802. Then you have a system of re-classifying patients after admission; that is to say, patients who come to you as paupers may become private patients?—Yes; that is under Section 3 of the Lunacy Act, 1891, which provides that a lunatic who is sent to an institution for lunatics, under Sections 13 or 16 of the 1890 Act shall be classified as a pauper patient. Those sections I think the members of the Commission will remember are the sections dealing with patients admitted on summary reception orders, that is a patient not under proper care and control, a patient who is admitted as a pauper and a patient wandering at large. All these patients are to be classified as paupers until it is ascertained that they are entitled to be classified as private patients. For many years the London County Council has caused special enquiries to be made, with a view to ascertaining whether the patients or their friends have sufficient means to pay the full cost of maintenance; and where this can be arranged and payment is made direct to the Council, the patient is classified as a private patient, and, consequently, has such advantages as to discharge which the Lunacy Act provides for private patients. At the present time we have just over 300 patients on the private list.

4803. Some of those will have been originally admitted as private patients; others will have been re-classified as private patients?—All these patients are on summary reception orders.

4804. All admitted as paupers?—Yes. It may interest you to know this: All these 308 patients were admitted on summary reception orders. 274 of them were admitted as patients in receipt of relief, 27 as not under proper care and control, and 7 as wandering at large; but as a result of our inquiries we found that friends were able to pay, or the patient himself or herself had sufficient means to allow of the charge for maintenance being paid direct to the institution.

4805. Now as regards the treatment of such patients, is there any differentiation between them and the pauper patient who remains a pauper patient?—There is no differentiation except that patients on the private list are permitted to wear their own outer clothing, but I should at once say that even with the patients who are chargeable to the parish permission is given, where it is deemed advisable, for the patients to wear their own clothing.

4806. So that that is not necessarily a differentia between the two cases?—No.

4807. Are there any privileges that they have?—The only privileges are those accorded by the Lunacy Act, that is to say, the person who made the last payment or a near relative can discharge the patient.

4808. That is only in the matter of the machinery of discharge?—Yes.

4809. I was thinking of their treatment while they are in the institution. Is there any difference in their treatment?—No; the charge is exactly the same as would be made for a patient chargeable to the parish.

4810. So that the benefit is really a benefit to the ratepayer rather than to the patient?—It may be a benefit to the individual. I think the relatives appreciate that the patient has not been classified as a pauper, which is very distasteful to many people.

4811. Earl Russell: I did not understand that last answer. Do you mean that they pay no more than the guardians pay for a pauper patient?—They are not bound to pay any more than the guardians pay.

4812. Chairman: So that they are not really a source of revenue to your institution?—No, they are not a source of revenue.

4813. There is no profit on them, if one may put it so?—The present rate is 24s., and if that sum is paid, it is the duty of the Council to put that patient on the private list. That 24s. does not include any capital charges, or costs of upkeep; it only includes the cost of maintenance, and if the amount which is usually paid by boards of guardians is paid to the Council then we are bound to make the patient a private patient. The amount is 24s. 6d. a week.

4814. It would rather appear as if the chief advantage, which a patient derived from transfer from the pauper class to the private class, was first what we may call the sentimental advantage of being no longer regarded as a pauper, and, secondly, the special provisions with regard to the discharge of such patients?—Yes.

4815. The person who has made the last payment is treated as the petitioner is treated in the case of a private patient, and may call for the discharge of that patient?—Yes, that is so.

4816. I would like to ask you a question about a topic that is a little outside your précis. You spoke of those cases that are transferred because it is found that the patient has means. How is it ascertained whether a patient has or has not means; whose duty is it to investigate their financial position?—We endeavour to get as much information as we can from the board of guardians, and the majority of the boards of guardians will let us know if a patient has means of his own.

4817. Has the board of guardians naturally an interest to see that, if a patient has means, those means are applied to his upkeep?—That is so.

4818. Because every patient who is discovered to have means, and who can pay for his own upkeep pro tanto relieves the rates?—That is so.

4819. Therefore there is an interest, and probably a duty also upon the board of guardians to investigate the financial position of cases in your hands, to see whether or not they ought to be chargeable to public moneys?—Yes.

4820. And if they ascertain there is money available for the maintenance of the particular patient, they apprise you of the fact?—The majority of the boards do, and then we get information sometimes from patients themselves, and the friends of patients will perhaps at times give us information by asking that certain documents may be signed; that gives us information that the patient has means, and we at once proceed to make enquiries to establish the fact whether these patients are able to pay the full charge.

4821. One is a little impressed with the absence of machinery for ascertaining the property or the financial position of patients, either private or pauper patients. I see in the case of pauper patients there is a duty upon the board of guardians to investigate that matter, but do you concern yourselves, apart from that circumstance, with the property of your patients at all?—No, it is only for one purpose; that is, for the purpose of the provision in section 3 of the Lunacy Act of 1891. The Council years ago had an action brought against it, and, as a consequence, we have taken very great care to see that all patients who are entitled to be classified as private patients are so classified.

4822. But beyond that you really have no interest in their property?—We have no interest.

4823. Then we might just get on the note one or two formal matters. The visiting committee have a duty under section 275 to prepare general rules for the government of the asylum?—Yes.

4824. And these require the approval of the Minister of Health?—On the recommendation of the Board of Control.

4825. Then in turn the visiting committee also make regulations which we may call the bye-laws, really, I suppose, for the governance of their institution?—An amplification of the general rules.

4826. Dealing with more detailed matters?—Yes.

4827. It would be rather interesting if you could furnish us with a copy of the general rules and regulations applicable to one of your institutions, at any rate; and of the general rules which you have adopted.—I can furnish you with a copy of the general rules which have recently been approved by the Minister of Health. The regulations approved in 1906 are somewhat out of date. There have been many changes, and they are at present under revision. Shall I hand that in?

4828. If you please. (The general rules were handed in.) These are dated in 1923, I see, but you are in course of revising your regulations at present, are you?—That is so.

4829. Then the visiting committee also have to determine the diet of the patients; and you have given us, in the print that you have handed in, the regulations which have been approved on that subject, and which are at present in operation?—Yes.

4830. Then the committee have also to fix the weekly sum to be charged to the parish or county responsible for the maintenance of each pauper lunatic?—Yes; that, as I have explained, is 24s. 6d. a week at the present time. The expenses of maintenance of the pauper patient are repaid by the guardians of the parish or union to which the patient is chargeable, or by the county, if the patient's chargeability has been adjudicated to the county in the absence of ascertainable settlement.

4831. I do not quite follow the point about the 14s. limit—what is the meaning of that? You tell us that if the charge exceeds 14s. a week the local authority is required to order such addition to the weekly sum as seems necessary. What is the meaning of that?—Before the war the cost of maintenance in county lunatic asylums was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 10s. or 11s. a week. The cost of living of course has increased very much, and alterations have been made in the pay of officers and servants, and expenses are very much heavier; but this provision no doubt was placed in the Lunacy Act to provide that the local authority should have something to say if the expenses of maintenance went beyond a certain figure, so that if the cost of maintenance was more than 14s. the committee have to go to the County Council and get approval.

4832. Does that mean that up to 14s. they have a free hand?—They have a free hand.

4833. But if they proposed to exceed 14s. a week then they had to get a special sanction from the local authority?—Yes.

4834. The general authority extended to 14s., but special authority was required for any sums above?—Yes.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E.

4835. Is that statutory?—That is statutory; I take it that every county authority now is approving the weekly rate fixed by its visiting committees.

4836. Of course, as you told us, in London it is 10s. above that datum line of 14s.?—Yes. It has been considerably higher.

4837. Is it tending to come down a little now?—It is about stationary now.

4838. Hitherto I think you have been giving us an account of the duties cast upon the visiting committee by the Lunacy Acts generally, but in the case of the London County Council there is, is there not, special legislation applicable to it?—That is so.

4839. And these duties of the visiting committee have been transferred to the Council itself?—Yes.

4840. Then does the machinery which is in operation consist firstly of a Mental Hospitals Committee of the County Council?—The Mental Hospitals Committee is the statutory committee appointed by the Council.

4841. That consists, does it not, of 35 members, of whom nine are women?—That is so.

4842. Ten being co-opted?—Yes.

4843. And are the women introduced through the medium of the co-optation?—Some of the women members are members of the Council itself.

4844. Then that same committee is responsible for the carrying out of the duties of the Council under the Mental Deficiency Act of 1913?—Yes.

4845. I am going to ask you a little later to be good enough to give us copies of the special statutes applicable to London that deal with these matters, either the sections if they are contained in omnibus Acts, which they probably will be, or the Acts themselves if they relate specially to the lunacy. I would like to see this private legislation. You also have special legislation authorising you to receive boarders. One wants to know to what extent you differ from the general code, and what special powers you have, so that we may study these and see whether they are in advance of the general law; because very often in private Acts, as one knows, you see the forerunner of general legislation?—I can hand in the London County Council (General Powers) Act of 1915, which contains these provisions. (Handing in the same.)

4846. May I take it that this statute of 1915 contains all of what I may call the specialties of London county?—It contains all the specialties with regard to the powers of the Visiting Committee and the Committee itself; it does not deal with the special powers we have at the Maudsley Hospital.

4847. When we come to that perhaps you will be good enough to hand that in also?—Yes.

4848. Now in the case of London you have some statistics to give us?—Yes. On the 1st January this year, there were 18,918 patients, 7,728 males, and 11,190 females, for whom the London County Council had to provide accommodation. Of these the majority were chargeable to parishes or to the county. 1,063 (861 males and 202 females) were private list cases, and 120 were women patients admitted as private patients for whom special provision has been made at the Horton Mental Hospital. There were also 40 private male patients at Claybury Hall. Claybury Hall is an annexe of Claybury Mental Hospital: Included in the private list cases were ex-service men, the charge for whose maintenance is paid by the State.

4849. That is rather interesting. If the State pays for an ex-service man's maintenance the ex-service man is then transferred to the private list?—Ipso facto he becomes a private patient. A private patient is one who is not a pauper—that is the definition in the Act.

4850. This class is rather different from those cases in which the patients are transferred from the pauper list to the private list in consequence of the patients themselves having means. In this case the means are provided by the State?—Yes. In fact a criminal lunatic (we have some of those) whose maintenance is paid by the State is a private patient, because he is not a pauper.

4851. It seems rather anomalous, does it not?—Yes.

4852. Then as regards the accommodation which you possess, you have nine mental hospitals, and I do not think you need recite the list here of the accommodation?—The total accommodation is 8,300 beds for men, and 11,042 for women, a total of 19,342. Then in addition there is the colony for epileptics, which at present is leased to the Ministry of Pensions, where they take their neurasthenic cases. We also have the Maudsley hospital with 157 beds.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Would this be a convenient place to ask Mr. Keene to clear up the question as to any overlapping there may be between the London County Council and the Middlesex County Council?

Chairman: I think it would, Sir Humphry, if you would be good enough to ask the witness any question arising out of that. We are to have a Middlesex witness later in the day.

4853. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Yes. (To the Witness): Of course all London is not confined to Middlesex, but when you speak of the majority chargeable to the parishes, or to the county, I do not know whether the words "the county" mean Middlesex, or whether they mean any county?—It means the County of London. It comes to this, that there are certain people who come into our hospitals who are prima facie chargeable to a parish or a union. We get a number of foreigners in London and, first of all, they are chargeable to the parish where they are found. That parish seeks to get rid of the chargeability. If we cannot find that the patient is chargeable to any other parish in England or Wales, then the patient is made chargeable by notice given by the guardians to the County Council.

4854. Earl Russell: Is that provision peculiar to London?—No, it applies everywhere.

Earl Russell: I understood every pauper had to have a settlement in a parish.

Chairman: He must, I should have imagined, unless he was an alien.

Earl Russell: If there was difficulty about it, there were means of giving him an ascertainable settlement.

Mr. Snell: After three years, is it not?

Chairman: Three years to acquire a settlement, but if a pauper is found, so to speak, at large in any area, is he not primarily chargeable to that area?

Earl Russell: Primarily to that union, until they can plant him on some other.

4854A. Chairman: But, of course, he may have no legal settlement. If he has been born abroad, let us say, or has not acquired a settlement by the necessary three years' residence, then the union to which he becomes chargeable will not be able to shift the burden on to any other union.

Witness: That is so.

4855. Earl Russell: If he were an ordinary pauper resident in the workhouse would he be chargeable to the local rates, or to the county?—I think he would have to remain chargeable to the local rates.

Earl Russell: That is what I thought.

4856. Chairman: There are cases undoubtedly where the settlement is unascertainable?—That is so.

Chairman: Wherever they become chargeable, so to speak, they remain chargeable without any relief against any other local authority.

Earl Russell: I just put to Mr. Keene the analogy of a non-lunatic pauper.

Witness: They say they cannot get rid of his settlement; but a person who becomes a lunatic is chargeable for the time being to the union or parish where he became a lunatic, wherever he was at the time, and the guardians would seek to put the chargeability on any union or parish which ought to bear the chargeability.

4857. Chairman: Is not that just the same in the case of ordinary poor law relief?—I cannot say. If there is no proper settlement, or ascertainable settlement elsewhere, and the patient has not got a chargeability to the union, then the guardians through their officers give notice to the County Council, and unless the Council can resist the application before a justice of the peace, the patient becomes chargeable to the County of London.

Chairman: I think we may help you and ourselves on this point by referring to Section 290 of the Act. There does seem to be, as the Secretary reminds me, a special statutory provision which governs this. The side note is "If settlement cannot be ascertained a pauper lunatic may be made chargeable to a borough or county." That probably is the answer to our difficulty.

Earl Russell: Yes, that is the section it arises under. In the case of an ordinary pauper it would lie where it fell.

Witness: We have 478 patients chargeable to the County of London, and all these cases have been adjudicated.

4858. Chairman: On Sir Humphry's point as to overlapping among the county authorities—does any difficulty arise in that way as between the County of Middlesex and the London County Council?—I do not quite follow in what way you mean.

4859. If you take the Middlesex County Council, that is a separate local authority, I suppose, with its own duties?—Yes.

4860. Is it quite distinct from the London County Council?—Quite distinct.

4861. And are its patients drawn from different areas?—All the patients who are properly receivable in the London county mental hospitals come from the union or parishes within the County of London; and the Middlesex County would only receive in its institutions patients from the parishes or unions which form the County of Middlesex.

4862. Just follow that a little further. Suppose you found as a result of investigation that a particular person received into one of your asylums is really chargeable to another county, do you then have that patient transferred to that other county's care, or do you merely obtain repayment of your outlays from that other county?—It depends. In most cases the guardians of the parish, to whom the patient is made chargeable, would apply for the patient to be removed to the asylum which is the proper asylum for patients of that union to go to. We have quite a number of cases in the London mental hospitals of patients who have been living in London for some time; they have become pauper lunatics, and when the question of settlement has been gone into it has been found that their settlement might be right away in the north, or, at any rate, quite a distance from London.

4863. Possibly in Scotland?—We cannot send patients to Scotland, or to Ireland. Frequently the friends of the patient, on hearing that there is a possibility of the patient being transferred from London to a distant asylum, make application to us that the patient may remain there, and that is frequently acceded to, if the guardians to whom the patient is chargeable raise no objection. They might have to pay more for the patient in London than they would in some remote place.

4864. I could imagine the converse case also, that the relatives in the north of England, let us say, whose relation had become chargeable in London, a pauper lunatic in London, might wish to have him transferred to their own neighbourhood for the purpose of being able to visit him easily and see him from time to time. Does that occur?—There may be some cases, but the majority are the other way about.

4865. Pursuing the system on which the London County Council works, we first have the general committee, the constitution of which you have explained, the Mental Hospitals Committee, and then there is a standing sub-committee, is there not, for each of the nine hospitals you have enumerated?—Yes; it consists of at least five members. Usually we have eight members on the sub-committees.

4866. What are their functions?—The sub-committees exercise powers delegated by the Mental Hospitals Committee for the government of these hospitals. The sub-committees of the large hospitals meet usually once a fortnight. At a meeting held once in four weeks the ordinary business of the hospital is conducted, and at the intervening meeting the business consists of discharging patients, interviewing applicants for discharge of patients, and visiting the patients in the wards. It might help you, Sir, if I handed in the Orders of Reference to the standing sub-committees; that would complete the arrangements which are dealt with under the General Powers Act.

4867. Yes, we should like to have that. (The same was handed in.) This gives you the general scheme of the duties?—Yes, the references to the sub-committees.

4868. That will be very useful. Is there any official record kept of these fortnightly meetings?—Yes, minutes are kept.

4869. And are the meetings of the sub-committees held at the hospitals themselves?—At the hospitals themselves.

4870. Do they then interview patients?—Yes.

4871. Is any record kept of those interviews between the visiting committees and the patients?—The visiting of the patients is recorded in the visitors' book. The members who visit would say that they had visited such and such wards and seen the patients, and they would make any comments that they had to make.

4872. Supposing I wanted to know in a particular case whether a patient had or had not been seen by a visiting committee, if I consulted the books kept at the asylum should I find whether that particular patient had or had not had an interview?—I think not.

4873. I am thinking of the case of a patient who had some complaint to make and brought it before the visiting committee on the occasion of one of their visits. Would any record be kept that such a complaint had been made, and what was done upon it?—If a patient attended before the sub-committee and made a complaint there would be a minute of it; but if a patient were seen during the visit of the members to the wards there would be no record of it, except any record that the medical officer might keep in his case book. He might think it advisable to make a note that the patient had spoken to members visiting the wards.

4874. Then you distinguish between an interview which takes place formally between the visiting sub-committee and the patient, and what may be a more or less casual conversation taking place while the committee is going through the wards?—Yes; in one case it takes place at the meeting of the committee and is properly minuted; in the other case it would be not a meeting of the committee because you would only have members of the committee visiting.

4875. Individually?—Yes.

4876. Earl Russell: You would yourself be present to take the note if it came before the committee?—Yes, that is so.

4877. Chairman: Have you cases of patients making complaints of their treatment to the visiting sub-committee?—Many patients write letters to the committee. The letters are read at each meeting; they are placed before the committee. Some patients are constantly complaining.

4878. What action is taken on such complaints?—If the complaint appears to be one that should be investigated, the members would ask the doctor's views about the patient.

4879. Supposing a complaint were made about treatment by a particular nurse, let us say, a complaint of ill-treatment by an attendant, would the visiting sub-committee investigate the case?—If the complaint appeared to be a genuine complaint, the committee would most certainly investigate.

4880. Have you had in your experience any instances of that sort?—Oh yes.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E.

4881. Have you found that the patients have any difficulty in bringing complaints before you?—None at all.

4882. And do you receive quite a number of them?—Quite a number of complaints.

4883. Some of them, no doubt, will be on the face of them irrational, but others merit investigation?—Quite.

4884. And where they appear to have any foundation do you investigate them?—The medical superintendent would no doubt bring before the committee a complaint of a patient which had any foundation, and the committee would proceed to investigate the complaint.

4885. What I have in my mind, and I think my colleagues have too, is whether patients have means of getting in touch with outside independent persons, independently, that is to say, of the staff in whose hands they are—a very important safeguard as you recognise, I am sure?—Yes.

4886. And one is very anxious to see that there should be no obstacle between the patient and this outside and independent body. Do you find that there is free access as between the patients and the visiting committee who are charged with their welfare?—When the visitors go through the wards the patients have an opportunity of speaking to them.

4887. That is one way?—And handing letters to them which the members can read afterwards.

4888. The visitors, as individuals, pass through, as we know, the whole institution within certain stated times—then do you say the patients can speak to the visitors, or hand them letters?—Yes.

4889. Do they also address letters to you?—Letters are addressed to the members of the visiting committee, and those letters have to be handed to the members unopened.

4890. And are they dealt with then as part of the business of the sub-committee?—Yes; a letter addressed to an individual member would be forwarded to that member.

4891. Unopened?—But a letter addressed to the visiting committee would be placed on the table, and would be opened by members of the visiting committee when they are meeting.

4892. Have you any criticism or suggestion to make with regard to the facilities which exist for a patient making known his troubles to responsible persons distinct from the staff of the institution?—At one or two of the mental hospitals we now have unpaid visitors.

4893. Do you mean persons of philanthropic instincts who want to take up that work?—People who give up time. They have no connection with the visiting committee. They come into the institution, and they go round the wards, and they do what they can to help the patients. Sometimes they visit the homes. It is a sort of liaison between the home of the friends and the patients in the institution.

4894. That, of course, is voluntary effort?—Yes.

4895. I was thinking at the moment of the existing machinery, whether you regard the machinery as adequate, the means available at present for communication between the patients and the outside world?—I do not know that the present system affords sufficient opportunity for all complaints to be carefully investigated by the visiting committee, but I should think that the present arrangement does safeguard the patients.

4896. You see what I am thinking of is this, that the patient is to a certain extent shut off, and must be shut off, of course, from the general community; at the same time it is very desirable that persons so shut off should feel that they have access to some independent body interested in their welfare, who will concern themselves with any complaints or difficulties that they may have. One would have liked your view, as an experienced officer, upon the extent to which that feeling exists, that is to say, whether patients do have a sense that they are not entirely shut off, but have means of access to independent persons who will concern themselves with their affairs? If you do not think that the existing machinery is adequate, one would be very glad to have any suggestions you can make upon that, although I know you are not here really to speak upon policy; but if you have any suggestions, we should welcome them from you as one who has practical knowledge of the working of the code?—My own view is that the present machinery probably is adequate; because these patients are visited by the medical officers of the institution, by the chaplain, and I feel that the medical staff and the chaplain and other visiting ministers would give that opportunity of looking into any question or any complaints that the patients might wish to put forward.

4897. Of course one realises that the success of the system will depend upon the qualities of the superintendent and of the staff, but one has to reckon with the cases which might be less satisfactory; and what one is anxious to know is whether there exist safeguards adequate to enable any person who may be in a less fortunate position, in the hands of a less responsible superintendent or attendants, to make known his grievances. At present I rather seems to me that the visiting committee is the safeguard—I mean the safeguard as distinguished from the staff of the institution, and one is anxious to see that there are no obstacles between the patients and the visiting committee. Do you think there are any?—I think that every patient when the members visit the wards has free access to those visitors, but whether the patient has sufficient opportunity at the visit to make known his complaints is another matter.

4898. Earl Russell: But he would never be denied access to the visiting committee if he asked for it?—He never would; a private patient can demand a private interview. There is that differentiation again between the private patient and the patient chargeable to the parish.

4899. Chairman: We have already had a considerable body of evidence to the effect that the existing legal differences between the positions of the private and of the pauper patient are both undesirable and unnecessary, and that the position of the two ought to be assimilated so far as regards their legal rights. Do you see any reason why the pauper patient should not equally be entitled to demand an interview?—I know no good reason why they should not.

4900. Are the patients made aware by notices that they may write letters to the various authorities—have you notices posted up?—The notices are posted in the wards; but those notices, generally speaking, refer to private patients.

4901. Yes, that is quite true. I do not quite see why a private patient should be told he can write, while a pauper patient is not afforded the same information?—With the pauper patient the letters are perused by the medical staff, and it is within the discretion of the medical officer whether the letters are forwarded or not.

4902. Earl Russell: Except in the case of the official persons, to whom they must go surely?—That I think again refers only to private patients.

4903. Surely not—does it?

4904. Chairman: I think it applies to any patient. I have perhaps taken you a little beyond your immediate province; it is not a matter you have prepared yourself specially to help us upon; therefore I do not want to take you beyond the topics you have come to speak upon, but one is anxious to see that there is no obstacle interposed at all. As Lord Russell has just pointed out there is provision for letters going to certain official persons unopened?—That is so,—I ought to correct what I said. That applies to all patients, but with regard to other letters it is within the discretion of the medical officer to forward a letter if it is written by a private patient.

4905. Mr. Snell: What section is this?—Section 41.

4906. Chairman: However, within your province, comes the question of the consideration of the actual written complaints which are submitted to the sub-committee?—Yes. I might remind you, Sir, that the friends of patients are allowed to visit them very frequently; there is an opportunity of visitation twice a week, and that if the patients have complaints to make they can make them through their friends. We should hear of complaints in that way.

4907. Then, of course, one knows also that the guardians who have patients in your institution are entitled also to come and see the patients who are chargeable to them?—Yes, and many of them do.

4908. But the more opportunities that there are afforded to the patients to feel that they are not segregated, but are in touch with responsible persons outside the institution interested in their welfare the better, one is disposed to think?—Yes.

4909. However we may now resume the general evidence you are giving. Is it the case that in London almost all your patients reach you through the workhouse?—That is so.

4910. That is to say, they come through Section 20?—Yes.

4911. I think you have some figures for 1923 showing us the extent to which that is so?—You have had a certain amount of evidence about this, and I thought you would like to know what is the practice in London.

4912. Yes, we would?—I have figures for the year 1923. There were admitted to the London County mental hospitals 3,152 patients, and of these 2,978 were admitted as paupers in receipt of relief, or in such circumstances as to require relief for their proper care and maintenance; 128 as lunatics wandering at large; 39 as not under proper care and control, or cruelly treated or neglected, and 7 as private patients on petition. That is, of this large number with the exception of the private patients on petition, there were only 39 who had the advantage of two medical certificates and had been dealt with by a specially appointed justice, the judicial authority.

4913. One is struck with the extent to which the workhouse in London is the portal to the asylum?—Yes. I have already told you this morning that out of the 308 patients we have on our private lists 274 came to us in receipt of relief.

4914. There seems to me to be a distinction to be drawn here. You may have a person who is a pauper in the ordinary sense, a sane pauper chargeable to his union, and possibly resident in the workhouse. Such a person may become insane. There is no change in their status, it is merely a change in their state of health?—No. There may be persons also who were visited by the district medical officer who were receiving outdoor relief.

4915. That is one class of person, and in their case the insanity does not bring a new stigma of pauperisation because they are already paupers?—No.

4916. But I take it that far the larger proportion of the 3,152 who came in 1923, would be persons who were not paupers at all, but became paupers as a concomitant of their insanity?—That is so; they were taken to the workhouse as a precaution for their own safety, or for the safety of the public. They received relief, and they became paupers.

4917. They became paupers by virtue of the statute?—By virtue of the statute.

4918. Although up to that time they may have been self-supporting persons?—Yes.

4919. As you are not speaking on policy I will not ask your opinion as to that system?—I am obliged to you.

4920. Then in London has your Council made special provision for chronic and harmless lunatics in premises outside the Metropolis?—The Metropolitan Asylums Board has made this provision. You are aware, Sir, that there is provision in the Act for a certain class of lunatic to be kept in the workhouse.

4921. Yes, Section 24, I think it is?—Yes, Section 24. There must be sufficient accommodation for the lunatic's proper care and treatment, and the lunatic must be a harmless lunatic, and no doubt in the country workhouses you will find a number of these chronic harmless lunatics; but in London the provision of workhouse accommodation for this purpose is undertaken by the Metropolitan Asylums Board.

4923. Now may I take it that in London these special institutions really take the place of the mental ward that one may find attached to a Poor Law infirmary in smaller cases?—Hardly, Sir, I think. The mental wards probably are the wards where you would have the acute cases awaiting removal to the asylum. You might have some of the harmless lunatics in the mental ward, but they might be perhaps with the others.

4924. Then it is merely due to the circumstance that in London, owing to its size, you have a sufficiency of this class to justify the provision of special hospitals for them?—Yes.

4925. Whereas in other areas with smaller populations they may be found mixed with the general poor workhouse population?—What I wanted the Commission to appreciate was this: You asked me a question last week about the responsibility for providing accommodation; the local authority is responsible to provide whatever accommodation is wanted. Now that is dependent to a great extent upon the accommodation provided somewhere else. If there is accommodation in the workhouse for the chronic harmless lunatic, then the local authority, the County Council, has not to provide for so many lunatics; but assuming the workhouse authority does not provide that accommodation, then the county authority is not relieved to that extent, and must provide sufficient accommodation for all classes of lunatics.

4926. Then in the case of those chronic harmless lunatics, I suppose they are mostly patients who would not benefit from the special treatment of an asylum—that is to say, they are hopeless cases, I take it?—Yes. Some cases are sent direct by the justices. If a lunatic is seen by a justice of the peace, and he deems it to be an imbecile case he will send the case direct to the workhouse, or to the Metropolitan Asylums Board institution; but a considerable number of the cases are cases that become chronic with us, and are transferred there under Section 25.

4927. That has the advantage, I suppose, of relieving the asylums of those cases for which little or nothing can be done?—Yes; it does to that extent. I give figures here which show that 24 years ago we had 10,104 certified lunatics in the mental hospitals, and there were 5,566 chronic harmless lunatics in the Metropolitan Asylums Board's institutions, and on the 1st January this year we had 18,000 certified lunatics in our institutions, and the Metropolitan Asylums Board had 5,148.

4928. We have the exact figures, 18,918 in the Council's institutions and 5,148 in the Metropolitan Asylums Board's institutions. What strikes one about that is that while the population of the County Council's mental hospitals is very nearly doubled there is actually a diminution in the number of chronic and harmless lunatics in the Metropolitan Asylums Board's institutions?—Yes.

4929. Does that mean that they are full, or that they are not being used?—That means that we have to provide for more chronic lunatics than we did 24 years ago, and these institutions are also being used for cases of mental deficiency; that reduces the accommodation for the chronic harmless lunatics. It is an example of two authorities dealing with the same class of person.

4930. Then you are prepared, if necessary, to give us some information regarding the Maudsley hospital, but we are going to have a representative from that hospital who will give us all the details necessary; so I do not propose to take you into that matter beyond including in your evidence a note that there is such an institution of a special character. You can, I think, assist us by giving us a reference to the Parliamentary powers which were obtained by the County Council in 1915, enabling the County Council to receive boarders at the Maudsley hospital?—There was a short provision* in the London County Council (Parks, &c.) Act of 1915, by which the Council was authorised to receive as boarders and maintain and treat at the Maudsley hospital on such terms as to payment and otherwise, as it may determine, any person suffering from incipient mental infirmity who is desirous of submitting himself voluntarily for treatment, and to defray the whole or any part of the costs of treatment.

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E.

4931. Can you give us a copy of the Act which contains that?—Yes, I will send one to the Secretary.

4932. I would like to see the exact terms of it. And at Maudsley you have only voluntary patients?—That is so.

4933. Is it a feature again of Maudsley, without going into the matter fully at this stage, that you have an out-patient department?—Yes.

4934. A small charge is made, is it not?—For the out-patient department, yes, not exceeding 2s. for each patient.

4935. To avoid repetition I will not take the statistics of Maudsley from you, because we hope to have some detailed evidence upon it; we are specially interested in that. The principal features of it are the reception of boarders, the out-patient department, the facilities provided for scientific research, and for clinical instruction?—Yes.

4936. It represents, does it not, a new departure?—Quite a new departure.

4937. And is no doubt being studied by your Committee with special interest?—That is so.

4938. Mr. Micklem: Mr. Keene, would you kindly turn to your table of rates of pay and hours of duty that you have given us, and may I ask you first this: Have you any difficulty in filling the medical posts in the asylums?—No, not at present.

4939. There is a certain competition whenever a post is vacant?—Whenever we advertise. You were talking of the junior medical officers?

4940. I was thinking of the medical officers generally?—Yes. Whenever we advertise we get quite a number of applications.

4941. Both for senior and junior officers?—No, we do not advertise for the senior officers; we only advertise the junior appointments; all promotions are made from the staff.

4942. Have you any difficulty in getting the attendants?—We have a difficulty in getting women nurses—not in getting male nurses.

4943. I suppose they are obtained by advertisement?—Yes, we advertise very largely.

4944. Would you turn to item 66, nurse (staff), and 67, nurse (probationer), on page 4 of your présis?—Yes, I have it.

4945. Then would you turn over to page 6, 86, nurse (staff), and 87, nurse (probationer). I do not quite follow what the difference is there?—On page 4 you have the male staff. The attendants now are called male nurses. On page 4 you have the pay of the male nursing staff, and on page 6 the pay of the female nursing staff.

4946. Thank you. Then on items 66 and 67 you are dealing only with male staff?—Yes.

4947. I understand you do not wish to give any opinions, but you are confining your evidence to facts?—Yes.

4948. Miss Madeleine Symons: Mr. Keene, just following on what Mr. Micklem was asking you, in the case of a matron, or an assistant matron,—would they have to have general hospital training as well as training in a mental hospital?—We consider it very desirable they should have—I would not say it would be a sine qua non.

4949. I was wondering about that when you were saying they did have a chance of becoming matrons?—Laterly the Mental Hospitals Committee have shown a distinct preference for matrons who have had that training—general hospital training.

4950. And that would mean presumably as things stand that they would have to serve their probation over again—I mean they would have to put in a double period on probationer rates and conditions?—It would mean, if anybody is appointed from the staff, that they have had previous experience in a general hospital either before they came into the mental hospital service, or that after they came into the mental hospital service they had special leave in order to acquire knowledge and experience and a certificate in a general hospital.

4951. Were there some special difficulties with regard to getting staff at Horton? I understood that there you have taken uncertificated nurses, and I wondered whether there was some special cause for the difficulty in getting staff there?—All our probationer nurses are engaged as such, and they are trained while they are with us—they get their certificates while they are in our service. The difficulty is in getting the probationer nurses.

4952. I see. They were no special difficulties at Horton, it was just a difficulty that applied everywhere?—Horton mental hospital was for several years in use as a war hospital, and although some of the old mental hospital staff served in the war hospital, when it was reopened as a mental hospital, there was only a nucleus of the original staff remaining; therefore it was necessary to restaff the place, and we had a large number of beds there for women patients. Consequently we wanted a larger female staff. The difficulties were perhaps accentuated by the fact that it was a new hospital, and that such a large number of nurses was required.

4953. You told us, I think, that wherever the patients can pay the 24s. 6d. you put them on the private list?—Yes.

4954. I think when we had evidence from Dr. Bond he stated that they now added something to the cost of maintenance to cover interest on capital charges, and I wondered whether perhaps your practice varied?—We should endeavour to get that, if possible. That would be another 4s. a week, which would cover the interest on capital and repairs, but if we can only get the 24s. 6d. then we are bound to take that amount. We have been advised by Counsel about that; and so if payment is made to us instead of to the board of guardians, the patient becomes a private patient.

4955. On your dietary that you kindly supplied us with, do fats there include a certain amount of butter?—It would include any butter that is given, but butter is not usually given except to infirmary patients.

4956. Earl Russell: Just go back for one moment to the private patient, do I understand that if an additional 4s. were paid that would represent the whole cost to the County?—Yes, that would recoup the County for the whole.

4957. There would be no loss then at all?—There would be no loss.

4958. As to the enquiry you make about private patients is it one you make of your own motion?—We make enquiry wherever we have cause to think that there are means.

4959. It would be in cases where you thought the enquiry would be fruitful?—Yes; any information, either from the boards of guardians or from friends, or from the patient himself, that there are means, would set us on enquiry.

4960. Now I just want to ask you two questions about the practice of discharge. You know the provision in the statute that any three members of the committee may order the discharge of a patient without the certificate of the medical superintendent?—Yes.

4961. Have you ever known that power exercised?—Yes—not frequently.

* See Appendix XIII.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E.

4962. How often?—I have known that done some years ago in connection with the re-certification, where the medical superintendent did not feel that he could give a certificate; he did not recommend the patient's discharge, but the three members would sign the discharge. I remember only one case recently.

4963. Just to stop with your first case; in that first case it would not be, as I understand, against the superintendent's advice, but rather without his advice?—No, he had not sufficient evidence of insanity to give a continuing certificate.

4964. So that the patient would have had to be discharged in any event by somebody?—Yes, by the Board of Control.

4965. Now the other instance?—In the other instance more recently three members discharged a patient, not with the advice of the medical superintendent.

4966. Against his advice?—He did not raise any great objection to it.

4967. And did any harm come of it?—I have not heard of any.

4968. That is two cases in about ten years?—Several cases of the first kind; because one medical superintendent, the late Dr. Seward, thought that was the proper way of dealing with such cases.

4969. It became a practice in that asylum?—Yes, there might have been a dozen or so cases of that sort.

4970. But practically you have only known one case in which it has been against the advice of the medical superintendent?—It is the only case in my memory.

4971. I was going to ask you about patients who come in freshly certificated: Have you many cases where it has been thought that the certificate was improper, or that the patient was not of unsound mind?—We have a number of cases each year of patients who are found not to be insane.

4972. And there you mean the seven days' certificate is not given?—They are promptly discharged.

4973. Because the medical superintendent does not give the 7 days' certificate—is that it?—Yes, or he gives the certificate to the effect that they are not insane. It does not follow that the patient when certified or when seen by a justice was not insane; it may be the case has cleared up; but when the case got to the institution signs of insanity were not discovered, and naturally the medical superintendent would recommend the patient to be discharged by the committee promptly.

4974. Perhaps as you are not giving evidence on policy you would not express any opinion as to whether that was due to carelessness in certification or not?—I think it would be very very difficult to say it was carelessness.

4975. Mr. Snell: Mr. Keene, in the co-option of members to the Mental Hospitals Committee of the County Council it is the practice, is it not, to co-opt persons because of their fitness to render administrative service rather than to give specialised service such as medical service, and so on?—They are co-opted under the Mental Deficiency Act because of their experience, for example, as poor law guardians and their interest in the work generally.

4976. Is it always possible for a patient to make a complaint to a member of the committee privately?—Do you mean in a private room?

4977. Can he take the member of the committee in a corner, for instance, and speak to him so that attendants or doctors would not hear the conversation?—I doubt whether such a procedure would be advisable. You have to remember that in a mental hospital there are many dangerous patients, and it would not be safe for a member to have a patient alone.

4978. I understand that difficulty, but what I want to find out is whether when a member of the Mental Hospitals Committee or visiting committee goes round the ward, it is possible for a patient to make any complaint he has in the absence, say, of doctors, or of staff, who he might assume might be hostile to him?—The patient could ask a member for a private interview.

4979. He could?—Yes.

4980. And that would be granted?—That would depend upon the decision of the member.

4981. Now would a letter of a patient be forwarded unopened to a member of the committee?—Yes.

4983. That would be at the discretion, would it not, of the medical officer under Section 41—whether it was forwarded or not?—Yes.

4984. Now if a doctor or medical superintendent refuses to pass on a complaint, the patient has no redress there, has he? Suppose a patient had the feeling: "Well, I know this visiting committee, I have complained before and nothing happens; I will write to a member of the Council who is not on the Committee"—if the doctor did not pass that on, the patient would have no redress?—He might complain to his friends, who could take some action by writing to members of the Council.

4985. His visiting friends?—Yes, his visiting friends.

4986. Suppose the patient wants to write a letter, say, to his lawyer or partner, or business adviser, or close family friend—that again is at the discretion of the doctor?—Yes, but I should think that a doctor would invariably send a letter on to a solicitor if addressed to a solicitor.

4987. Unopened?—I would not say unopened, because all letters are seen by the doctor, and he would have to see that the letter is a letter that can be sent out. We have had complaints of letters getting out of institutions which have caused a great deal of pain and trouble to people outside.

4988. But there are some letters forwarded to people unopened. Does the doctor see those? Those may also contain distressful things?—Those letters, if they are sealed, he would not open.

4989. So that you feel, out of your experience, that there is no real danger of any legitimate complaint that a man wishes to make to an outside person such as his lawyer being suppressed?—I do not think there is.

4990. Mrs. Mathew: Item 61, I think refers to the male nurses. I have been adding it up, and I think in the case of a person who has not had any rise his net earnings are £1 5s. 7d. a week. Is that right? That is with the deductions for board and lodging and washing?—Is this the head nurse?

4991. Yes, head nurse, male staff, page 4, item 61.—Yes.

4992. Am I right in thinking that before he gets his rise he only gets 25s. 7d. a week?—He would have about 30s. a week if he had all his meals except supper.

4992A. I suppose he would want supper, would he not?—Many of them do not; but as a matter of fact the head nurses do not live in the institution, they live outside. They take no meals; they have their breakfast before they come on, and then they have their dinner after they go off, so there are no charges here probably that would be made against a head nurse.

4993. I am sorry; I have been misled by the column marked "Remarks."—Yes; that is, if they do live in those would be the charges; but, as a matter of fact I should say there is hardly a head nurse who is living in the institution. If he has any of those meals inside he will have to pay for them.

4994. What are the hours?—The hours are 96 a fortnight.

4995. That is how many a day—eight hours a day. He would want some meals in the eight hours?—It comes to an eight-hour day.

2 December, 1924.]

MR. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E.

4996. On an average it is an eight-hour day?—We have a scheme by which the men go on duty for one long day, that is from seven o'clock in the morning to eight at night, and that is one day in the week. The other five days in the week are short days; they go on at 7 in the morning, and they go off at 2.10. Then in the following week, the alternate week, there is the long day again, and four days they come on duty at one o'clock and go off at eight, and one day they come on at one and go on till ten minutes past nine.

4997. I quite follow. I do not think the charges are excessive. I was only trying to get at what they really receive a week, if they had these deductions for breakfast, dinner, board and lodging, and so on. Of course that would leave them really, if they never have any meals in the hospital, with £2 12s. a week for a head nurse?—But you have to put on to that the bonus—this is the basic rate. The bonus on 52s. a week is a fairly high one.

4998. Chairman: I should think it is between 20s. and 30s. is it not?—I should think it is quite that.

4999. It varies with the cost of living?—Yes, it is down a little bit now, because the cost of living went down to 70.

5000. Mrs. Mathew: About how much a week is it at present?—I am afraid I have not those figures* with me.

5001. Sir Humphry Rolleston: What is the age of retirement of the superintendents and the assistant medical officers—is that fixed?—Everybody in the Council's service is expected to retire at the age of 65, but a medical superintendent under the provisions of the Asylums Officers Superannuation Act can retire at the age of 55, and be pensioned if he has had 20 years' service.

5002. And the matrons?—To matrons it would apply equally.

5003. And the head nurses?—Yes, it applies to all the staff; they can all retire at the age of 55, and be pensioned if they have had 20 years' service. They would not be allowed to remain in the Council's service over the age of 65.

5004. Supposing that a nurse—it is a hard profession—began to wear out a good deal sooner than 65?—Yes, she can retire at the age of 55.

5005. Before 55 would she get consideration?—She would get consideration if she is permanently incapacitated. That would depend on a medical certificate, but she could not retire before the age of 55, unless she was certified to be permanently incapacitated.

5006. Are there many cases of that kind in which, without being absolutely incapacitated, it is obvious that the person is not what he was as a nurse?—I am afraid that is so.

5007. It is a difficult thing to arrange, I suppose?—It is the Act of Parliament which provides the age of 55. It does not differentiate between a man and a woman.

5008. Another point is with regard to the after-care of people who have gone out. The numbers are so enormous, that I suppose there is no internal arrangement for inspecting people after they have left. You depend, I suppose, on the After-care Associations, and so on?—Yes: the visiting committee has no duties in connection with a patient after a patient is once discharged recovered; but quite a number of cases from the London mental hospitals are looked after by the Mental After-care Association; some during the period of trial, and some after they have been discharged recovered; and we have fortunately in our service a fund, the Queen Adelaide Fund, which enables grants to be given to deserving patients on their discharge. In that way we are enabled to help; but it is all voluntary effort, and there is no responsibility at all with the visiting committee.

5009. Those patients are ex-patients and they are put under the care of the After-care Association, by recommendation from you, and it does not depend entirely upon the friends?—No.

5010. Sir David Drummond: You gave us some statistics dealing with cases from 1895 to 1923; 881 patients were discharged recovered in 1923. Can you compare the results in 1895 with those of 1923? I should just like to know if the results are better than they were?—The admissions in 1895 were 3,221. The discharges "recovered" in the same year were 1,090, i.e., a percentage of 33·84 on admissions. The discharges recovered are not quite as high as they were.

5011. Not quite so good as they were?—Not quite so good.

5012. You referred to a certain number of cases discharged by the medical superintendent after a very short residence in the mental hospital. Is there a considerable number of that class?—Do you mean discharged as not insane?

5013. Discharged within a few days?—Last year I think there were six such cases.

5014. Is there an enquiry into the previous history of these cases—as to their nature and how they came to be certified? Do you know anything about that class of case in this connection?—The committee do not have the facts brought to their notice; they will only discharge a patient. The certification of the patient is not within the jurisdiction of the committee.

5015. I was wondering if you could give me any information. One is very anxious to know why these people who are discharged so soon were certified?—It is information I could obtain for the Commission if it is required. I could get a history of these cases.

Sir David Drummond: One wants to know, Mr. Chairman, something about these cases of only very short residence.

Chairman: I think Mr. Keene explained to us that these were cases which were possibly afflicted with a merely transitory attack of insanity, which might have justified the justice and the medical practitioner in certifying their insanity, but that the insanity had actually passed off.

Witness: Personally I do not know the history of these cases, but if it is any use to the Royal Commission I could get a report* on the six cases and send them on.

5016. It think it might be useful to us, as illustrative of the principle. Of course one would obviate that if we had a provisional system of dealing with cases which has been suggested more than once to us.

5017. Sir David Drummond: Can you tell me about the appointments to the senior position on the medical staff. Is it by seniority?—Seniority does count, but not altogether. It would be the ability of the doctor, and his degrees, and so forth.

5018. Sir Ernest Hiley: Mr. Keene, with regard to the figures you gave us of re-admissions, I think you said the percentage was 29·8?—Yes.

5019. Of whom 10 per cent. were re-admitted within 12 months?—Yes.

5020. Have you ever heard it discussed by your Committee as to whether or not that percentage is unduly high?—I do not know that the Committee have said it was unduly high. There was nothing to compare it with. We have no reason to think that the patients are too freely discharged from the London County mental hospitals.

5021. We had a witness at our last sitting from Norfolk who told us that the percentage of re-admissions was 3½ for the County of Norfolk. There is a very wide difference between that and your figure, and I should be interested to know whether the difference is attributable to the peculiarity of the population you have to deal with as compared with a rural population like that of Norfolk?—I should be interested to know what the discharges were in Norfolk—what the percentage of discharges was.

* Note.—The basic rate of pay for a Head male nurse is 52/- a week rising by 2/6 a week to 62/-. The present remuneration with bonus is 84/1 rising to 97/7. The charges for meals taken in the institution are: breakfast 8d.; dinner 1/1; tea 4d.; supper 6d. Charges for lodging and washing 9/11 a week.

5022. Of course the figures for Norfolk are very much smaller as compared with those of the County of London; but, speaking from memory, I think the discharges are somewhere about 189 in a year?—I have not heard that these figures are high. I do not think there are many authorities who keep such figures as these. Of course these figures have been kept over a very long period of time, and you will find that the percentage is much higher in the older institutions than it is in the newer institutions. The newer institutions are gradually getting higher and higher in their percentage.

5023. Do you mean the percentage of re-admissions?—Yes, of re-admissions.

5024. I do not quite follow the reason why that is so?—The patients come back at some time or other. The longer you keep the records the more chance there is of them appearing in the figures. Now take the figures we have got at the different asylums: The percentage of Banstead is 31·28; Bexley which was opened on the 19th September, 1898, 25·70—that is after these figures were commenced. We commenced keeping records in 1895.

5025. When did you begin your record for Banstead?—In 1895.

5026. Then your percentages are not calculated over the same period—is that what you want to bring out?—That is so.

5027. How do you arrive at this 29·8 then that you gave us—over what period is that taken?—The whole period in the case of institutions that were in existence in 1895, and in the other cases from the time they have been opened.

5028. I see, it goes back to the opening of the institution?—No, to 1895 only; we start from 1895, and any institutions that have been opened since have been added. Bexley, for instance, was opened in 1898—that is three years after we commenced these statistics. Then we have Horton, which was opened in 1902 and Long Grove in 1907.

5029. That is an average over a period of years?—Yes.

5030. Are there any great fluctuations in comparing one year with another over that period?—I am afraid I have not got the percentage for each year; I have only got them in total.

5031. Might I just pass on to another point. Have you any record with regard to these ten per cent. who came back within 12 months—as to how many of those had been under the care of after-care visitors?—We have records at the institution, but we have not got them tabulated.

5032. Could you, without very much difficulty, get us that figure?—It would mean a lot of research into the records.

5033. I do not want to give trouble, but it would be rather interesting to know how many of those who came back once have been constantly visited?—I could get that for one institution. Would that suit your purpose?

5034. Yes.

Chairman: I think, Sir Ernest, we are going to have an after-care witness later on, who may be able to give you some information generally of that character.

5035. Sir Ernest Hiley: Very well. (To the Witness:) I should like just to go back to the figure with regard to the pauper patients whom you have turned into private patients, if I may express it in that way. You gave a figure of 308?—Yes.

5036. Is that for one year, or is that to be compared with the total of the admissions to the asylums?—That is the number we had on the 1st January this year.

5037. You compare that then with 18,918 patients?—Yes. I can give you the number of patients who were transferred in one year, if that is of any use to you? We transferred during 1922, or during the year ended 31st March, 1922, 158 patients to the private list.

5038. Really it is a very small percentage of the total?—A very small percentage of people who can pay the full amount.

5039. That is after really careful and diligent enquiry by you, and by the guardians?—Yes.

5040. Then I just want to ask you one other question of another character altogether. Taking these scales of wages in connection with the female staff, do you deduct from the domestic servants charges for meals and lodging, and washing, and for board?—Yes.

5041. Although, I suppose, they sleep in?—Yes.

5042. Take, for instance, item No. 98, maid (domestic) with a maximum wage of 33s. 2d.—can you tell us how much you deduct in a year for board and lodging, etc.?

Chairman: You have to go back to the male nurses to find out what the deduction means.

5043. Sir Ernest Hiley: Can you give me an idea of what is the net wage that the domestic maid gets?—She has a net wage, after making deductions for all meals, lodging and washing, of 10s. 7d. a week at the minimum, and 18s. 6d. at the maximum. This is equivalent to a yearly wage of £27 10s., rising to £48 with “all found.”

5044. That is taking into account the bonus?—Yes.

5045. Chairman: Is it taking into account the bonus?—Yes.

Mr. Stewart (Representing the National Society for Lunacy Reform): On the question of the efficacy of complaints by patients to visitors, would you think it proper to put this question, Sir? Out of all the complaints made by the 18,918 inmates in 1923 how many of such complaints were followed by disciplinary measures against the persons complained of?

5046. Chairman: You see the point, Mr. Keene. You have a certain population in the asylums, and you have told us that complaints are received and dealt with. In how many cases have you had to deal with attendants in a disciplinary way in a year?—I have not the statistics, but I can say that the complaints are gone into very frequently by the sub-committee.

5047. You have told us about their investigation, but, as a result of investigation, in how many instances have you had to deal with attendants from a disciplinary point of view?—I have not got the statistics.

5048. Earl Russell: But you could tell us whether it is 10 or 100, could you not?—I am afraid I could not.

5049. Chairman: One wants to know to what extent investigation has shown that complaint was well founded, and required you to deal with your servants?—There again I will let you have the figures.*

5050. In some cases I suppose a nurse would be brought before you and reprimanded; in other cases I suppose a nurse would be dismissed. If you could tell us how many persons were reprimanded or dismissed in consequence of complaints made by patients in one year that would give one an idea?—Complaints may be made by the responsible officers.

5051. Quite?—You would wish that included.

5052. No. Patients' complaints followed by disciplinary action—how many instances will you have had of that in a year?—It would be very difficult to say, because a patient might complain to the medical officer, and that would result in the employee being brought before the committee.

5053. It may be that the patient goes first to the medical officer, and the medical officer brings it up, or the patient may bring the case up directly?—Yes.

5054. Perhaps you will give us the extent to which disciplinary action has followed in consequence of complaints made to you in the course of a year, and

* See Appendix XV.

Mr. HENRY FURSE KEENE, O.B.E.

the form of discipline taken, either reprimand or some other form, or actual dismissal—that would give one a useful idea?—Yes. There were three cases dealt with by the visiting sub-committee on Monday last.

5055. That is rather interesting. On whose complaint did they come before you?—I was not present myself at the committee; my assistant was there, and he has only told me what took place. I fancy that these cases were reported by the staff. In one case I think a probationer nurse reported another nurse, and in the other case I think a patient complained.

5056. Was that case of one nurse reporting against another a case where that other nurse had maltreated a patient, or was it a squabble between the nurses themselves?—I think it originated with a squabble between the nurses.

5057. That does not interest us quite so much, but the other two cases were cases of alleged illtreatment of a patient?—Yes. I am afraid I cannot give the Commission the details, because I only just heard the report of my assistant who was at the committee.

5058. What happened in those three cases?—In one case I think the nurse was dismissed the service. In the other cases I think that the nurses were reprimanded.

5059. If you were not there yourself you cannot tell us about them, but you will be good enough to give us that general statistical information as to the number of disciplinary cases you have had to deal with for the year 1923?—Yes.

5060. Mr. Stewart: Resulting from complaints of patients to visitors—that is what we want to get?—It would be very difficult to make that distinction.

5061. Chairman: I do not see how you can. Of course you could tell, I suppose, whether the case you were dealing with was one that had been brought to the notice of your committee by a complaint made by a patient, could you not?—I think we should be able by our records to tell whether the complaints originated by a complaint to the visitors; but there would be very few of those, I think.

5062. Perhaps you can make a column of remarks at the end, and so far as you have information of that sort, give it us; it would be useful?—I could state the origin of the complaint, whether it was through a complaint made to a visitor, or through a complaint made to a medical officer, and so forth.

5063. Where you have the material to do it, you could put it in a column of remarks.

5064. Earl Russell: Or through the chaplain?—Yes.

5065. Chairman: It is really in order to see what advantage is taken of the means of communication with the patients, and what effective step, if any, follows upon that?—Yes.

Mr. Stewart: I am asked to submit this question, Sir: Is it a fact that in order for a patient to be a paying patient, or to be transferred from the pauper class to the paying class, a payment in advance for four weeks of the minimum sum accepted by the Council's institutions is required.

5066. Chairman: Have you to pre-pay?—The answer is, Yes, usually.

5067. You must have an assurance that four weeks at least will be paid before the transfer takes place?—Yes. There is a very good reason for it, and that is that the Council is not allowed to incur any bad debts; the auditor would want to know a great deal about it, and somebody might be surcharged. If we take the responsibility away from the guardians who would always pay and accept it ourselves then we must see that we get the money, and we can only do that by making it a condition that the money should be prepaid.

5068. Earl Russell: That means £5?—Quite. But there are exceptions.

5069. Is 28s. the maximum sum which is ever charged in respect of patients transferred from the pauper to the paying status?—The sum at present is 24s. 6d., and 4s. 1d.—28s. 7d. The maintenance rate itself has been up to 39s. 1d.

5070. Chairman: I think the general question is this: Do you ever charge more than the existing maintenance rate for the time being, as the ticket of admission, so to speak, from the pauper to the private status?—All we ask is an extra 4s. 1d. to cover capital charges. We ask for that when we can get it.

5071. But you do not exact more than the current rate per capita of your institutions?—That is so.

Chairman: We are very much indebted to you for the most useful evidence you have given us.

(The Witness withdrew.)

Mr. WILLIAM GEORGE LOBJOIT, O.B.E., J.P., called and examined.

5072. Chairman: Mr. Lobjoit, are you Chairman of the Visiting Committee of the Middlesex Mental Hospitals?—I am.

5073. And an Alderman of the Middlesex County Council?—Yes.

5074. I think you are also Chairman of the Mental Hospitals Committee for the County of Middlesex?—Yes.

5075. Has the County got two large mental hospitals, and is it in course of providing a third?—Yes.

5076. I think you have had very considerable experience in this particular department of public work. You are an ex-officio member of the Springfield Standing Sub-Committee and also of the Napsbury Standing Sub-Committee?—Yes.

5077. Those are the two Sub-Committees of the two existing hospitals?—Yes. I have been a member of the Napsbury Committee for 17 years.

5078. And you have been for 5 years Chairman of the Sub-Committee of Springfield?—No, I have been Chairman of the full Mental Hospitals Committee for 3 years. For 5 years previously I was Chairman of the Napsbury Committee.

5079. I think you are aware of the Terms of Reference to this Royal Commission?—Yes.

5080. And you have come here to give us the benefit of your views on the matters that fall specially within your own cognisance?—Yes.

5081. As you are aware, we have to consider the adequacy of the existing safeguards against improper detention of persons in asylums. Upon that matter do you hand us a report of your Committee on the question of proper precautions?—Yes, it is a report which we had prepared based upon the report of the London County Council Committee.

5082. I see that you incorporate in your report the report prepared by the London County Council Mental Hospitals Committee?—Yes.

5083. And having incorporated it, your own Medical Superintendents of Springfield and Napsbury add their reports?—Yes.

5084. We have had the advantage of reading the report, both the report that is embodied and the remarks of your own Committee, and the general purport seems to be that you think the existing safeguards are adequate?—Generally, yes. I cannot imagine any County Mental Hospitals Committee keeping anybody any longer than is absolutely necessary, particularly when we are so pressed for accommodation.

5085. I observe that the general conclusion that you reach, after considering the London County Council report and the joint report of your own two medical superintendents, is that you "are satisfied that all proper precautions are taken, both in the Springfield and Napsbury Mental Hospitals, against improper detention of patients, both private and otherwise, and that no alteration of the existing practice or regulations is necessary?"—That is so.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. WILLIAM GEORGE LOBJOIT, O.B.E., J.P.

5086. Now, as a person who has had to deal with the actual visiting of patients, do you find that you have many complaints from patients that they are being improperly detained?—One gets them occasionally. As a rule the more insane a patient is the more frequently he makes that sort of complaint.

5087. You do in fact, however, receive from patients, whether they are well founded or ill founded, a number of complaints upon that topic?—You cannot go round the wards without a number of patients coming to you and saying “Why cannot I be let out; why am I kept here?”

5088. Quite. What one is concerned with is that among those complaints it is conceivable that there might be a genuine case; and we should like your view as to the adequacy of the existing safeguards which would insure that every case which ought to be investigated is investigated?—Perhaps if I describe the general practice of a visiting committee, it would be the best way of answering your question.

5089. I think it would. We would like you to give us an account of your actual visit, and what happens?—I should say, of course, that the Mental Hospitals Committee consists of the visiting sub-committees of the two hospitals. Each visiting committee is independent, except for the making of the maintenance rate. When a visiting sub-committee visits the hospital the members are divided up into sub-committees again. One sub-committee is the house sub-committee which goes round with the medical superintendent a certain portion of the hospital every visiting day, in such a way that the whole of the hospital is covered in the course of two months. The visiting committee goes round a particular portion agreed upon for that day with the medical superintendent.

5090. We have had indications from some quarters that the visits are apt to be perfunctory; that there are a large number of patients to be seen, time is limited, and the visitors are often busy men. What one is concerned with is to know to what extent these visits are a reality, real visits in the sense that the patients know that here is somebody to whom they can speak and to whom they can look for sympathy and consideration. What has been your experience of that? Is there any personal element in the visit, as distinguished from what I may call the official aspect of it?—As a rule some of the members of the visiting committee are known to certain patients; that is to say, men who are prominent locally are usually known to the patients from their locality, and frequently that particular member stops and talks to the patients who know him and whom he knows. Any patient who wants to speak to the committee comes up and speaks to them, and if there is anything which, in the judgment of the Chairman of the committee requires further investigation, there is a discussion between the committee and the doctor and the nurse of the ward; and occasionally a patient is taken aside by the committee and talked to privately—in a semi-private way. I cannot conceive of any occasion on which the committee goes round when there is any difficulty in any patient seeing and speaking to the committee. Of course you must understand that in certain of the wards many of the patients are very noisy and sometimes very aggressive, so it is difficult. One must go by the advice of the medical superintendent. Frequently where a patient seems to be reasonable and sane a special consultation takes place between the committee and the doctor.

5091. What one is anxious about is to be satisfied that the patient really has access to the visiting committee. The possibilities of access seem to consist in the patient, so to speak, stepping out of the ranks and addressing the visitors. Is that so?—Of course there are no ranks; the patients are sitting about reading, or otherwise amusing themselves.

5092. I was using a mere figure of speech, of course, but I mean a person stepping forward and saying “I want to speak to you.”—They are sitting about reading or playing at games. In the case of very acute patients they are walking about and shouting.

Generally speaking, members of the committee go up and speak to the patients themselves and say “How are you to-day; how are you getting on?” and after a time you begin to know the patients; they have been there some time; you are not strangers to them; you know them and talk to them. Very often you know their idiosyncracies and you talk to them about them.

5093. But it has been suggested that the patients are deterred from speaking to the visiting committee by the attendants, who are averse from having any grievances ventilated in the presence of the visiting committee. Have you ever had any instance of that?—I have never seen any case in which an attendant has attempted to prevent a patient speaking. Of course you will realise that in the case of a very aggressive patient or a very noisy patient the attendant has to stand by.

5094. That one could understand.—In one of the very acute wards that we have, it would not be safe without the presence of an attendant, but in the majority of the cases the patients are quite quiet and to all outward appearance are quite reasonable; they are sitting about with no attendant near. It is only in the acute cases where the attendant is standing by, so-to-speak.

5095. But it has been suggested that cases have occurred in which a patient, for the very reason that he wrote or made complaints, was victimised afterwards by the attendant of whom he had made complaints. Have you ever come across anything of that sort?—We have had complaints, of course, of nurses or attendants maltreating patients; we have had them from the medical officer; and the practice universally with us is that whenever a case of striking a patient is substantiated the attendant or nurse is dismissed. The doctor always suspends them until the committee meets.

5096. I can see your method of paying your visit and possibly talking to some of the patients, and so on. Might it not be, however, that some of the patients were afraid to talk to you because they were afraid of what might happen to them afterwards, if they made a complaint against a rather unpleasant nurse of whom they were afraid?—I am afraid I cannot say that could not possibly happen; but speaking from my experience of going round and talking to them I cannot imagine how it is going to come about; you get complaints which are manifestly part of the delusion of the patients—I mean they are freely made. They are always looked into on the spot, but many of them bear on the face of them the fact that they are delusions.

5097. Of course, if a patient stepped forward and said: “I wish to tell you, Sir, that my food is being poisoned regularly every day,” you do not require to investigate whether the food is being poisoned regularly every day, because that is on the face of it an irrational complaint. But if a complaint was that the food was inadequate, or that a nurse was unduly harsh, or that medicine was being given when it was not required, or that there were insufficient sanitary appliances and things of that sort—would they be considered?—The provision of sanitary accommodation, for instance, is a question of the construction of the building itself. I cannot conceive how it is possible, with the procedure we have, for a patient to be prevented from making any complaint he wants to make. There is another way. Most of the patients are visited by friends, and the friends see them alone. If they have a complaint of that sort they will make it to the friend and the friend would write to a local representative on the Council, and that would come before the committee.

5098. What one is really thinking of is the existence of means of contact between the patient and the responsible outside authority. Is the medical superintendent always with you when you are going round the wards?—Yes. The medical superintendent or his deputy; they always go round with the house committee, certainly.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. WILLIAM GEORGE LOBJOIT, O.B.E., J.P.

5099. Have you ever had a patient saying that he or she would like to talk to you apart from the medical superintendent?—I do not remember a case where that request has been made. I know of cases in which the committee have taken a patient aside and talked quietly with him themselves, or one or two members of the committee.

5100. Supposing the patient, rightly or wrongly, wanted to tell you that the medical superintendent was not paying attention to his case, and was not investigating it and considering the propriety of his further detention or not, it is rather difficult for a patient to make such a complaint to you in the presence of the medical superintendent himself?—It is difficult for me to give you an idea, but except in the acute wards the committee scatter, and they are talking to patients all over the ward; frequently the medical superintendent goes on a ward or two in front of the committee or leaves a member or two of the committee behind talking to patients, particularly where they are known to them; so I cannot conceive where the opportunity of a patient speaking in a most private and intimate manner to a member of the committee would be prevented. Then there are the chaplains. In Napsbury, with which I am most familiar, there are three chaplains—Anglican, Non-conformist and Roman Catholic. Neither of them is resident in the place; they are all outside men brought in. The Anglican chaplain is the rector of a parish church in St. Alban's, who works with his curates; the Nonconformist chaplain is a retired minister who lives in St. Alban's; and the Roman Catholic chaplain comes in from St. Alban's. So these men are not officers of the institution in the sense of living there. They each of them have intimate and quiet converse with the patients. If the case you are visualising did occur, there could not be any difficulty in the patient speaking to his chaplain or to a chaplain.

5101. Do you get letters from the patients?—Yes; there are generally several letters addressed to the chairman of the committee on the chairman's table. There are some patients who write about four letters a day.

5102. I think those letters, being letters addressed to the visiting committee, have to be sent unopened?—Yes.

5103. And you get quite a lot of them?—I should not say a lot of them—probably three or four at a meeting; they usually come from the same patients. Then of course there is a box of letters which have been opened and not sent by the medical officer of the hospital, and these are examined by the committee.

5104. It is not left merely to the officers to decide whether a letter shall be sent on or not, but the visiting committee pass their opinion upon it also?—Yes; if the visiting committee think it should be sent, it is sent on.

5105. Earl Russell: If the Medical Superintendent thinks it a proper letter he may have it sent on without waiting for the visiting committee?—Yes; a great many are allowed to go out, but those considered not to be fit to go out are kept for the committee to see.

(After a short adjournment.)

5106. Chairman: Mr. Lobjoit, you were telling us before lunch that your committee gave its general approval to the report of the London County Council's Committee?—Yes.

5107. I have looked through the report of the London County Council Committee and I observe that there are one or two recommendations which they make. They draw particular attention to the question of the existing differentiation between a private patient and a pauper patient as regards certification. May we take it that the Middlesex County Committee share the London County Council's view that that differentiation should not occur?—Yes.

5108. In so expressing yourself, is your view that one medical certificate should be sufficient alike for the pauper patient and the private patient or that there should be two certificates in each case—I would rather say that there should be two certificates in each case.

5109. There is this point to be considered of course, that two medical certificates cost more than one, and we have heard from previous witnesses that in the great majority of cases there is really no dubiety, and that a second medical certificate is more or less redundant. Do you not think the case would be met if there were liberty to call in a second opinion in any cases in which either the first doctor or the justice felt any difficulty in certifying, so as to obviate calling in two doctors for cases as to which there could be no dubiety?—Under the present procedure it nearly always happens that the medical opinion one gets in certifying a patient is the opinion of the doctor of the workhouse, who only sees the patient after he or she is brought into the mental ward by the relieving officer; and as a certifying justice I feel that one ought to be armed also with the opinion of somebody who had more knowledge of the patient than the doctor of the workhouse can have.

5110. That may be incidental to the present system under which the patient passes through the workhouse on his way to an asylum?—I am speaking, of course, of the present system.

5111. Earl Russell: But it is also rather peculiar to Middlesex, is it not, because in other cases where they have gone through the workhouse the certifying doctor has not been generally the workhouse doctor?—It is incidental to my experience; I have rarely certified a pauper case in which I have not had the opinion of the medical officer of the workhouse only.

5112. Chairman: One is not so much impressed by the mere number of certificates as by the value of the certificates, and at the present moment we have the two systems in vogue; two certificates for a private patient and one certificate for a pauper patient. I do not know whether your experience would show that there is any more risk of improper detention in the case of the private patient who has had two certificates than in the case of the pauper patient who has only had one?—What I feel is that in taking away the liberty of the subject one cannot be too careful to stop up every possible loophole of error.

5113. We entirely agree with that view.—And the responsibility of the justice is so great that I think if it is desirable that a private patient should have the safeguard—one assumes it is a safeguard to have the two medical certificates—the pauper patient also should have them. I think his liberty is as valuable as the liberty of a person who is able to pay for his detention.

5114: Of course the assimilation might take the form of only requiring one certificate in the case of the private patient?—I think in that case, if the one certificate were given by a specially appointed medical man for mental cases, one might agree to it.

5115. If one were assured that under the present system pauper patients, in consequence of there being only one certificate, were being improperly detained, that would be a grave state of matters and one would want to reinforce the safeguard of medical opinion; but if the experience has been that, with the justice of the peace and the single certificate, cases of improper detention are rare, then the adding of a new precaution at double the expense might not be justified in the public interest. You see the difficulty one has; we do not want to recommend otiose safeguards that are a mere tribute to apprehensions that are not justified. One wants to know whether there is a genuine apprehension and a genuine risk which would be safeguarded in the case of the pauper patient?—I certainly think the procedure should be the same in both cases, and if it is decided to depend upon one medical certificate, I think that there should be some person appointed who is specially qualified. You will realise that I do not want to say anything derogatory to the medical officers of the Unions at all. But manifestly they are not always men who are specially

Mr. WILLIAM GEORGE LOBJOIT, O.B.E., J.P.

qualified to examine mental cases; and the responsibility of a justice is so great. If he feels he has got to refuse a certificate, as I have had to do in cases, I think it is throwing a greater responsibility upon the man who does his work for nothing than he ought to have.

5116. One has to balance so many considerations, as you will see. Again, if you have the liberty of the subject in the hands of the expert, rather than of the more or less ordinary practitioner, there is a risk that the public may say that the expert is inclined to find us all insane?—Of course you do not suggest that the justice should be done away with?

5117. No?—I think that the lay mind coming to it purely without any scientific bias at all is very important.

5118. Some safeguard of that sort is essential; it represents what you may call the public interest; but I take it that your suggestion is that the certifying doctor might be an expert in mental disease?—A doctor in the neighbourhood specially qualified and specially appointed.

5119. Do you think he would command more confidence because he had those special qualifications than if he were a general practitioner of standing?—Yes. I think it is largely a question of confidence—I agree. I do not think there are very many cases in which there has been wrong certification; it is largely a question of public confidence.

5120. I do not think it would be proper to recommend expensive safeguards which, as I say, were merely otiose, or merely a tribute to apprehensions which were entertained, but entertained without foundation. What one wants to know is what are the real risks?—In considering the matter one has thought of it from the other end rather; that if it is considered necessary to have two medical opinions to justify the detention of a private patient, the same safeguard should apply in regard to the parish patient.

5121. Perfectly; but if it is found in practice that a single certificate, and the justice of the peace in the case of the pauper patient has not resulted in improper detentions, then one would imagine that in the case of the private patient it would be equally effective?—Yes, and I think there is a good deal to be said for that particular point of view; but at the present moment where you have two systems, it is rather invidious.

5122. Yes, but as a large number of cases present no difficulty—and controversy has always arisen with regard to cases on the border line—does the idea commend itself to you that in cases where either a medical practitioner or the justice of the peace feels any difficulty, he should then be entitled to call in the assistance, if you please, of an expert or specially qualified medical man to supplement the medical testimony already received. How does that strike you?—I think that would be a safeguard. I think one would be glad to have it. The cases that I have in mind are cases of senile patients who have been in the infirmary and whose habits have become dirty, and so on; one would like to have another medical opinion besides the opinion of the doctor of the Union in such cases.

5123. Of course there is some doubt as to whether cases of mere senile dementia should be sent to an asylum at all?—Yes, but at the present time they are; that is the difficulty one has; the border line is so very close sometimes.

5124. Then we may take your approval of the London County Council report, subject to the observations you have made to us just now on the question of the two certificates?—Yes.

5125. There is another matter with which the London County Council deal in this report, and that is with regard to the desirability of having what are called receiving houses, that is to say, premises to which patients may be brought in the first instance with a view to their ultimate disposal. Do I take it that you and your committee favour the institution of such places?—Of course the difficulty at the present moment is that you must first alter the law.

5126. But then we are here to consider that?—Yes. My own opinion is that any arrangement that can be made for securing the early treatment of cases is desirable. At the present moment the Middlesex County Council is concerned in the building of a new hospital, and we are trying to make arrangements so as to have a receiving hospital in conjunction with a London general hospital, in order that the patients can be received into this receiving hospital and receive the benefit of expert treatment—"team" treatment before passing on to the mental hospital.

5127. Earl Russell: Would it be technically a lunatic asylum?—It would have to be attached to it unless we could make arrangements for a section in connection with the general hospital.

5128. Chairman: But you could not detain there without certification, unless we have some alteration of the law?—Yes. I think that there is a great deal of, may I say, wrong sentiment in regard to the question of certification. I regard it as a safeguard to the patient. I do not think the stigma is in certification. The stigma is that the certification in so many cases comes through the Poor Law.

5129. I do not know that we should all agree with you upon that, Mr. Lobjoit. The fact that a person has been hall-marked as a lunatic, putting it in its most crude form, is a mark against that person which may affect his whole future life and prospects?—I am inclined to think that is only because of the surrounding circumstances that have attached to it; it is part of the old superstition about lunacy. What I feel is that if you are going to detain a patient at all—I may say I agree with extending the facilities for voluntary boarders—but if you are going to detain a patient against his will at all, I think certification is a safeguard to him, particularly with regard to his property.

5130. We have had suggestions made to us—indeed they are embodied in Lord Onslow's Bill—that the voluntary boarder system ought to be permissible in the case of public mental hospitals?—I agree to that.

5131. But that there should also be a provision for a limited period of notice before a patient can leave—72 hours, I think it is?—Yes.

5132. Now if you had a voluntary system coupled with this measure of involuntaryism, that the patient could be detained for, say, 72 hours, so as to allow time for certification if necessary, would not that meet the case?—I agree to that, but I think that the 72 hours is the maximum; and further, there should be certification. I think that the justice representing the general public should be brought in before a patient is detained against his will.

5133. Let us examine that for a moment and see if there is much hardship?—He comes in, first of all, voluntarily.

5134. And he recognises that he will be the better for treatment?—Yes.

5135. Therefore we are not dealing with a person whose detention has begun against his will?—No.

5136. The only case in which the involuntary detention might supervene would be a case in which a patient, having come in voluntarily, desires to get out, against his own interest?—Yes.

5137. The assumption in that case is that the patient has got worse probably, because if the patient has not got any worse he would probably still be of the same mind in wanting to get the benefit of the treatment?—Yes.

5138. In that case does it strike you that it would be a hardship to detain such a patient, who had begun voluntarily, for a period of 72 hours against his will, to allow of some protection being obtained for him?—No, I think that should be the maximum. It is quite necessary to bring in an independent mind on the question. He may be only said to be in voluntarily.

5139. What do you mean by that exactly?—A man may want bona fide to get out, but he may be detained for other reasons.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. WILLIAM GEORGE LOBJOIT, O.B.E., J.P.

5140. One would assume that the medical officer in charge of the institution would not wish to detain him if he were a voluntary patient and had recovered?—No.

5141. So that the hypothesis of the case really is this, that he is a person in whose interests compulsory detention is desirable, but who does not recognise that it is in his own interest?—Yes, I agree the 72 hours, but I think that should be the maximum time.

5142. Now you, I understand, are in favour of some provisional method of dealing with patients prior to certification, and you suggest that the three days, which is the present period before the justice has to decide upon the case, should be extended. Is not that one of your suggestions?—No. I think that three days is the utmost. What I suggest is that the urgency order which now applies only to private patients should be used for parish patients.

5143. Then let us follow that out. Of course the urgency order has to be reconsidered?—Yes. Somebody has to see the patient within two days as a petitioner, and then the order lasts for three days.

5144. After that, what should happen, in your view?—If the detention is continued longer than three days, then the justice should be called in to justify the detention for longer than the three days.

5145. Where do you contemplate the patient would be detained for longer than three days in the case you figure? Where would the patient be?—In an admission hospital. Failing the establishment of clinics in connection with general hospitals, I would suggest an admission hospital to a mental hospital.

5146. Because you would be reluctant to extend the period of detention in a workhouse?—Yes. My reasons for suggesting the application of the urgency order to parish patients was to switch off from the workhouse altogether, and to enable patients to be sent right away to the admission hospital of a mental hospital, which would have more entirely the atmosphere of a hospital.

5147. This part of your evidence proceeds upon the assumption that you have eliminated the workhouse altogether?—Yes.

5148. And that you have been successful in establishing, either in connection with general hospitals or independently, some form of receiving house where patients could be kept provisionally as voluntary boarders?—Yes.

5149. Subject to some limited restraint?—Yes.

5150. After discharge, have you in connection with the Middlesex asylums any provisions for after care?—We work in connection with the After-care Association. We have, in conjunction with London, the benefit of Queen Adelaide's Fund; two-thirds is for London and one-third is for Middlesex. I am one of the trustees. We make contributions to the After-care Association, and cases discharged from our hospitals are referred to them at the discretion of the committee. Frequently grants are made to individual patients from the fund, and sometimes those grants are administered by a member of the committee living near the patient, or sometimes by the After-care Association.

5151. Do you find that that is a valuable provision?—In certain cases, I think it is. I think the cases want selecting with a good deal of discretion, because people who have been in mental hospitals and have got out again do not want people fussing round and creating a continuing remembrance of the association; it is very much like the ticket-of-leave with the criminal; but sometimes, of course, it is very helpful indeed. Where a patient goes out manifestly weak, and wants cheerful advice and supporting and so on, it is very useful.

5152. Now you have been good enough to give us some records of your experiences on the committees. We shall not, of course, embody these lists that you have given us in our report, because they contain the names of patients, and we do not want anything of that sort to be published; but I understand that the purpose of your embodying your experience is to show the attitudes of patients towards your institution so far as you are able to gauge it by the meetings?—I thought I should help you best by giving actual papers circulated to the committee.

5153. You have, of course, the patients who come before the ordinary meetings of your standing sub-committees?—Yes.

5154. And these are patients who are to be discharged, are they not? First of all the new patients come before you?—First of all there is a list of the new patients who have been admitted since the last meeting of the committee.

5155. Is that the first business at the meeting?—Yes; that is placed on the table; the members of the committee can examine the certificates under which the patients have been sent in; the case books are all on the table so that they can be examined.

5156. So that the committee considers the admissions since the last meeting?—Yes.

5157. Then do they have to consider the cases for discharge?—Cases for discharge are taken then, after the house committee has been round the hospital. Very frequently they particularly interview patients who are down for trial and not for discharge, and they also interview the patients who are the subject of petition. Relatives can always petition; they can petition at every meeting, if they like, for the release of a patient, and the committee is always bound to hear the petitioner.

5158. Do you keep records of any observations made by your patients when they are leaving you?—We always tell the patients that if they have any complaint to make they can make it now. We ask them to give their view as to how they have been treated.

5159. Do you see the patient on discharge?—Yes, the patient comes before the committee and the Chairman asks a few questions as a rule and generally tries to express a few encouraging words, and every patient is asked, "How have you been treated?" and what he says is taken down.

5160. Then you have furnished us in the case of these patients with the remarks they make?—I have given you the whole list for certain dates; I have not made selections. You will find there is one instance in which a patient did make a complaint. Our experience is that that is very rare indeed. It is on the first page.

5161. Yes, I have it.—She mentions the nurse's name, and said she did not wish the matter to go any further—did not wish the nurse to get into any trouble. It is dated 28th October, 1922.

5162. It does not seem to be a very serious matter, at the most?—I believe that has been the only one we have had.

5163. At any rate, what is of importance for us to know is this, that on the patient being discharged he (or she) comes before your committee, is asked whether he has any complaint to make, he now being more or less a free agent, both recovered and about to leave; and you have given us the records of a considerable number of cases, taken at random, and among those there is only one case of a complaint?—Yes.

5164. Sir David Drummond: May I ask whether any of these people whose statements on discharge have been furnished had made complaints during their residence in mental hospitals?—Of course I cannot answer that question. All I can say is that if patients make complaints we investigate them immediately.

5165. It would be very interesting to know if any of them made complaints during their residence in the mental hospitals?—There is one here who says she was not comfortable when she first came in; she misunderstood the nurses and so on; she probably was one who might have made a complaint at the beginning.

5166. Mr. Jovitt: Are the statements made after the patients have been notified they are going to be discharged, or are they made while the patients are waiting to know whether they will be discharged?—

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. WILLIAM GEORGE LOBJOIT, O.B.E., J.P.

They come into the committee to say good-bye; one asks a few questions about them—one asks questions as to the attack, how it came about and so on, and tries to give them a little advice; and then the question is always put by the Chairman: "How have you been treated?"

5167. Chairman: If they like they can give a parting kick at the institution?—Yes; they are perfectly free agents.

5168. They would not have their discharge recalled because they turned upon you and said they had had a very bad time?—That is unthinkable, Sir. You will notice that we also give the weights on coming in and on going out: 7 stone going in, 8 stone coming out; 5 st. 13 lbs. going in, 7 st. 8 lbs. coming out; 6 st. 10 lbs. going in, 9 st. 11 lbs. coming out; 8 st. 10½ lbs. going in, 11 st. 3 lbs. coming out. That is always done at Napsbury.

5169. Judged by avoirdupois?—Yes.

5170. Mr. Micklem: Mr. Lobjoit, I observe that in your précis you suggest that whenever an order for detention is made, wherever, in short, there is certification, a register should be kept covering the name of the doctor and the magistrate who makes the order. What is at the back of your mind there; why is the register necessary?—First of all I feel that there is a certain atmosphere of haphazardness about the procedure. The relieving officer has to find a justice; he sometimes comes to the police court while we are sitting, and it is generally a job to find anybody who can spare the time to go. Sometimes it falls on an ex officio justice to go. I feel there should be no suspicion of haphazardness at all. Justices have said to me (it has never happened to me personally) that after they have declined to certify a patient, the papers have been taken to another justice without him knowing that they had previously been before a justice. I feel that if the justice had to initial his remarks on the case that suspicion could not exist, and it would do away with the sort of atmosphere of haphazardness which exists. I also think that as special justices are selected for dealing with private patients under the Judicature Act, so special justices should be selected for dealing with parish patients.

5171. There is some difficulty about that, is there not, where you have sudden cases of mania, where a magistrate must be called in at once?—Well, justices now are fairly numerous in places, and it would be quite possible to get enough justices. What I feel is that it should not be put upon quite a new man; it is a great responsibility. A man wants to know the ropes a little before he knows how to act. When I was an ex officio justice I was invited to go and deal with a case, and I remember then I felt I ought not to have been asked to do it; I had not had the experience. One does not read up the duties and so on when one is simply an ex officio justice.

5172. Miss Madeleine Symons: Mr. Lobjoit, at Napsbury and Springfield do you employ occupation officers to assist in arranging suitable occupation for the patients?—No.

5173. Do you find that can be done with your ordinary staff?—Do you mean in the hospital?

5174. In the hospital. It has been put to me that for those patients who cannot do the ordinary work of the house, either because they are bedridden or because they are not well enough, the arrangement of occupation for them, which is probably very desirable, is a matter which takes up a very great deal of time?—Of course, we have the tailor, the shoemaker and the people who make mattresses and so on; we have special officers for those; and patients who can do the work are detailed for it; and also in the case of the gardens and farm, about 100 patients work on the farm at Napsbury, and the gardener depends upon the patients' help for looking after the garden and greenhouses; but I do not think we have appointed any special occupation officer.

5175. Do you have any children admitted as patients?—At Springfield, not at Napsbury. At Springfield we have children who have been in for years as part of an old system; we do not get fresh cases now.

5176. Earl Russell: With regard to the voluntary cases, Mr. Lobjoit, you know, I daresay, that 72 hours has been named as a maximum period, not because you could not get the man certified well within that time, but to give you a chance to communicate with his relations and friends and see what steps they would like taken?—Yes.

5177. It might be possible to remove him to their care rather than to certify the voluntary boarder, if certification became necessary?—Yes.

5178. It is rather felt that less than 72 hours might be not enough?—That is the Mental Treatment Bill, is it not?

5179. Yes. Of course, if it were a mere question of getting in the nearest doctor to certify, you could do it within 24 hours. It is rather with the hope of avoiding certification that the longer period is put in?—I quite agree; but that should be the maximum, I think.

5180. It is the maximum suggested. I see you say in your précis that you think "continuation orders might with advantage be signed by two members of the visiting committee." You mean the continuation order in which the doctor certifies the patient is of unsound mind and a proper subject for detention?—Yes, within the maximum period of 28 days. That is the continuation order. That is the provision, is it not, in the Mental Treatment Bill?

5181. Yes. You are not talking of ordinary certified cases. You are talking of the Mental Treatment Bill?—Yes. I do not agree with the suggestion that the visiting committee should see every patient at the anniversary of his coming in. I think one must depend upon the Board of Control for safeguarding the liberty of the subject there.

5182. You realise, do you not, with regard to what the Chairman was asking you about two medical certificates, that if you give a justice full authority to make the necessary adjournments of the case if he has any doubt, and full authority to call in a second medical man if he has any doubt, you would really achieve what you desire by having two certificates in all cases?—I think you would.

5183. You would not feel that there was any danger left over then, would you?—No.

5184. Mr. Jowitt: I want to ask you a question or two about the visiting sub-committees in relation to the question of discharge of patients. The great majority of cases which come before their notice are either brought to their notice by the medical staff or by the relatives of the patients?—Yes.

5185. Can you give me any idea at all as to the number of cases which they consider from the point of view of discharge which they themselves bring forward?—Do you mean the committee?

5186. Members of the visiting committee, as opposed to the medical staff and as opposed to the relatives of the patients?—I could not give you any numbers. I know that members of the visiting committee frequently come up to the committee and say that they have interviewed so and so, and as far as they are concerned he seems to be recovered and safe to discharge, and then the medical officer is asked there and then before the committee. I have known cases in which on the advice of the visiting committee a patient has been discharged whom the doctor has been unable to certify as cured—I do not say in direct opposition. I do not think, if a doctor had said, "You are incurring a great responsibility if you discharge this patient," the visiting committee would say, "Well, we think differently." But on occasions when the doctor says, "I am unable to say that the patient is cured, but I think it is a harmless case and probably no harm will be done if the patient is looked after," then the vote of the committee has been taken.

5187. The doctor is always present, is he, at the meeting of the visiting committee?—Yes.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. WILLIAM GEORGE LOBJOIT, O.B.E., J.P.

5188. The doctor would be in rather a difficult position, would he not, if the visiting committee brought up, so to speak, before themselves a case which the doctor had not reported to them?—I do not think so. I do not think that a doctor has ever felt himself in a difficult position in the matter. I can remember cases in which the visiting committee have brought up cases, having interviewed them on their going round the wards.

5189. Now let me put it to you: Supposing the doctor, when the name was brought up, said: "Oh, I think that patient is perfectly recovered," surely the retort would be: "Why did you not bring the name before our committee?"—I do not think that. If the committee discharge on their own responsibility a harmless patient, I do not think any harm would come about, provided that the committee see that the patient is properly looked after.

5190. Can you help me at all—it may be you cannot—as to what proportion of the number of patients discharged are discharged by means of a process which originates not from one of the medical staff and not from relatives?—I cannot give you any percentage or actual figures, but I should say it is a very small percentage indeed in my experience, but it has occurred and does occur.

5191. The visiting committee, of course, have no professional medical opinion or advice available to them except that of the local staff?—On the Middlesex committee there are two doctors.

5192. As members of the committee?—As members of the committee.

5193. Apart from that, there are no facilities for the members of the visiting sub-committee to call in a doctor from outside?—They can if they want to, or the patients can, or the patients' friends can call in a doctor from outside.

5194. Can the patient himself call in a doctor?—The patient can himself call in a doctor through his friends.

5195. But not without his friends?—I do not think there would be any objection. I do not remember a case having come forward. Of course, you could not say that every patient could do it, because those who were the worst would be the very ones to do it.

5196. And, as Lord Russell says, he has to pay for the doctor if he does call him in?—Yes, he has to pay for it.

5197. You are dealing here with a class of people who may be presumed, perhaps, to be slightly unbalanced, or to have been unbalanced. I want you if you will for this purpose to differentiate two questions in your mind altogether. First of all there is the question as to whether they have been ill-treated, and, secondly, there is the question as to whether they imagine they have been ill-treated. In your experience, and you have had a very large experience, whether the imagination is well-founded or not, have you formed the opinion that there are a lot of people who imagine they are ill-treated?—There are all sorts of delusions patients have, you know, but I cannot imagine any patient saying that he had been ill-treated by a specific officer and that that case would not be investigated. The officer would be called up and confronted with the patient first of all, and if there were any prima facie case the officer would be brought in before the committee.

5198. So that a patient who makes that sort of complaint knows that he or she is going to be confronted by the officer?—Yes.

5199. Does that happen very often?—No, I do not remember many cases; I do remember some.

5200. Now tell me this: Supposing a patient knows that that is going to be the result of a complaint, does it occur to you as quite possible that that patient may anticipate that there will be some trouble for him or her in the future, if he or she makes a complaint?—Of course, you cannot say that such a thing is impossible, but knowing Napsbury as I do—I speak more of Napsbury because I am so much more familiar with it—I cannot for the life of me see how a patient would be prevented ultimately from appealing to the committee. If you visualise what happens: the committee do not walk through the wards in a bunch, with the doctor with them; they go into a ward and scatter about, and spend some time sitting and talking with the patients. The doctor and two or three members frequently go on a ward or two in front, leaving the other members behind talking to the patients; sometimes they have to be sent back for, so that I cannot imagine that there would not be plenty of opportunity for a patient telling a member of the committee quite quietly if that sort of thing had happened.

5201. What is sometimes said, you know, is that patients are afraid to complain, because they think if they do complain some hard treatment will be measured out to them?—Of course, knowing human nature as one does, I cannot say that that is impossible; I do not think any arrangement you could make could make it altogether impossible. But what I cannot understand is how the patient would be prevented ultimately from making a complaint to a member of the committee, and the moment a complaint is made it is investigated. One of the things we are strict about is that whenever a nurse or attendant is convicted of striking a patient, there is no appeal; that officer is suspended.

5202. I see; and the patient knows that if he or she makes a complaint it will be investigated, and, of course, that necessarily means investigated in the presence of both parties?—It must be so in the first instance. I do not see how it can be otherwise in justice to the attendant.

5203. Sir David Drummond: May I ask your opinion upon the proposal, for treatment of early cases, to institute clinics and special departments where the patients will not be certified? In your opinion, would it be more desirable to have these departments attached to a general hospital, or to a mental hospital?—I think to be attached to a general hospital would be the better.

Mr. Stewart (Representing the National Society for Lunacy Reform): Might I put a question through you, Sir, to this witness? In connection with the matter of certification, does the witness think that in doubtful cases it might be more helpful, instead of getting a second doctor, that the patient should have the assistance of a neutral person similar to the "prisoner's friend," for instance, in court martial proceedings, to elicit facts favourable to the patient?

Chairman: Will you take that point, Mr. Lobjoit?

Witness: I think that the justice is the "prisoner's friend."

5204. I meant, to assist the justice, so that the facts may be got out?—No. I view with a great deal of abhorrence the appointment of any more official persons in connection with this matter. He would, after all, be an official, and look upon the matter with an official mind.

5205. Chairman: I suppose one has to keep in mind the desirability of preventing the appearance of a court or of a judicial investigation as much as possible. I suppose that is what you mean when you say you do not want any more officials?—I think the more that you can bring it into line with ordinary hospital treatment the better.

Chairman: We are much obliged to you, Mr. Lobjoit.

(The Witness withdrew.)

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD LOVSEY, J.P., and
Dr. T. C. GRAVES, B.Sc., F.R.C.S.

Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD LOVSEY and Dr. T. C. GRAVES, B.Sc., F.R.C.S., called and examined.

5206. Chairman: Mr. Lovsey, I understand you are accompanied by Dr. Graves?—That is so.

5207. Is Dr. Graves Superintendent of the Rubery Hill Asylum?—Yes, and Hollymoor.

5208. You yourself, Mr. Lovsey, are an Alderman of the Birmingham City Council, and have been a member of that body for 24 years?—That is so.

5209. And have you been for 14 years a justice of the peace for the City of Birmingham?—That is so.

5210. A member of the Asylums Committee for 10 years and chairman since November, 1923?—Yes.

5211. You have had to work the existing code in so far as it falls within your province?—Yes.

5212. In the matter with which we are concerned, of certification, detention and care, have you encountered any difficulties in working the Act, any points at which you considered there might be improvement in procedure?—Only what I have suggested in the précis of my evidence.

5213. I understand that you consider it desirable that in the case of private patients as well as pauper patients the magistrate should see the patient?—I do.

5214. That is to say, he should see the patient before admission?—Quite so.

5215. Have you private patients in your asylum?—Yes.

5216. They have, of course, the right, if they have not been seen before admission by a justice, to ask to be brought before a justice within seven days, have they not?—I believe it is incumbent upon the medical superintendent to inform them that such is the case.

5217. Do you know if that has been taken advantage of to any extent by patients under your charge?—I cannot say that I have any personal knowledge of it at all.

5218. Then as regards the different procedure in the case of pauper patients and private patients, are you in favour of abolishing the distinction in the matter of certification?—I would place them exactly on all fours with each other, that is to say, I would treat the rate-aided patient exactly as the private patient is treated.

5219. Have you considered from the public point of view the question of the necessity for two certificates for every rate-aided patient?—I am certainly in favour of it. The committee have never discussed it as a policy, but I am certain that they would be quite in favour of such a policy.

5220. You see, what we are rather impressed with is this, that it might in many cases be superfluous. For instance, take cases as to which there can be no doubt at all: a second medical certificate merely means saying ditto to the previous one at double the cost. The real difficulty arises in cases that are on the border line?—Yes, but I would even go further than that. I would do it to allay any legitimate apprehension that certain people might have as to the probability of someone being incarcerated in a mental hospital who should not be so incarcerated, and if it were verified by a second medical man it might allay that apprehension.

5221. Let us examine that a little. I am not at all sure that there is not as much apprehension in the public mind that private patients are being improperly detained as there is that pauper patients are being improperly detained; and now every private patient has two certificates?—I should say there is more apprehension, probably, in the case of private patients.

5222. Is it the presence or absence of two certificates that really is the important matter from the point of view of allaying public apprehension?—To be perfectly candid, speaking for myself at the moment, I do not raise any objection at all from the point of view of there being only one certificate, because I am convinced that every inmate in our institution is there justifiably; but I repeat that I do appreciate that it is possible that others do not agree with me, and I would do it to allay their legitimate apprehensions.

5223. But the whole question which we have to consider is whether the apprehension is legitimate?—I have not any doubt about it. I am certain it exists—wrongly, I think.

5224. But the question we have to consider is whether the second certificate which you suggest would really have any substantial effect in allaying such apprehension?—Only that there is safety in numbers.

5225. Apparently the doubt is entertained even more in the case of the private patient, who has already two certificates?—Yes, I am afraid that is so.

5226. If the doubt exists, and exists in even stronger form, in the case of the private patient, how are we to allay anxiety in the case of the pauper patient by giving him another certificate?—Might I reply to that by putting a question to you, Sir?

5227. If you will?—Why should a man or a woman who is a rate-aided inmate not be treated exactly the same as a private patient? That is the question that is frequently put, and it is really hard to answer.

5228. Personally—I am only speaking for myself—I do not think there is any answer. But it may be that the assimilation should be in the form of having only one certificate for the private patient?—Probably that would meet the case. I think the contention is verified rather more in the case of a private patient than it is in the case of a rate-aided patient.

5229. The way I am putting it is this: Every new formality that one adds costs money; money is in one sense unimportant, contrasted with the question of public safety and public assurance, but, on the other hand, before any additional safeguards are devised, any Commission would have to be satisfied that they were of real value and therefore value for money, if I may so put it, and that they were not empty formalities?—Quite.

5230. I suggest for your consideration this, that whereas in the general case there is very little doubt at all of the insanity of a person brought before a justice, there are a certain number of cases as to which there is really room for doubt; and that if in those cases a second opinion were called for by either the justice or the doctor, so as to protect such a case, in that way you would get an adequate security without the formality of having two certificates to certify a raving lunatic, so to speak. How does that idea commend itself to you?—There is a good deal of truth in what you have said, Sir. As a matter of fact I do not think the question would have ever been raised, were there not the differentiation between the two classes of patients.

5231. That of course at once leaps to the eye, and does not seem to have any justification. The protection of one is just as important as the protection of the other, of course?—Exactly so.

5232. The question we have to consider is what is the best form of protection for both. Do you say that it is necessary for the protection of both that there should be two certificates?—I did not start with that premise, Sir. My contention is that if it is deemed necessary for the one, equally it is necessary for the other. That is the sum and substance of my submission.

5233. And the differentiation is liable to cause the feeling that the one class is not so well protected as the other?—That is the gist of the whole thing.

5234. But what we are particularly concerned with is to see that all classes are adequately protected, either by the existing law or by some modification of it?—I am sure of that.

5235. What one wonders is whether the existing system, modified in the direction of assimilating the rate-aided cases to the private cases, would be sufficiently protective, by having the justice of the peace or judicial authority, plus a medical certificate of one practitioner, coupled with the right to call in an additional opinion in any case in which either the justice of the peace or the medical practitioner had any doubt at all?—And who would determine that, Sir?

5236. Of course, again you would have to leave it to the medical practitioner or the justice of the peace, who might have some doubt?—Quite.

5237. Either of them should have the right to say, "This case must not be disposed of without an additional opinion"?—I quite agree.

5238. In any procedure that you have, at some time or other one has to rely upon the discretion of somebody who is carrying it out. The whole point is at what point are we to rely upon the safeguard?—Would not that largely depend upon the condition of the patient under discussion?

5239. Yes, that would be the obvious fact; but if a person were brought before a justice of the peace in a condition in which even a layman could have no doubt whatever, would another certificate, at the cost, I may remind you, of an additional guinea, probably be of any real value, do you think?—Only, to fall back upon what I have submitted, to allay the apprehension. I might say that in the case of patients I have seen prior to signing orders for their admission, as a layman I should have no doubt whatever in my mind as to the legitimacy of those persons' detention.

5240. That is interesting. You have had considerable experience, have you not, in acting as a judicial authority in private cases?—Not in private cases.

5241. You were acting as justice of the peace in certification?—Yes.

5242. You must, of course, have seen the patient yourself?—Yes.

5243. Do you say that in a considerable experience you have never had a case in which there was any doubt present to your mind as to the insanity of the person before you?—Not the slightest. It would be obvious to anyone who had small powers of observation that it was a fitting case for detention.

5244. Apart from a perusal of the medical certificate?—Absolutely.

5245. Is not that rather unusual, that you have had no cases that presented any difficulty to your mind? Cases are not always easily discernible by the layman?—I do a lot of knocking about amongst people of all descriptions, particularly the class of people who find their way into our mental hospitals. Whether it is because of that or not, I do not know, but I have not the slightest difficulty in my mind in declaring that that person was a fitting subject for detention in a mental hospital.

5246. Then you have no cases which have been border line cases in your experience?—No, they will have been well over the border.

5247. Another matter you wish to draw our attention to is the number of aged persons who are sent from the workhouses to asylums because they show signs of mental unsoundness towards the end. What is your view about them?—Well, Sir, it does appear to us, as a committee, undesirable to have sent to our mental hospitals men and women who are fairly aged, who show no signs of insanity, as I should term it, but who are suffering more from senile decay or ultra-senility. It does appear to us undesirable that people who have been in the workhouse, either in what is known as the body of the workhouse or in the infirmary for years, simply because they have become rather troublesome and probably certifiable should be certified as being insane, and sent to the asylum, to end their days in such an institution. The friends and relatives resent it, and it is hard work to convince them that the patients are mad. They contend, and we think rightly, that they should be allowed to remain in the workhouse or workhouse infirmary to end their days rather than end them in a lunatic asylum. It is looked upon as being a stigma; in fact, they look upon the stigma of lunacy as being more pronounced than the stigma of felony, and they would prefer to remain under the parochial authorities rather than be sent to a lunatic asylum, and I personally very much share that objection.

5248. Of course, we know that there is a hope that these unfortunate associations with asylums may diminish as time goes on, with more enlightenment and improved administration?—It is a long way off, I am afraid.

5249. You think the stigma will remain for some time to come?—I am positive of it, it is so deeply rooted, particularly among the working classes and the poorer section of the community. It may or may not be so with other classes, but I know it is with those particular classes.

5250. Various expedients have been suggested for getting rid of it, such as associating mental wards with general hospitals, so as to give the impression that it is just a form of illness like any other illness, or by associating cases which are not certified with the asylums and allowing voluntary boarders to enter for voluntary treatment without certification, in order to avoid the idea that every person who went to an asylum was necessarily certified as a lunatic. Do you think that some expedient of that sort would help to remove the stigma?—I think it would. It would then be known that a man or woman could enter voluntarily, and it would help largely to mitigate the objection that now obtains. The question of allowing voluntary boarders to enter our institution has my hearty approval, and also the approval of the committee of which I am a member.

5251. If there were boarders in your asylum it would not be the case that every person in your asylum was a certified person?—No. Might I give an analogous case to that which you have just suggested, Sir?

5252. If you please.—Prior to the war there were many (without giving any numbers at all) people who were very ill, who would never allow themselves to be removed to a workhouse infirmary. During the war we all know that those infirmaries were used similarly to a general hospital, and to-day we find in Birmingham, and presumably right up and down the country, that the workhouse infirmaries are taking in what one might call paying guests; and that has to a large extent broken down the antipathy that existed prior to the period I have just mentioned. So that I think what you have just suggested is a very good idea and would help largely to break down the objection that one has to allowing one's friends to enter a lunatic asylum. I think it is an analogy, Sir.

5253. You want to get away from the idea of a place in which all the persons are stamped with the hall-mark of certification?—Either as paupers or lunatics, exactly.

5254. Now as regards the important matter of detention, you, of course, have been on the visiting committee, have you not?—Yes.

5255. Is it Rubery Hill?—I am on the Winson Green sub-committee and the Rubery Hill sub-committee, which of course form the full committee when combined.

5256. As a member of those committees do you visit the institutions yourself?—Yes, frequently.

5257. There seems to be prevalent an idea that patients do not really get access to the visitors and talk to them about their grievances, and that the visits do not afford a real opportunity to patients of communication with the outside world through the members of the committee. Will you give us your own experience, Mr. Lovsey? To what extent have you found patients taking advantage of your presence to discuss their troubles with you?—Well, Sir, whenever one visits the asylum one is always approached by many inmates who are always ready to lay before you their troubles, and particularly their desires to obtain their discharge. Every facility is granted to any inmate who wishes to approach any member of the committee. They are always listened to with great care and attention, and if they have made an impression upon any member of the committee, they are particularly mentioned to the superintendent, and, again, the superintendent is very willing to listen to the impressions which have been made after conversations with the patients.

5258. Of course you must rely, I suppose, to a considerable extent upon the medical superintendent, must you not?—Undoubtedly.

5259. Suppose a complaint is made to you by a patient who says that he or she is ill-treated, and then you refer the matter to the medical superintendent afterwards, and he says: "Oh, you need not listen to him, that is just one of his delusions"—what would happen then? What would your own attitude be if that happened in one of your cases?—It does not follow at all that we should accept the dictum of the superintendent. If we thought that the patient had just cause for a complaint, an inquiry would be instituted; they have been instituted before now on more than one occasion.

5260. I think in your institutions you show a considerable degree of independence with regard to your medical superintendent; because you have discharged patients, I believe, against the wishes of your medical superintendent, or at least without his approval?—Yes. You are referring now obviously to the case I mentioned in my précis of evidence?

5261. Yes?—That is so. Might I explain how that happened?

5262. If you please?—It was a case of a man who was admitted into the asylum after an attempt to commit suicide. His wife and friends thought he had sufficiently recovered and they made an application to the committee for his discharge. I happened to have known the man personally and his friends, and they approached me, and I interceded personally on behalf of the patient.

5263. What were the medical superintendent's views about it?—I was just coming to that. The medical superintendent warned us that it would be rather a dangerous thing to allow the patient to take his discharge. Well, Sir, we politely ignored the warning of the medical superintendent and the patient was liberated.

5264. That would take place before three members of your visiting committee?—That was before the whole sub-committee. The patient was liberated, and within a few weeks of his liberation he drowned himself, and strange to say, I met the patient himself, as he was evidently on his way to do it, as it only happened within an hour or so after my seeing him.

5265. When you saw him did he seem to be all right?—Quite all right.

5266. Although he was on his way to commit suicide?—Yes. Of course the way we should argue in a case like that would be this, that when a man or woman who had attempted to commit suicide is taken before a magistrate, invariably the case is adjourned for a month by the magistrate and at the end of that month that individual is discharged, and we argue that if the justices are prepared to take that risk, we, in that particular case, felt that we were not doing a deal of harm if we took a similar risk. We did it, and, if I may say so, it has taught us a lesson.

5267. Of course it is exceedingly difficult to diagnose the state of mind, and it is particularly difficult for a layman, even an experienced layman, to know?—Just so.

5268. Pursuing the question of your visits, do you think it is possible that patients might be afraid to put complaints before you, lest they might be hauled over the coals by the persons they complain against. A tale-bearer, even in ordinary society, is not much appreciated?—Quite so.

5269. And it has been suggested that patients might have it made worse for them if they went and complained to the visitors?—That is quite a natural conclusion, I think; but replying to your question generally, it is rather remarkable the few complaints that one does meet with as to any individual or individuals. On the contrary, one has had expressions of appreciation of the help the staff have given to the patients.

5270. Of course the hypothesis of my question was this, that the complaints did not reach you at all, because the patients were afraid to make them?—That is not my experience at all.

5271. On the other hand, have you had patients coming before the committee with complaints?—Yes.

5272. And have such cases been investigated by you?—Yes—not in every case, because they have been so trivial. We have not really thought it necessary to investigate them.

5273. Have you found to any extent that the attendants are liable to lose their temper or to ill-treat patients? Have you had any disciplinary cases to deal with in recent times?—If I were to say that we have not had cases where an attendant has lost his temper, it would not be strictly accurate. We have had one or two cases where they have lost their temper, and it is a marvel to me, if I may say so, that the attendants really keep their temper as well as they do. We instruct all the attendants, male and female, that under no circumstances, whatever provocation they might receive from the patient, must they retaliate, and I believe on the whole that that is loyally adhered to by the attendants.

5274. One can readily realise that the provocation in many cases must be very severe?—Extraordinary provocation. I will give you a case if I may. It was in the airing court, and a female nurse was there, of course, with the patients, and without the slightest provocation one of the patients went up to this lady, making use of a vile expression, and struck the nurse a violent blow on the face. I am afraid if I had been the nurse I should not have taken it so philosophically as she did, but she did; she acted like a heroine, and I am afraid that is probably only one example of what happens on many occasions.

5275. One can well understand the strain to which the attendants are put. Now have you, in point of fact, had to dismiss any attendants in recent years for ill-treatment of patients?—There was one occasion where a patient did bring a charge of alleged assault against the attendant. We could not get any reliable corroborative evidence, but we had it at the back of our minds that there was more than a semblance of truth in what the patient said. The attendant, being a probationer, was told that his services would be no longer required; in short, he was dismissed.

5276. Then you must have been pretty well satisfied that the story was true, or true in part?—I have just admitted that while we had no corroborative evidence, there was more than a semblance of truth in the patient's story. On the other hand, we were convinced that the attendant had had great provocation, but he was comparatively a new hand who had not become inured to his surroundings, but, still, the man's services were dispensed with.

5277. Is that the only case in which you have had to dismiss an attendant within recent years?—That is the only case I can remember during the whole of my service on the committee.

5278. Have you had to reprimand in any cases?—No, that is the only disciplinary case of such a character that has been dealt with in 10 years.

5279. Then you have had complaints of ill-treatment which you have investigated, and is that the only one in which you have found what you call a semblance of truth?—No. We have had cases where patients have made a complaint that they have been rather roughly treated, but when we investigated the charge it was found probably that the patient had had a fit or had become very obstreperous, and that it had been necessary for the attendant to hold him or her down, and the patient had been under the impression that he or she was being ill-treated in a culpable way.

Dr. T. C. GRAVES, B.Sc., F.R.C.S.

5280. Is there anything else you would like to put before us that we have not elicited from you?—Yes, if I may do so. I am certain that a deal of the opposition and adverse criticism that are meted out to those who administer the Lunacy Acts, and those who are employed in our institutions, largely comes from, as I have said in my evidence, busybodies. I say it advisedly, because I think I know what I am talking about. I know some of these people. Every locality has got them. My experience is this: There is a certain section of the public who are never happy except when they are blaspheming the people who hold public positions. I hear a certain amount of dissent from the members of the public who are present, but that is a proof that I am not pleading to the gallery when I make that statement. If this is considered in any way irrelevant I will not pursue it, but I feel very strongly on the matter.

5281. I think every public official who does any form of public work is exposed to criticism both adverse and favourable; it is an incident of public life?—That is all that he or she expects. Take that case quoted in the précis of my evidence with regard to what was stated in the election literature.

5282. I am afraid we cannot go into that; that is a very large topic?—Yes, but my point is this, that it is statements of that character that keep alive and foster the prejudice meted out to institutions like lunatic asylums.

5283. There is no doubt that the subject matter with which you have to deal in administering the Lunacy Laws is peculiarly subject to sinister suspicions; the subject matter you are dealing with is peculiarly open to that class of suspicion. That is one of the difficulties. I do not suppose you mean more than this, that people who have to administer a subject which is so suspect are more exposed than probably any other persons to adverse criticism?—I think they are in connection with the administration of the Lunacy Laws.

5284. You have yourself spoken of the stigma which attaches to lunatics; therefore the whole subject itself is apt to be invested with a more than usual degree of suspicion?—Quite so.

5285. You would welcome any means that could be taken to allay such suspicion, and to remove the causes of it?—Absolutely.

5286. Miss Madeleine Symons: Mr. Lovsey, is there any reason for the transfer of this considerable number of old people from the workhouses to the mental hospitals in Birmingham?—I believe the real reason is, or largely is, because of the want of space in the workhouses; it is a case of overcrowding; that is the primary reason why we get them.

5287. Probably your asylum rate is not any lower than the workhouse rate?—In our case it is lower.

5288. Do you think that may have anything to do with it?—I do not think so at all. Whether it is because the attendants in the workhouse have not the same experience in dealing with people who are deemed to be mad or not, I really do not know.

5289. Earl Russell. Might I suggest to you, Mr. Lovsey, that perhaps one method of dispelling this prejudice of which you speak would be for people like you, who know what an asylum is really like, to give an occasional popular lecture upon the subject, so as to get into people's heads the fact that it is a place for treatment like sick treatment, and not a dungeon?—I am afraid if I were to do that, if I were to point out the advantages of an asylum over a workhouse, we should have more than we wanted.

Earl Russell: Did we not have some evidence from Birmingham of a certifying justice?—

Chairman: Yes, Mr. Lord and Sir John Barnsley.

5290. Earl Russell (to the Witness): You have certified cases also, I understand, in Birmingham?—Yes.

5291. Do I remember rightly that in Birmingham it was the habit to take them direct to the mental hospital and not through the workhouse?—Quite. They come from their own homes largely, and sometimes we get them from the police.

5292. Generally direct to the asylum and not through the workhouse?—That is so.

5293. Is the patient generally brought to the justice, or does the justice go to the patient?—In my case they have taken me to the patient.

5294. You do not generally, I suppose, bring the patient anywhere near the police court if you can help it?—Not if it can be avoided—never—except when it is a police case, of course.

5295. And if I remember rightly, the other certifying justice who gave evidence said that he had never had any difficulty in the cases that were brought before him—he never had any doubt?—Were they not dealing with private patients?

5296. No, I do not think so; I do not recollect that they were. Now I want to ask you about a sentence in your précis in which you say “The committee have on several occasions, against the advice of the medical superintendent, taken full responsibility and have either discharged the patient or allowed him or her out on leave of absence on trial.” Do you mean that although the medical superintendent said the patient was not fit to go out, the committee have sent him out under the three signatures, as they can do?—Yes, and excepting the case that I quoted to the Chairman I do not know that anything serious has happened; it was never reported to us.

5297. Are those cases where the medical superintendent did not say it was dangerous, but said he did not consider the patient was cured?—Yes, that is so, exactly.

5298. If he had said he was dangerous, you would not have done it, I suppose?—We should have hesitated, undoubtedly.

5299. Would you have done it just the same if he had said it would be bad for the patient's ultimate chance of recovery?—I am positive we should not have done it.

5300. But you see it is a considerable responsibility to take, for three lay members of the committee entirely to disregard the medical superintendent's advice?—Yes, but let me say it is not done very often; I have, however, known of cases where it has been done.

5301. You finish, I notice, by saying that the “results have not always been satisfactory from the point of view of the life of the patient”?—I said that in view of the case that I have just mentioned.

5302. Mr. Jowitt: I want just to follow up Lord Russell's line of thought, Mr. Lovsey. You have told us of this case of the man who committed suicide. How many cases have there been that you can recall?—Not another at all.

5303. Then may I take it, that in only one case to your knowledge at the present time have the visiting committee acted without the approval of the medical officer?—No, I do not say that. I thought you meant how many cases do I remember where we have acted against the medical officer's advice that we should not let the case out, and it turned out badly.

5304. No, I am asking you about the general principle. In how many cases have you acted without the approval of your medical officer?—I should say, at the very outside, in my 10 years' experience, it would not exceed 15.

5305. The number surprises me very much; it seems to me a large number?—In 10 years?

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD LOVSEY, J.P., and
Dr. T. C. GRAVES, B.Sc., F.R.C.S.

5306. Yes?—I do not think so, if you will allow me to say so.

5308. Was the particular lesson that it taught you this: that in future you were not going to let people out without the express approval of the medical officer?—I should hesitate once or twice before so doing.

5309. It means to say that in future you will, perhaps wisely, be slow to disregard medical opinion?—No, not necessarily that far. I said in the case of a man who had been admitted into the institution as a result of an attempt to commit suicide, yes; but in an ordinary medical case I do not know that if I thought I was justified, even against the doctor's advice, I should refuse to allow that patient to go out.

5310. We shall agree about this, I think, that as the result of the case you have mentioned, the opinion of your medical officer will weigh with you very greatly?—As it should do.

5311. Now I want you to help me on this point. Does it occur to you that the safeguards existing to-day may be sufficient in that very few people who are not properly certifiable get into an asylum?—Would you mind repeating your question?

5312. The safeguards to-day are such that the people who are certified are, in fact, insane at the time of certification?—Yes, I believe so.

5313. Let us assume that for the time being. The treatment in hospitals is such and so skilful that fortunately a considerable number of these people recover?—Yes.

5314. Now I want you to consider with me, if you will, the difficulty under which a person who was rightly certified, but who since certification, through the treatment, has recovered—the difficulty which that person has in getting out. Do you follow that?—Quite.

5315. And you know the old proverb, "Give a dog a bad name and hang it"?—I have heard it before.

5316. Does it not occur to you that it is probably much more difficult for a person who has been certified to get out than for a sane person to be certified?—Yes, to a large extent, but it is a question of placing confidence in your medical superintendent.

5317. Now really it comes to this, does it not, that apart from 15 cases in 10 years, that sort of case, a patient's only chance of getting out is if he can win the approval and support of the medical officer?—I think obviously so.

5318. It is perhaps inevitable, but that is the fact?—Yes, exactly. Apart from that, of course, his friends can bring the phase of the patient's condition before the doctor, who will then inquire into it, probably.

5319. But in practice that means calling in another doctor, and that involves expense?—I do not mean exactly that.

5320. But it does involve expense, does it not?—It would involve expense, but I do not exactly follow as to bringing in another doctor.

5321. You do not mean bringing in another doctor?—I do not think so.

5322. That, again, is a case where you would depend upon the report of the medical officer?—Yes, entirely.

5323. Now let us look at it for the moment from the point of view of the medical officer. Letting a patient out is obviously incurring a considerable amount of responsibility?—Yes.

5324. I mean to say even medical officers, I presume, are human?—Exactly.

5325. And the medical officer is bound to ask himself, "Well, if I let this fellow out and he goes and commits suicide, or something goes wrong, there will be an awful lot of trouble about this"?—It would depend. If the patient committed suicide while he was on trial, we probably should hear something of it, but if he or she committed suicide when they were totally discharged, the chances are that we should not.

5326. You might or might not, but, at any rate, you will agree to this extent, that the task to which the medical officer has to address himself is one which does involve great responsibility?—Undoubtedly.

5327. And you can readily understand, can you not, that a man may hesitate to take great responsibility?—And rightly so.

5328. Quite so. Therefore you can quite understand a medical officer of an asylum who is reluctant, naturally and properly reluctant, to say, "You may go; I discharge you as cured"?—Unless he is quite convinced, exactly.

5329. Can you suggest to me from your great experience any procedure, or do you think it desirable to have any additional procedure to enable people who have once got in, and rightly got in, to get out?—Other than the procedure now in existence, of course?

5330. Yes?—I am afraid I cannot. I mean it all depends upon the competency or otherwise of your medical staff. If the medical superintendent is backed up, as I am certain we are, at all events in Birmingham, by a reliable medical staff, what you have just suggested should be very improbable, if not impossible.

5331. Your experience comes to this, does it, that nobody is detained longer than is absolutely necessary?—Well, Sir, I make allowances for the weakness peculiar to human nature which you suggest even doctors possess, but apart from that I have no apprehension at all as to there being anybody in our institution who ought to be out. I cannot see the advantage of it. There cannot be any advantage in keeping a patient in who ought to be out.

5332. What I am putting to you is simply this point: The reluctance of a medical man to incur what is, you and I agree, a very grave responsibility?—Exactly.

5333. You cannot suggest any improvement in the existing regime though?—I do not think I can. Again it is a matter of competence on the part of your medical staff.

5334. Do any members of your visiting committee happen to be doctors?—There is one just recently added, but the answer to your question is really in the negative, because he has not sat on the committee.

5335. But I may take it that you would welcome the inclusion of doctors on the visiting committee?—Quite.

5336. And you would do what you could to support it?—Undoubtedly.

5337. Do you know with regard to certain asylums there are voluntary associations of people who make it their business to go round and visit? Have you heard about that?—I believe I have read somewhere of where they do exist, but anyhow they do not exist in Birmingham, and I should very much question whether it is desirable.

5338. You would not think it desirable?—I do not think so.

5339. Now just a question or two about a different matter. With regard to complaints, here again, rightly or wrongly, as you have just been saying, there is a popular impression that certain patients in your asylums are not well-treated?—Yes.

5340. And your conviction after years of close experience is that it is quite unfounded?—Absolutely unfounded.

5341. Let me just ask you this: Can you give me any sort of figures as to the number of complaints which are brought before you in the course of a year?—I could not.

2 December, 1924.]

Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD LOVSEY, J.P., and
Dr. T. C. GRAVES, B.Sc., F.R.C.S.

5342. Should I be right in saying 50, or 10, or 100?
—You are nearer the mark at 10.

5343. A very small number?—A very small number.

5344. Did I understand you to say—I think it was in answer to the Chairman or to Lord Russell—that you had only once in consequence of a complaint taken disciplinary action?—That is so.

5345. How long ago was that?—I should think it was two years ago.

5346. And in the course of your 10 years' experience that is the only time you remember disciplinary action being taken?—Absolutely.

5347. So that if that is known, the odds against a complaint being found proved would appear to be heavy?—Exactly.

5348. Does it occur to you, that that might make people reluctant to put forward complaints?—I do not think so for a moment. I can only speak again of the personnel in the Birmingham institutions, and knowing them, as I think I do, they would not be backward in coming forward if they had any complaints to make. There is no real risk at all, apart from their apprehensions of what might happen.

5349. Quite, it is just that; it is the apprehension, be it right, or be it wrong, of what may happen to them?—Yes, but I do not think they would hesitate to say so at all. I mean if their apprehensions were well founded, and it came to our notice that any of the officials had in any way attempted to "get their own back," that man or woman would be instantly dismissed, I am positive of that.

5350. Do not you think that the apprehension, which might be quite ill-founded, that steps might be taken, might prevent people putting forward complaints?—I can assume it is quite reasonable to suppose that.

5351. We can test it to a certain extent. You tell us what the patients say after they have been discharged, because after they have been discharged they are free agents, and after they have been discharged that apprehension need no longer exist?—True.

5352. And your evidence is that when they are discharged they are asked to make complaints, and I think you told us that you had practically had no complaints made?—Practically none.

5353. I should like to clear this up. Are you quite clear that, when you ask for complaints, at that moment of time the patients understand that they have been discharged?—They are before the committee to be discharged; they know that. This happens before they are discharged.

5354. But "to be discharged" is rather an ambiguous phrase. Are they before the committee who are going to consider whether they will be discharged or not, or has the sentence of discharge been pronounced before complaints are asked for?—It is before.

5355. Does it not occur to you that it would be very much more valuable if you got your complaints after the sentence of discharge had been pronounced?—Let me correct, if I may, my statement. The patients are very often told that the committee are considering the advisability of discharging them, or allowing them out on parole. They are told at the same time, "You will be pleased to know that the doctor has recommended you for consideration for discharge because of your improved condition." I think I can see what is at the back of your mind; they would be afraid to say they had been unkindly treated lest it should interfere with their discharge.

5356. Quite?—I do not think that obtains; they frequently speak across the table to the medical superintendent, and say how pleased they are with the doctor who has been attending them, and so on.

5357. This is the point: supposing a man, before the sentence of discharge has been pronounced, makes a complaint; that involves an investigation?—Yes, but it would not involve his or her incarceration pending an enquiry into that complaint.

5358. Do you think the patient is quite clear as to that?—The patients are all right; I mean they are not greenhorns; they know exactly what the position is; they are not so simple as some people imagine. What I should like to see, if I might suggest it, is that some members of the Commission should come and see the procedure and watch the discharge of patients.

5359. I would like you to consider in your own mind as to whether you would not get more valuable evidence in the future if you were to say to a patient, "You are now discharged, and nothing will make any difference to you. Now have you any complaint to make"?—I will give you this promise on behalf of the committee, that that procedure shall be adopted.

5360. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You said that you had never had any difficulty in making up your mind as to whether a person brought up before you as a supposed lunatic was other than insane?—That is so.

5361. Have you ever had any difficulty in deciding as to whether a patient is so far recovered that he should be discharged from hospital?—No.

5362. So that you would be rather of opinion that a decision as to whether a person is sane or insane is a matter which a person with a lot of experience in the world like yourself is capable of deciding?—I should say it is helpful anyhow. I should say "yes" to your question.

5363. Do you think it is necessary to have justices specially detailed for the purpose of dealing with cases who are suspected of being insane, or do you think it would be a matter which every man who is fit to be a justice could deal with?—I have submitted that every justice should be someone eligible to sign the documents in question.

5364. Do you think it would be an advantage to have the medical certificates given by men who have specially studied this subject, and have devoted themselves to certifying these cases?—I think so, yes, because the disease of insanity is one with regard to which the man who deals with it should be a specialist; it is better to have a specialist in such diseases rather than an ordinary medico. That is how it appeals to me as a layman.

5365. Which would you consider would be the better able to judge, an ordinary medico or a justice of the peace?—An ordinary medico, surely, just as a doctor could not do a policeman's job.

5366. Have you in Birmingham any arrangement for looking after patients who are let out on trial?—Yes.

5367. Is that attached to the hospital, or is it merely part of the After-care Association?—No, we have not an After-care Association, but we have a paid official who visits the patients during their parole, and who gives them the necessary advice and frequently monetary assistance.

5368. Earl Russell: I suppose they have the ordinary allowance anyhow?—Very often, but not in every case. If it was a case in which it is deemed necessary, it is done on a fairly decent scale, while they are on their parole.

5369. Sir Humphry Rolleston: That works very well, indeed, does it not?—Very well, indeed.

5370. Sir David Drummond: Have you a hospital for incurables in Birmingham?—Perhaps Sir Ernest can help me here; I do not know whether Jaffray Hospital comes under that head.

Sir Ernest Hiley: No, I do not think it does.

5371. Sir David Drummond: You know that in many districts there are hospitals for incurables; some are rate-aided and some are voluntary hospitals?—I believe that is so.

5372. Is it not conceivable that some of the senile patients, these incurable patients, could be treated in an incurable hospital just as in the case of any ordinary incurable malady, instead of being sent to a Poor Law institution to die there?—I do not think so; I think the idea is to let them remain where they are.

5373. I am sorry to hear you say that. I think that suggestion is rather a happy one, and it might be a solution of the difficulty?—I was wondering whether the two cases are parallel. Here are people who have been for some one reason or another in a workhouse, and they are suffering from old age or senile decay. Why not let them remain where they are?

5374. They are incurable cases, but you have no experience of them, I understand?—No experience at all.

5375. Sir Ernest Hiley: Can you tell me what is your percentage of re-admissions in Birmingham?—(Dr. Graves): Our figures have varied lately, and I really could not give you them. I could let you have them before the Commission finishes.

5376. If you would, please. I would like myself to compare them with other figures that have been given us?—(Mr. Lovsey): I should think they are fairly large.

5377. Are they more than 30 per cent.?—(Dr. Graves): When I made up the figures in 1922 they were 25 per cent. Last year they worked out to about 10 per cent. I understand you to mean by re-admissions, cases which have broken down a second time over any period during their lives.

5378. That is quite right.—That might be 30 years' interval.

5379. How many come back within 12 months?—I could let you have the figures if you name 12 months.

5380. Chairman: Perhaps you might be good enough to write a letter to our Secretary, and let him have the figures* Sir Ernest Hiley desires?—Certainly.—(Mr. Lovsey): Might I say that if the Commission do visit any of these institutions, we should be delighted if they would include Birmingham in their itinerary.

Chairman: Thank you; we will make a note of that. We are much obliged to you for your evidence.

TENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 3rd December, 1924.

PRESENT:

THE RT. HON. H. P. MACMILLAN, K.C. (Chairman).

THE EARL RUSSELL.

SIR HUMPHRY ROLLESTON, BART., K.C.B., M.D.

SIR ERNEST HILEY, K.B.E.

SIR DAVID DRUMMOND, C.B.E., M.D.

MR. NATHANIEL MICKLEM, K.C.

MR. W. A. JOWITT, K.C.

MR. H. SNELL, M.P.

MRS. C. J. MATHEW.

MISS MADELEINE SYMONS.

MR. P. BARTER (Secretary).

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

Dr. HENRY YELLOWLEES, O.B.E., M.D., accompanied by Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND, called and examined.

5381. Chairman: This morning we have the advantage of the attendance of Dr. Henry Yellowlees, O.B.E., M.D., and Dr. Yellowlees is accompanied, I understand, by Mrs. Constance M. R. Crosland, who is a member of the Managing Committee of The Retreat. Dr. Yellowlees, you are Medical Superintendent of The Retreat at York?—That is so.

3 December, 1924.]

Dr. HENRY YELLOWLEES, O.B.E., M.D., and
Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5382. The Retreat is a registered hospital, I understand?—A registered hospital, yes.

5383. And you have only private patients in the Retreat?—Only private patients.

5384. Therefore we are not concerned with pauper cases at all?—That is so.

5385. You have been good enough to furnish us with some heads of the evidence which you are prepared to give us this morning, and perhaps we might just go through the several topics which you have noted. First of all, will you tell us about your registered hospital. When was it opened, and what has been done in the way of extending it or modernising it from time to time?—The Retreat originally was founded in 1792. It is unique among the registered hospitals, of which there are only 13 in the country, by being founded by the members of a religious body, namely, the Society of Friends. It is run and managed, however, on lines parallel to those of the other 12 registered hospitals in the country. The special feature of the management of a registered hospital is that it is run by a voluntary committee who receive no pay for their services, and who have no financial interest in the prosperity of the hospital; all the staff of the hospital are their salaried servants. Any surplus of income over expenditure in any year goes either to the improving of the institution, or to the lowering of the rates of board which are paid by patients.

5386. Then who appoints this Managing Committee?—It varies with the hospital. In the Retreat, which as I have said is unique by being founded in the first instance by the Society of Friends, the Committee are appointed by a larger body of directors who are themselves appointed by the Society of Friends at their quarterly meetings.

5387. You have told us the foundation is a very early one. What premises have you now?—Do you mean for how many patients?

5388. What class of premises? Sometimes the premises are all in one block; sometimes they are divided on the villa system. What type of house is it that you have?—It suffers like most old foundations from being rather ramshackle and unwieldy, inasmuch as new wings have been added on from time to time. It is not on what is called the villa system, but it has two or three detached villas in association with it. A larger number than that for a hospital of the type is not usual, nor is it very specially advisable.

5389. Are the buildings really the original buildings, which have been from time to time extended?—That is so.

5390. How long have you yourself been in charge?—I succeeded Dr. Bedford Pierce in March, 1922.

5391. And before that—it is interesting to have the record of your experience—what had you been engaged in doing?—I had been engaged in mental work, I was going to say since I was born, because I was born in a mental hospital.

5392. I was going to ask if we have the pleasure of seeing before us the son of a very distinguished Scotch alienist. You have been brought up in the atmosphere, so to speak?—I have, and in the faith. I was brought up in a mental hospital till I was 14. After doing general hospital work for a couple of years after I qualified, which was in 1910, I started mental hospital work in Perthshire in a small county asylum under Dr. Lewis Bruce. After about a year and a half of that I went to Morningside, Edinburgh, under Professor Robertson. I had not been there so very long when the war broke out. In France I was for three years mental specialist to the largest hospital area in France, and I personally saw and examined 2,200 cases of real or suspected mental disease, in addition to about twice that number of nervous cases and "shell-shockers," so called. After the war I worked for over two years more as senior assistant and deputy at Morningside, and then I was appointed to the Retreat.

5393. It is interesting, of course, to know the qualifications of gentlemen who hold such posts as you do. Evidently you have spent your life in the study and practice of this branch of medicine?—That is so.

5394. You have told us the general physical features of your institution, and how it is administered through a committee which is appointed by a body which originally founded the hospital?—That is so.

5395. Will you next tell us the number of patients and the number of beds you have?—We have nominally about 180. At the present moment we have 170 odd patients on our books. We are the fifth largest of the 13 registered hospitals in the country. The largest is St. Andrew's, Northampton, with 480 beds; the smallest is, I think, the Lawn, Lincoln, with 90 beds.

5396. Just before we come to further details as to your system, you might tell us how the finance is managed. Where are the funds obtained for the conduct of your institution?—Some of the registered hospitals are wealthy institutions and are endowed; many of them are poor, and practically their entire source of income, as in our case, is from the board paid by patients. There are a few small donations, bequests and legacies, and such like things, but by far the largest part of our income is the yearly income from the patients' fees.

5397. So that in a sense it is really a self-supporting institution?—It is a self-supporting charity.

5398. With some endowed funds?—And in a few cases with endowed funds.

5399. Then will you tell us next about your staff; what is it composed of?—Male and female mental nurses, and administrative officials over these. In our own case we have 53 female nurses and about 30 male nurses—I do not remember the actual number, but that is very near.

5400. What is the organisation of the staff?—It is precisely as in any other hospital—a matron, under whom I have three assistant matrons. The matron is over all the nursing staff, male or female. Under her there are three assistant matrons, all doubly qualified—that is to say, with qualifications both in general nursing and mental nursing, at least. One of these is over the male side, one of them is over the female side, and the third is the night superintendent—that is to say, over the whole house during the night.

5401. Have you charge of both the medical and the administrative business of the institution?—Certainly.

5402. A question has been raised as to whether entrusting the administrative business, the routine business, to the medical superintendent, is not apt to divert him from his purely medical work. Have you found that your administrative business occupies too large a part of your time?—I have not. It is a point on which I feel quite decidedly. Even if there are drawbacks in it, it is quite essential in a hospital of the kind that the medical head and the administrative head should be the same person.

5403. Why do you say that; we would like to know the reasons for that view?—I am afraid the reason is the good old reason of practical experience; it simply will not work otherwise.

5404. Of course, yours is relatively a small establishment; but when we come to the large public institutions, up to 2,000 beds, it has been suggested that the medical superintendent might be relieved of some of the routine administrative work, as it is apt to distract him from the special medical problems which he has to attend to?—I think that question was best answered in my knowledge by Dr. Shaw Bolton of Wakefield, who, when he was approached on the matter—I think it was a committee of the Board of Control or some committee who were investigating the matter—said, "Yes, my administrative duties are very, very serious; I have no doubt they occupy me a full quarter of an hour every day," and he is the head of an institution with 2,000 patients. In other words, he has the wisdom to delegate his duties.

5405. Earl Russell: You have an efficient private secretary and steward, or somebody of that sort, to relieve you of the routine duties?—I have, indeed, in this way: In some of the registered hospitals the whole financial business of the institution is carried out by an official in an office perhaps in the town, not in the institution at all. That, I think, is the ideal way. In our case it is not so; we have an official who lives in the place, and does all the financial work there. He is a trained accountant, and so on, and in some ways that arrangement has advantages. It means that whenever I am faced with anything of that kind, I can put it over to him at once, and he is immediately on the spot, and we work together. It avoids correspondence. Then I have a very efficient personal secretary, and a very, very fine staff.

5406. Chairman: Of course, in some cases it would depend upon the ability of the medical superintendent to delegate his work?—That is so, entirely.

5407. But with appropriate delegation of the merely routine matters, do you find yourself left sufficiently free to attend to your medical duties?—I think so, I am very certain of it; and, of course, I would like to add that almost every administrative problem in a mental hospital has a very strongly medical aspect, and you cannot differentiate the two without finding yourself in serious trouble very soon.

5408. You are conducting, in a sense, an hotel as well as a hospital?—That is so.

5409. Then I suppose what you wish to put before us is that the régime of your hotel is itself part of the treatment?—Exactly; it is subordinate to the hospital idea, which is the first thing.

5410. But as you have patients who are resident for long periods, a great deal of the benefit of the institution would depend upon the way in which the institution is conducted, as an hotel or as a home?—I agree with you entirely.

5411. Therefore you regard it as important that the medical superintendent should have a voice in the arrangement of matters that are not purely medical, but which may have an indirect bearing on the treatment of your patients?—I do, and I should think that the committees of management share that view.

5412. I think you have some views on the desirability of having women on the staff of registered hospitals?—Yes; I noted it down, because it has been a feature of the Retreat for many years. When I was speaking of the foundation of the Retreat I omitted its greatest glory, which I must be allowed to mention, namely, that it was the pioneer institution to initiate the humane treatment of the insane. It was the first institution in this country where the insane were treated humanely, and its founder was William Tuke, who was not, a physician but was a tea merchant in York. The story of the founding of the Retreat is possibly familiar to some of the Commission; in any case it is a thing upon which one could spend a long time. It is of interest to say that William Tuke gave evidence before a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1815 upon his methods in the Retreat, and the revolution in the treatment of the insane; and Mrs. Crosland, who is giving evidence before you to-day, is a lineal descendant of William Tuke.

Chairman: That is very interesting.

5413. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You do not suggest he was before Pinel?—I do not suggest it at all. As a matter of fact they were almost simultaneous. In the year 1792 Pinel was carrying on his work in the Bicêtre, but before that Pinel had done something at the Salpêtrière; and, I believe, that in actual time possibly Pinel may have been first. As a matter of fact, it is now said that both of these movements were later than one in Italy.

5414. Chairman: You might tell us—you, of course, are the head of the whole institution—what medical staff have you under you?—On the medical staff I have in normal times two besides myself. At the moment, or in a few days, I shall have three, but that is owing to incidental facts. My proper staff is two, one man and one woman.

5415. And do you consider it desirable that the medical staff should include, if possible, one qualified woman?—On the whole, yes. There are certain little drawbacks in working, especially in a small place where your male colleague may be off duty, where you have not another woman to relieve her, to take her duties when she is away, or where she has to relieve her male colleague when he is away; but on the whole, even admitting that, the advantages very much outweigh the drawbacks, especially in a hospital for private patients, I should say—in a hospital of this type.

5416. Do you allocate your patients as between your male and female assistants?—Yes, the male assistant has to be in charge of the male side, and the female assistant has to be in charge of the female side, which is rather a pity in some ways, because the male assistant is the senior, and it is an interesting fact that the female side is invariably in such hospitals as the Retreat, the bigger, and contains the more difficult and acute cases.

5417. Of course, one can appreciate that owing to the peculiar nature of the malady you have to deal with, many cases practically require a male practitioner, I should think?—Very often; but I do not think (certainly not in my experience at the Retreat, and also at Edinburgh, and I do not think in Dr. Bedford Pierce's 30 years at the Retreat) that there was ever really any difficulty owing to there being a lady on the staff.

5418. Then you think the presence of at least one woman on the staff of an asylum is desirable?—I do, and my Committee feel so very strongly, and on the whole I agree with them.

5419. Then we gather from Mrs. Crosland's presence here to-day that the Managing Committee has ladies on it? How is your Managing Committee composed at the moment?—(Mrs. Crosland): There are four women—three are appointed in the same way as the rest of the Committee by the directors, and I am appointed from the central governing body of the Society of Friends.

5420. They have the right of appointing?—They have the right of appointing two; they appoint one man and one woman.

5421. Earl Russell: How many men are there on the Committee?—Twelve altogether.

5422. Chairman: The whole Committee consists of 12 persons, of whom four are ladies?—Only four women. (Dr. Yellowlees): Twelve, and the Chairman and Treasurer—14 in all. That would be 10 men and four women.

5423. And do you find that the ladies interest themselves specially in the female side of the institution?—(Mrs. Crosland): Yes, I should say that, and, of course, in the general administration—all the kitchen part, and so on.

5424. And no doubt that assistance is very valuable. Now will you tell us next with regard to your nursing staff, how do you obtain them, and what qualifications do you require?—(Dr. Yellowlees): We obtain them either as the result of advertisement, or more usually because they apply to us. We happen to have a reputation as the best training school in the country for mental nurses; we have therefore practically never had any difficulty in getting candidates; even in the war years we were able to a certain extent not to take applicants whom we thought were unlikely to make good nurses.

5425. You have a choice, then?—As a rule we have a choice.

5426. Do you require any qualifications in those whom you appoint?—The usual references as to character and ability, and so on, just as a general hospital. We give a form of application—usually the last two posts held, or something of the kind; we send out the usual form of application, giving personal details and where educated, profession of father, general health, the last post of any kind, with name and address of employer. Then we write for references.

Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5427. These are persons who will have had no previous nursing experience?—None.

5428. You do not draw upon the general hospitals for nurses who have had some training in general hospitals?—The order of doing it is generally the other way; after they have had the mental training they proceed to the general. A nurse who has had general training sometimes comes to us and asks if she can go on, and we allow her a year off our course.

5429. We have heard, and indeed it is a matter of common knowledge, that some experience of general nursing is desirable for nurses who specialise ultimately in mental nursing, and it does seem to us a little difficult to accommodate the two together. Take the case you have given just now. A young probationer comes in, has been on for some time, shapes well, and has had some experience with you, and risen perhaps to a position of ward nurse with you: suppose she desires to have some general nursing experience, and goes to a general hospital, would she have to begin there as a probationer again?—The great majority of hospitals allow a year off the training to qualified mental nurses.

5430. To enable them to go to a general hospital, do you mean?—No. The general hospital has a three years' training course—issues its certificate at the end of the third year: if a nurse comes to a general hospital having already qualified in mental nursing, the general hospital will take her for a two years' course and give her a certificate at the end of it—some will not.

5431. She has not to begin at the beginning with the relatively menial work which one knows falls to the probationer in the first year?—That is so. Almost all the hospitals of note accept the arrangement I have mentioned, and the matter is reciprocal, although it is not nearly as reciprocal as it ought to be. The general hospitals sometimes show a little difficulty about it, whereas we are perfectly prepared to take any general qualified nurse and take a year off her training with us, and give her our certificate at the end of two years.

5432. Do you approve of the policy of interchangeability in this matter, that a nurse should pass from one to the other?—It is awfully difficult. We have an arrangement of the sort with the York County Hospital. Our nurses go there for six months' training to give them some idea of what a general hospital is like, and the difficulty is that it is hardly fair on the nurse. You get a half trained nurse in the end—you are apt to. If a person does not go through the proper course both of mental or of general, or whatever it is, but just has a look for six months here and exchanges with another nurse for six months there, she is apt to be a half trained person at the end—the continuity of the thing is broken.

5433. I suppose the idea of the advantage of general hospital training is this, that patients in the mental hospital may of course feel ill as any other persons may, and consequently a certain amount of general nursing would have to take place in a mental hospital?—That is so, but I do not think you have quite got it.

5434. Let us have it then?—For this reason: general nursing is essential in a person who is in a position of authority, and is going to stay permanently, or for any length of time, in a mental hospital; but you do not require general nursing to start with in the probationer whom you are going to train in your hospital just as fully, though possibly somewhat differently to the nurse who is being trained in a general hospital.

5435. Let me illustrate what I am thinking of by a concrete example. Suppose a patient in your institution becomes ill with pneumonia?—But they are all in bed to start with.

5436. But you have many of them who are up and about?—Later on.

5438. That is the point we are coming to?—Certainly, all the administrative officials, all the sisters and higher officials have got other training. The nurses are trained, not only in mental nursing, but in nursing the sick.

5439. You really have, therefore, on your staff nurses who are qualified to do general nursing, and would know what to do?—Certainly; we have a large proportion of doubly qualified people, which is more than a general hospital has. You might as well ask me what does a general hospital do when a case in it becomes mentally ill.

5440. Quite?—I am afraid I have not made it very clear. I am very sorry.

5441. Yes, you have.—How does the general hospital treat its pneumonia?

5442. But there would be in a general hospital nurses who have acquired experience in the well-known ailments?—And there always should be in a good mental hospital.

5443. That is the point I meant. In order to get that experience they must have had some general hospital experience before?—That is so. Everyone in a position of authority, and every department in a mental hospital, should have other nursing training as well as mental.

5444. Now on that practical question, we will have to consider whether any recommendation should be made that on the staff of mental hospitals there should always be nurses who have had general experience in a general hospital, and thus be able to deal with cases of ordinary illness arising in a mental hospital?—I should think you ought to consider that.

5445. Then that means again that some scheme would be required whereby nurses could pass for a time either from a general hospital to a mental hospital or vice versa?—I object to "passing for a time."

5446. Take your own nurses who are coming to you, intending to engage in the career of mental nurses. Is it your practice that such nurses leave you for a time to go to a general hospital?—It is the routine that they leave us. In this matter we are rather unusual, but we engage our nurses precisely as a general hospital does for a four-years' training. At the end of the third year they pass, what is up to now recognised as the standard examination on the subject, namely, the examination of the Medico-Psychological Association, which has recently been supplanted by the State examination. We keep them just as a general hospital does for a fourth year, during which we give them our own examination, and issue, just as the general hospital does, our own certificate. We are almost the only mental hospital that does so, and our certificate is known throughout the country as the stamp of a properly trained nurse. At the end of that training they leave us by routine automatically; it is a four years' contract.

5447. Earl Russell: Do you mean that you send them away at the end of the time even if they wish to stay?—If they wish to stay I think we should say we could not have them; we should possibly put them on our trained nurses' department for supplying to private cases.

3 December, 1924.]

Dr. HENRY YELLOWLEES, O.B.E., M.D., and
Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5448. Chairman: Does that mean that they leave at the end of four years unless they are promoted to some higher position?—That is so, and we will not promote them without further training.

5449. So that a nurse who has had the four years' specialised training with you would in the ordinary course go to a general hospital for a time?—That is what they very often do if they are going to continue; then they come back to us as sister or assistant matron. Just before I leave that: of late the method I have adopted in special circumstances is that I sent some of our fourth year nurses away to the County Hospital for six months, and at the end of six months brought them back, and they are now sisters. I have been sorry for it ever since, because they have had a certain amount of insight into the general work, but it is a half-and-half business, they are half-trained people; and I would rather have waited the full three years to give them a proper general hospital training as well.

5450. Then when you get past the stage of the probationer who is training, and when she has completed her four years, she would in the ordinary case, of course, pass to a general hospital and then come back to you for one of the higher posts?—That is so.

5451. So that the nurses who occupy the higher posts in your institution are persons who have not only had the specialised training, but have also had general training?—That is so.

5452. Is that invariable?—With us it is invariable.

5453. How many have you on your staff who have had the benefit of both specialised training and general hospital training?—The matron, her three assistants, and the sisters—nine people altogether.

5454. Then, of course, the advantage of these nurses who have not only a specialised but general training, is that they are able to direct the younger nurses in the treatment of cases?—That is so, and the training of nurses is a very important feature of our work.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Before you leave this, would you ask Dr. Yellowlees why for these higher posts it is not better to have a nurse who has, first of all, had the complete hospital training and has got a really good general education, and then comes to them and has a specialised training.

5455. Chairman: What do you say to that—do you think the general hospital training should be the beginning of the career, as Sir Humphry suggests?—I would like to hear what Sir Humphry said about general education.

5456. Sir Humphry Rolleston: It would seem an advantage that they should have a special education after, not before, they had a general education. There is probably some good reason in experience why that is not so?—I think, on the whole, that is true. One of the difficulties is this, that a general trained nurse will not be willing to come into a comparatively insignificant post in a mental hospital, and be under nurses who have not got a general certificate. On the other hand, if you bring your general nurse in and give her a fairly high post, her mental colleagues resent it very much. It is a constant difficulty. A mental trained nurse has to learn a good deal of general nursing. The preliminary examination of the General Nursing Council is precisely the same for all grades of nursing. There are certain fundamentals in nursing which are common to every special branch of nursing, hence the mental nurse is not nearly so much at sea in a general hospital as is the general nurse in a mental hospital. There are few things more pathetic than to see a nurse whom you know to be a good general nurse trying to deal with a mental case, if she happens not to have the ability or the training.

5457. Chairman: Sir Humphry's question really illustrates the difficulty that one feels of taking a person who has acquired a specialised training and putting her in among people possibly at a lower stage of their profession.—That is so; it is awfully difficult.

5458. Questions of prestige, of course, come in?—They constantly arise. On the whole, it seems to me to work better for the mental training to come first. I like the nurse to have her mental training, then go into general, and then proceed to get some higher post if she is going on in mental work. Mrs. Crosland has reminded me of a most important practical point, that most mental hospitals take nurses very much younger than a general hospital is prepared to, hence they start earlier.

5459. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Is that an excellent thing for them—is it not very bad for their health?—I do not think you would say so if you saw ours.

5460. What age do they come in at?—We have no specific limit at the Retreat, but we do not like to take them younger than 20. Many general hospitals do not have a nurse under 23. I believe 23 is the usual age.

5461. Chairman: Then following the suggestion that has been made, what may one take to be the complete curriculum. You start with the three years to get a Medico-Psychological certificate, and a further year to obtain the benefit of your special certificate—then possibly a year with a general hospital?—No, a full general course.

5462. Two years in a general hospital?—Yes.

5463. That would make six years?—Yes.

5464. At the end of the six years that nurse would be qualified, in your opinion, if she had shown reasonable progress, for one of the higher posts in your institution?—That is quite correct.

5465. Then with regard to obtaining the advantage of general training for your nurses at the end of their four years, have you any difficulty in getting places for your nurses, or have they difficulty themselves in getting places in general hospitals?—We have not.

5466. Where do you send your nurses to, is it in York?—No, by no means. The Edinburgh Royal has got a great attraction for our nurses—I do not know why. A good many of the Scotch places have; they write back to the matron saying, "If you have any more nurses like the last, I will be very glad; I can always do with probationers like the last." If they live near a large centre they get into one of the large hospitals in that centre.

5467. I have been told there is reluctance on the part of some of the general hospitals to take mental nurses and give them those advantages. Have you heard of that?—Yes, in some cases I believe that is so. We have not experienced it.

5468. Can you see any good reason for such reluctance?—Except, I think, the general public impression that a mental nurse is a person of a lower social status, and generally of worse behaviour than the completely untrained person.

5469. Is there any foundation for such a suggestion? Your experience does not look like it?—I must say we do not think there is, but of course we are a very small place, and we have got peculiar methods. We are a large and happy family, but I have not the least doubt there are bound to be black sheep everywhere. We are no better than our neighbours, but we have had a fortunate experience.

5470. At any rate, you give your approval to the principle that before a nurse completes her training for the position of permanent nurse in a mental institution, she should have had the advantage of some general training at some stage of her career?—Yes. It is a hard saying you know, when you are going to deal with a very large place which is going to support almost entirely chronic patients; it is a hard saying, but I believe it is the ideal thing. Before we leave the subject Mrs. Crosland asks me to add that it should be remembered (you spoke of the six years necessary) the nurse is earning during all this time, and incidentally she is earning very much more when she is a mental nurse than as general. That perhaps is the reason why they come to it first. There is no state of training which I know where a person is paid so well to be trained.

5471. You might tell us a little about that subject. Give us the conditions of the service, that is to say, the hours and wages and conditions generally?—May Mrs. Crosland answer that? She has the figures.

5472. If you please. Tell us what your nurses begin at, what their remuneration is, and what their hours are, and the conditions of the service.—(Mrs. Crosland): Shall I take pay first?

5473. If you please.—With regard to the women nurses, during the first year they earn £36 a year, in the second year £48, in the third £60, and in the fourth £72.

5474. Do they live in?—They live in.

5475. And is that with board found?—Everything found, including uniform. They begin with their own uniform, but if after a month it is decided to keep them on the staff they have a grant made for the cost of the uniform.

5476. That is the rate of remuneration.—Will you have the men's rate now?

5477. If you please.—First year £60; second year £72; third year £84; fourth year £96.

5478. Do these men live in also?—Yes.

5479. Are none of them married men?—I think there are one or two of the married men who live out. (Dr. Yellowlees): They can marry after that. With the men we do not keep so strictly to the four years' contract for many reasons; and if they marry they are allowed an additional sum of £35 per annum instead of the lodging which they lose, and they make their own arrangements to live out.

5480. The majority of your staff, both male and female, all the female and most of the male, seem to be resident?—No, not most of the male, a fair proportion of the male.

5481. Earl Russell: Less than half?—Rather less than half.

5482. Chairman: What about the hours of work?—(Mrs. Crosland): The women begin with breakfast at half past six; they are on duty from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. which sounds terrible, but they have off that half an hour allowed for lunch, half an hour for dinner, half an hour for tea, one hour allowed for rest, and then they have entirely off one whole day in the seven, half a day in the seven, and always half the Sunday, alternately the morning or the afternoon.

5483. If you add those up it seems to be 2½ hours in the day, and 2 days in the week in the aggregate?—Yes; the total working hours are four days of 10½ hours, one day of 5½ hours, one day of 6½ hours; that is an average week of 54 hours. (Dr. Yellowlees): With the men the average hours of work are 55.

5484. Earl Russell: On the same principle?—Except that they do not have the daily rest hour; they have it put together and added in half days, and so on. (Mrs. Crosland): Then they are paid rather more.

5485. Chairman: With regard to the hours of work which you have given us, of course the class of work which these nurses are engaged in is not continuous work; it is supervision, of course, but there must be periods when the nurse is sitting in a ward, not necessarily doing something all the time?—(Dr. Yellowlees): That is so. It depends entirely upon the part of the house the nurse is in. It may be going down town with a couple of ladies, it may be going to a theatre, and it may be a cricket match. These are the points that are never by any chance mentioned when we read of the terrible hours of people shut up with raving lunatics, and foolishness of that kind. In any wise hospital it is your duty to make the nurse's training include properly spaced spells with the various kinds of patient, and experience in the different classes of work.

5486. Would it not be more accurate to say the 54 hours you have given us are hours on duty, that is to say, at that time they are bound to be attending to their duty?—That is so.

5487. But the class of duty that is imposed upon them consists, I suppose, to a large extent in entertaining and amusing patients and looking after them?—At times. At other times if they are in the reception hospital it is jolly hard nursing. It varies. Sometimes it is as you say.

5488. They are moved about to the different departments?—Yes.

5489. A spell of work in one department, and then a spell in the other?—That is so, and incidentally they are extremely contented.

5490. For the actual menial work in the hospital, by which I mean scrubbing floors and washing up, and things of that sort, is that done by the nurses, or have you a staff of servants?—We have a staff of maids who do that.

5491. So that the work of your nurses is really nursing work?—It is really nursing work. Of course there is a certain amount of hewing of wood and drawing of water which does come into their probation work, and that is done, but I do not think there is nearly so much as a probationer in a general hospital gets.

5492. A certain amount of experience in all departments is quite useful no doubt. A great part of their work is not in any sense menial, but is really nursing work?—That is so.

5493. Apart from the experience which the nurses gain by the actual nursing which they do themselves under the supervision of the ward sister, and so on, do you give them any lectures, any form of teaching?—In each year of the training there is a course of 20 lectures by a medical officer. In addition to that in each year of the training there is a course of 20 practical demonstrations by the matron, or one of her trained assistants; that is to say, if you take each of these weekly you have 40 weeks in each year out of the 52 when there is a lecture or demonstration of some kind.

5494. Do you find your nurses are successful in the examinations which they have to pass for their qualifications?—Yes, we happen to have a fairly high proportion of passes.

5495. Do some fail to qualify?—Very few fail eventually to qualify. We only allow them two failures. There is a preliminary examination and a final both in the Medico-Psychological and the General Nursing Council, and if they fail twice in the preliminary, the matron and I see them, and just discuss with them whether they are really fitted for the profession, and are they taking it seriously, and have they ability for it.

5496. Have they time for study?—Ample, I should think.

5497. And have they facilities for their studying?—I mean have they a nurses' room, a quiet room where they can work in their rest time?—As regards the Retreat, they will have this in the course of a few months, when our new nurses' home is complete. At the present moment our accommodation is one of our weak points, but each nurse has a single bedroom for herself.

5498. And have you a library of books?—There is a small library.

5499. Of technical books, I suppose?—Not a technical library. Each nurse gets a present of technical books when she passes, but that is rather late to help her to study, is it not?

5500. Mr. Jowitt: She can borrow, I should think.—She can borrow or buy. The pains that are taken in the teaching of nurses, I think, in almost every mental hospital, is a thing for which on the whole sufficient credit is not given.

5501. Chairman: Do you find that you have a contented staff?—Of course, we think our staff are simply splendid, but we do not want to say we are different from others at all. My own experience is that they are extremely fine; they are very contented. Of course, a lot depends upon how you deal with them. Take the hours which Mrs. Crosland has read you. I thought the men's hours were ridiculously short, and I simply spoke to them about it, and between us we hammered out that list which I have read to you, and it was they who accepted it and agreed to it; it was not imposed upon them in any sense. I said, "I think you are being paid too much and doing too little." They said, "We would do a little more if you will not alter the pay," and they did. Of course, it is a small place, as I say, and one can get on on those terms in a small place more easily than in a large one.

Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5502. Do all the nurses who come in to you under contract remain for four years?—All the female nurses, and of late the male ones, but I do not like to enforce it with the men, because there are so many fewer avenues open to a man when he goes away at the end of the four years. He has got a training, and it will not be so easy for him to find something else apart from that training. A nurse may possibly get married and cease to have to continue nursing, or may go out into general nursing. Unless a man goes into private nursing he is rather at a loose end.

5503. There is not so much career, I suppose, for male nurses, except in mental hospitals?—That is the way to put it.

5504. Or as attendants to private patients?—That is so.

5505. Earl Russell: Is that one reason why you pay the men so much more?—I do not know that it is a reason; the two things are facts. I do not know what the relation between them is.

5506. Chairman: Do you find in your experience that you ever have to dismiss a nurse?—Yes, I have dismissed two nurses in the last three years, since 1922.

5507. It would be interesting to know (this is on the topic of discipline) the occasion on which you had to dismiss these nurses?—Perhaps I should say that I, speaking strictly of the constitution of the Retreat, do not dismiss the nurse; I suspend her, and the Committee nominally dismisses the nurse.

5508. We do not want any names but merely the circumstances?—One was for theft, a girl who had previously been dismissed from another institution, and had come in to us concealing that fact, and the second was for immorality.

5509. Earl Russell: Neither of them for offences against patients?—Oh, no.

5510. Chairman: As regards discipline in your institution, do you ever have complaints from your patients of the treatment they are receiving at the hands of nurses?—You have the usual complaints from one or two of the chronic paranoïd patients, and the patients who resent everything; you always have a few, I think, in every mental hospital. I have very few.

5511. What means of direct access to you have the patients got? Let me put a case to you: it is always better to be concrete. There is an idea abroad apparently that patients sometimes are ill-treated, but are afraid to complain to the higher authorities such as yourself, and that in that way there may be more or less systematic ill-treatment of a patient who has no means of obtaining redress. Now how are you personally brought into contact with your patients? I quite appreciate you have a relatively small number; but how are you brought into personal contact with your patients in your daily work?—My routine is this, that in the morning I come in at half-past nine or ten, and while I am seeing the secretary, and possibly the head engineer, and the head gardener, or doing anything just to settle off in half an hour the machinery of the place for the day, both my assistants come in to see me, and I tell them whether or not I am coming round with them, or which of them I am going round with. I may say to the male side assistant, "I will come round with you this morning," or else I may say to the female assistant the same thing. Occasionally, a thing I detest, but generally on a Monday morning, we have a formal round, and I go round with both of them and the matron, a whole trail of assistants, round the house. But every second day I go round on one side or the other with one of the assistants. Whatever I do, they do their routine round of the home every morning. As soon as they have finished, if I have not been with them, they come into my room at midday, and we sit down and talk over by name practically every patient, certainly every acute patient. If there is anybody who specially wants to see me, or if there is any particular form of medical treatment that I am going to give, or if there is some patient who I think is distressed and might be comforted by having seen me, I ring up to the appropriate department, and say, "You might ask Mrs. So-and-so to be brought down to my office," or else I run up myself, and have a chat with her in the ward. At 12 o'clock the matron comes in to me, and I discuss with her all the reports she has had from the assistant matrons, and from the sisters in the wards, and any cases of discipline are brought up, and any questions against the nurses. In the afternoons, if I am about the place, I am probably either playing tennis with some of the patients, or playing some of the games or refereeing at one of the hockey matches, or seeing a party go off somewhere or other, but generally being on the spot.

5512. But one figures the case of a patient who is not happy, and thinks the nurse is not kind to her, and wants to see you to put her case before you, and to say that she would like to be in the hands of another nurse. How would that patient get direct access to you?—By simply telling the nurse she wanted to see me.

5513. Supposing the patient felt that that nurse was unkind to her, it would not be an easy thing for the patient to say to the nurse, "I want to see the doctor," and if the nurse said, "What for?" to explain "Because I am not very happy with you." It is not a very easy thing to say that, you know?—It is not for me to ask questions, but do you believe in the hypothetical question which you are putting?

5514. I could conceive it is quite possible?—I can conceive it is quite possible. I can conceive that I am systematically trying to deceive the Commission!

5515. Earl Russell: But is the nurse allowed to say "What for?" if the patient asks to see you?—I do not think she is either allowed to or forbidden. She would not dream of doing it. You mean the nurse would hold an inquisition on her own?

5516. Yes?—Of course it is so hard to explain these things to people who are not familiar with a mental hospital.

5517. Some of us are familiar with them, you know?—I am very glad to hear it. Then I give you as my personal opinion that I should not be systematically hoodwinked in such a way. The relations between the matron and the sisters, the sisters and myself, and myself and the patients are such as to put it grotesquely out of the question.

5518. Chairman: Your experience has probably been singularly fortunate, and I can well imagine it, with your own qualifications; but what we are really exploring is suggestions that have been made, and apprehensions that are entertained in the public mind, the uninstructed mind, if you please. It has been suggested that it is possible for the visit of the medical superintendent to be known in advance and for matters to be more or less dressed up for his inspection. In your own experience do you think that you could be hoodwinked in that way?—In any of the hospitals at which I have worked it was impossible. I have heard it said that such things are done in large county mental hospitals. My own main ladies' ward has not got even so much as a hanging curtain between it and the front door; you simply walk into it from the front door.

5519. Let me put it quite frankly. One is anxious to see whether there is any risk of tyrannical treatment by nurses of persons who are of unsound mind and not able to protect themselves; whether there are any risks of tyrannical treatment or cruel treatment without the possibility of the patients being able effectively to complain to somebody who would put it right. One wants to see whether there is a

Dr. HENRY YELLOWLEES, O.B.E., M.D., and
Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

risk of that, and whether one can supply any additional safeguards to prevent the possibility of its occurrence?—Firstly, I think one has to consider that the patient, while not able to protect himself, has a very good means of letting himself be heard; I mean he would make his plaint pretty noisily. Supposing the nurse ignored his complaint and refused to pass it on, it is just possible that he would be so audible that somebody higher up would hear him.

5520. Is it not possible that if he took such steps he might find himself put under some penalty or sent to a refractory ward, for instance?—Anything is possible. It is quite outside my experience. How low down the nursing staff are you going to presume trustworthiness? The average nurse, I take it, is not to be regarded as above suspicion?

5521. Of course the working of the system depends upon the trustworthiness of the staff, but at the same time it is desirable that there should be a certain check or safeguard upon the staff, particularly upon the members of the staff who have the less high qualifications?—Suppose I say that either I or one of my assistants sees every patient every day, how is that for a perfectly sufficient safeguard against it?

5522. Do you see the patients with the nurse?—With or without the nurse; we do not make any formality about it. Probably we see four or five of the patients and one nurse is there. It was the practice till I came for the nurse to leave the room when the doctor was there, but I stopped it.

5523. Earl Russell: Why did you change the practice?—Because when I go in to see a case of pneumonia, I do not expect the nurse who is dealing with the case to walk out of the room and leave me. When I am attending a case of a much more difficult nature, still less do I expect the nurse to walk out of the room and leave me.

5524. You thought it rather a slur upon the nurse?—I did, indeed.

5525. Chairman: And also, of course, the nurse can tell you how the patient is getting on?—Certainly.

5526. The nurse keeps the temperature chart and all the other things, and will be able to tell the doctor, as she does in private practice?—Certainly. Many a time a patient in such circumstances has asked, "Doctor, can I say something to you?" and I say, "Certainly. Nurse, you can leave us for a moment."

5527. That seems to be admirable?—I think the best answer to the difficulty is this, that if a medical officer with experience and knowledge sees every patient every day, I do not think any more complete safeguard could be conceived.

5528. One can quite understand in your institution that that is both practicable and desirable, but we need not trouble you with the larger institutions where to see every patient every day would be impossible?—It is very hard, I know.

5529. But in your institution you are in a position of being in personal contact with all your patients?—That is so.

5530. And you think there is no risk in your case of a patient suffering in any way from neglect or ill-treatment by your subordinates without your becoming aware of it?—I believe that to be so. My committee are also in personal relation with the patients; that is perhaps a unique thing. The committee, I think I am right in saying, regard their being on the committee, simply because it is founded by their religious body, as more or less a definite and sacred trust, and they take an extraordinary personal interest in every patient by name in a way that is not very usual.

5531. You have told us of the relationship obtaining in your institution as between the higher members of the staff and the patients. One is also concerned with the relationship between the patients and the outside world. One knows that they have to be detained necessarily on account of the nature of the particular malady, but we are concerned as a Commission with the possibilities of contact, or at least the preservation of some relationship with the outside world, so that the patients may not feel that they are entirely shut off. Now in your case what opportunities of contact are there, or what opportunities of communication are there between the patients and outside persons altogether; take, for example, their own relatives or the authorities, to whom they may wish to appeal even, if one may conceive it, against the staff of your institution?—They constantly do.

5532. One wants to know what opportunities are available to patients under your charge to come into contact with the outside world. You have mentioned that one of the opportunities is the visiting committee?—Yes.

5533. Do the committee regularly come to your institution?—They come for their official committee meeting; they spend two days every month there, a Monday and a Tuesday. In the interim there are two committee visitors, two directors' visitors, two what we call lady visitors. Each of those are bi-monthly, that is to say, each of these three pairs occurs in the period of two months.

5534. When they visit the institution, do they see the individual patients?—They do precisely as they like; they walk in and they see either me or the matron and I say, "Well now, it is for you to say what you want to see. What would you like to do?" Sometimes they say they would like to go to the laundry and at other times they will like to see the worst ladies or the worst gentlemen we have got. It is simply their own free-will. They then write a report, which I frequently do not even see until it comes before the next committee; they frequently address it to the Chairman, enclosed in an envelope.

5535. Now when these visitors are going round, do the patients have an opportunity of speaking to them personally?—Certainly.

5536. And do they in point of fact chat with them?—Yes, I think so; very frequently.

5537. Will you just tell us about that, Mrs. Crosland? I suppose you go round yourself?—(Mrs. Crosland): Yes. I go there every month and I stay a night in the institution; the next morning before the committees begin, I have the keys and I just go where I like. I sit in a corridor or anywhere, and the patients just talk to me as they feel inclined. If any of them want a particularly private talk with me, I go into their rooms or sit with them in a corner of the corridor. Any of them can talk with me at any time. I think to many of them it is a great comfort to have somebody coming from outside and also perhaps somebody not in uniform.

5538. There is a great deal in that, of course. You make them feel as if they were not cut off from ordinary life, so to speak?—That is so. I can bring messages from their friends, and look at the things they are doing, all the handiwork, and so on, and talk to them about all sorts of outside things. A great many of them read the newspapers and are very keenly interested in things that are going on.

5539. Do you find that your colleagues take a personal interest in the cases?—Yes, but I am the only woman who stays a night there, so the other women have not the same opportunity as I have of spending time in the wards.

5540. Do you find that the patients have many complaints to make to you?—Yes, there are a good many.

5541. What class of complaints do they make to you?—I think most of the complaints lately have been of the roughness of some of the young nurses. Sometimes the patients write me letters to my home address and sometimes they send messages when I get to the institution. One of the complaints which worried me a good deal was a complaint of the carrying of a patient to the bath and of dropping her on the way—I was a good deal worried about that. Then I talked it over with the woman doctor and the matron, and I told them I felt I should like to satisfy myself about the complaint. I felt sure that they had seen and misunderstood some of the treatment that had to be given to some of the very resistive patients; so the doctor said she thought I had better go and see some of the treatment of some of the worst patients so that I could judge for myself, and Dr. Yellowlees very kindly agreed and made it very easy for me to do so. They did not tell the nurses at all before; I simply went down with the matron. The first case I saw was a poor thing who very much objected to having a bath; she went absolutely wild. As soon as she found she was going to be given one she struggled and kicked and yelled, and they had to roll her in a sheet, and two nurses carried her. She struggled so terribly that they could not help dropping her; I do not see what else they could have done, and in the handling of her, though there were three nurses and a sister dealing with her, she bit deeply the sister's thumb. Yet they told me that when it was proposed to move her into another gallery, the nurses who were used to dealing with her said she was such a nice patient that they did not want her to go and wanted her to be left. She seemed to be a perfectly nice person as long as she was not being given what she considered to be this terrible thing. Another patient was having her finger nails cut, and it took three nurses to hold her down while they cut her finger nails.

Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5542. When these complaints are made to you about rough treatment, are they complaints by the patients of rough treatment of themselves personally, or of rough treatment they have seen other patients subjected to?—Both. This instance was of the latter type.

5543. This particular lady was not complaining of any treatment she had received herself, but of things she had seen?—The complaint came from other patients who had seen the patient or heard the screams and thought that some terrible cruelty was being inflicted upon the poor creature. The third case was a poor thing having a bath with very sad sores on her flesh which she had made by her own fingers. She was wailing all the time at the cruelty of simply being washed. She could not do with it.

5544. When you get a complaint of that sort made to you by a patient either of something which she has herself experienced or imagined or of something she has seen somebody else subjected to, do you go into it and make inquiry about it?—If it is a perfectly wild letter that comes to me, as some of them are, I feel that perhaps we need not go further into it. I generally go and talk either to the lady doctor or to the matron about the case. If they think it is a case in which I should have a conversation with the patient I am given the opportunity, and I have the patient alone without a nurse there at all; they have perfect freedom to talk to me at any time. (Dr. Yellowlees): May I point out in connection with this matter how beautifully it illustrates just the point you have been asking, and ask you to note that the complaint was of a kind in which there would have been every temptation not to allow it to go further—the complaint of roughness of the nurses. The complaint went right up to Mrs. Crosland, and far from any attempt being made to gloss it over, or to assert that “it is a delusion,” the only right thing was done, namely, “Go and see for yourself what this person has complained of to you.” It is the only thing to do, but I cannot prove to you that I did not carefully coach everybody in their parts, and that I deceived Mrs. Crosland! She does not think so, I do not think so, and I hope you do not. It was most interesting to me, when Mrs. Crosland spoke in my presence to our committee just as she has said to you, because it was very good for them to realise that such a trifle as the cutting of a person's finger nails required four strong people and gave rise to these terrible allegations of cruelty. Had the nails not been cut, the patient's relatives and those about her would have been the first people to complain of the slovenly nurses and the lack of attention. I do not resent the thing much, but I do think it should be fairly seen on both sides.

5545. Earl Russell: When a patient, otherwise quiet, makes so much objection to it, is it actually necessary to give a bath? Could you not wash by sponging, or hospital washing in the ordinary way?—I am not quite sure why this particular thing was done, but it is generally done in a bed bath if the patient is not willing to go to a bath.

5546. No doubt there were reasons in this case?—No doubt there were, and frankly I do not remember them at the moment—probably the patient's habits were so terrible.

5547. Chairman: We have heard of the activities of the visiting committee. You have other outside visitors who come to your institution, have you not?—Yes.

5548. You have visitations, have you not, from the Board of Control Commissioners?—Yes, twice a year; statutorily, I believe, only once, but in practice twice.

5549. What do they do when they come?—They visit every patient, every part of the place, see all the officials that they wish to see, and give interviews to all patients who desire to interview them.

5550. Do many patients take advantage of that?—Very few. Again I speak from my experience of this particular place and the small number of patients; I daresay, perhaps, two or three patients.

5551. Mr. Jowitt: Each time?—Each time—generally the same patients, the two or three are standing figures.

5552. Chairman: Do the patients in your institution know of their right to have a private interview with the Commissioners who come?—Certainly; notices are posted up, and I also tell them as we pass.

5553. Mr. Jowitt: Do you know beforehand when they are coming?—No, no one knows. I should say that once only, in all the hospitals in which I have been, I had a suggestion made to me by a superintendent somewhere in the vicinity that if I would give him word when the Commissioner was coming, he would give me word. That is the first and only time I have ever heard such a thing even suggested. He was the head of a very small place which was not at all in a satisfactory condition.

5554. Chairman: How did you receive that suggestion?—I was not a party to it. The Commissioners are our friends.

5555. Have you any visitors?—There are these groups of people; the directors send a couple of visitors every three months; the committee send two visitors specially every two months, and we have two what we call lady visitors from the directors. We are rather complicated. The Society of Friends sends the strange couples of people, who make reports.

5556. What about the relatives of patients?—I have only one rule about relatives, namely, that anybody may visit any patient at any time.

5557. Earl Russell: There is no fixed visiting day?—There is no fixed visiting day, and no fixed visiting hours. I do sometimes draw the line. When we gave forty teas in a week I really had to point out that it was not a private hotel, but that it was a hospital first. I have made no rule otherwise. In about three or four cases in two and a half years I have had on medical grounds to stop a visit. I frequently advise relatives to leave patients alone for a fortnight or three weeks to give them a chance, but my invariable rule is “You can come at any time you like.”

5558. Chairman: Where does a relative see the patient?—If the patient is in bed, in the hospital where the patient happens to be, or on the veranda where she happens to be, or in a single room where she happens to be; if a patient is up and about, generally in one of the visitors' rooms.

5559. Would they be there without any third party?—Oh, yes. The nurse brings the patient in, if it is to the visitors' room, and then leaves, and when the visitors have finished they ring a bell, and they ought to wait until the nurse comes back.

5560. Mr. Jowitt: That is another touch with the outside world?—Yes.

5561. Chairman: Then there is another method of communication, and that is by correspondence. How do you treat the letters of your patients?—By law I must send unopened any letters which are addressed to the Lord Chancellor, any of the Visitors in Lunacy, the Board of Control or any of its members, or the chairman of the visiting committee, and also to the petitioner—that is the person who signs the request.

5562. Those letters must be sent unopened?—That is so.

5564. Is there any notice up in the wards?—In every ward there is a printed notice explaining about letters and visits.

5565. Then as regards letters other than those addressed to official persons, how do you deal with those?—In the average case when the relatives bring the patient I see the relatives and I say "What do you want done about letters?" If they say they can all go, I am content. If they say "Do not let him send letters to so and so" I say "Why?", and if the person gives a reasonable cause for it, I examine those letters addressed to this black list, as I have a right to do. If the letter is in my view likely to be harmful, or it is obviously insane and giving away the unfortunate mental state of the writer, I destroy it.

5566. You exercise your discretion?—I exercise my discretion. In the case of the great majority of patients we do not look at the letters at all. There are some patients who simply write scribble; we know it is no use. I should say the majority of the patients put the names under where the stamp will come. If you know it is a letter from a patient who is sensible you simply tick the letter off, it is stamped, and dispatched without even being read.

5567. On the other hand, some letters are quite irrational?—A large number are quite irrational.

5568. Now I think these, as far as I can recall, are all the means of contact between the patients and the outside world, are they not? Are there any other ways in which they come into contact with the public or with authorities?—Well, Sir, firstly you have to remember that a large number of patients have parole and are perfectly free to go into the town.

5569. Yes; that is a topic we have not heard very much about.

5570. Earl Russell: Are they unaccompanied on parole?—Yes.

5571. Chairman: Will you tell us about that; we have not heard much about it?—The question of parole is a graded method of testing the patient's adjustment to the outside world. You begin, let us say, with an acute case who is not in touch with his surroundings at all, who is obviously a sick man, and has to be treated in a bed in the acute part of the hospital. Let us say that he recovers. He goes as soon as he is convalescent to another part of the house where there are convalescent persons like himself, and he is encouraged by that very step (I am missing out the details of treatment) in the belief that he is getting better. He probably then gets into further touch with the outside world by going to the various entertainments or concerts or dances which we are constantly organising among ourselves, a lecture or a debate, or possibly he is a chess or draughts player, in which case he will find others like himself only too anxious to give him a game. Then while, perhaps, you are not very sure of him there is a good concert on in York, and he is very fond of music. He says, "Well, doctor, could you arrange for me to go with one of the attendants?" Of course you could, and he goes out and enjoys it. He comes back. Then the question is, "Could not he go out into the grounds himself?" He is fond of gardening; an allotment is given over to him, and he finds he can work away on his allotment. He is expected to keep his word to be in for meals; and things work in that way. After a while the question is, Cannot he go out himself? Why should he not? If he says he will be back by tea time we have no reason to doubt it, and the best way is to let him see we believe it. He goes out by himself and he comes back. Of course, by this time he realises, unlike a good many people outside, that our chief enthusiasm and aim is to get the man well and away, and he co-operates with us to that end. When he has satisfied us and himself of his ability to go about unaided, to adjust himself to the various demands of life, we tell him that he ought to go. I have given you in essence the gist of the procedure.

5572. It seems that you have patients at the stage at which they are put upon their parole, are allowed to mix with the community, to go out and shop, or to go to the cinema and so on?—That is so.

5573. Do you find in practice they keep their word to come back?—Yes. Of course, you consider carefully before you give it. A bad mistake is not common. I have had two bad mistakes in the 2½ years. I have had one suicide, the result of allowing liberty, and I have had one escape, the result of allowing liberty.

5574. Earl Russell: An escape which extended over 14 days, you mean?—That is so; I have only had two escapes in 2½ years. Of course, the front gate is always open for anybody to escape who wants to.

5575. Do you have to warn them against alcohol when they go out?—In certain cases, yes; but surprisingly few; you do not have much trouble with alcohol in that class of case. That is rather curious. I have a figure with regard to the detention of patients. I may be forestalling what you are coming to.

5576. Chairman: I was just coming to that topic. We were trying to get a picture of the relationship of the inmate of your institution to the public, the points of contact. Of course that provides, as you appreciate, a very valuable safeguard, that a person should have opportunities of seeing outside persons and of making complaints if he or she so desires. I think we have probably exhausted the means of contact. With regard to letting patients out on parole, I suppose they can go to their relatives?—That is so; and very often the relatives come for a while and try it, and take rooms near York; we spend a large amount of time in finding suitable rooms near the Retreat for the relatives to live in.

5577. Now I think perhaps you might deal with the next topic which you have in your note here. One of the topics which the public are concerned with is the possibility of detention of persons who are sane; that is to say, either the admission of persons who ought not to be admitted, or the continued detention of persons who ought not to be detained. All the patients reach you on a reception order pronounced on petition?—All the certified patients, yes.

5578. All the certified patients who reach you in that way are private patients?—That is so.

5579. You, of course, will receive the documents relating to their cases?—That is so.

5580. How do they actually come to you? Are you asked by the medical practitioner who attends the case to provide accommodation for the patient?—Very often.

5581. Are you communicated with before the patient comes?—Yes. Sometimes I have seen a patient in private or in consultation with another doctor, but I think in the majority of cases the doctor rings up or writes to say that he has a patient who needs mental hospital care. Occasionally the relatives write, generally, I should think, prompted thereto by the doctor, but on the whole it is the medical practitioner.

5582. It is very much like sending a patient to any other nursing home for any ordinary malady. Naturally, the practitioner attending the case will write to you first of all. On accommodation, do you find yourself able to overtake all the cases that are offered to you?—Yes, just; it varies, but we manage.

5583. You receive the patient, of whom you may possibly know something beforehand, or may not, as the case may be?—That is so.

5584. Then the documents are made available to you. You examine the documents, I suppose?—That is so.

5585. Do you find that the documents accompanying the reception order are in general satisfactory to your mind as a trained alienist?—As a trained alienist, yes. They satisfy me medically, invariably. They hardly ever satisfy me from the point of view of a correctly filled-up schedule; in fact, they are almost invariably legally, if I may use the phrase, inaccurate.

5586. Earl Russell: Imperfect?—Imperfect.

5587. Chairman: but on the substantial point at issue one knows that they contain a statement of facts and opinions?—That is so.

5588. By two medical practitioners?—And, what is legally of importance to us, they contain the legal authority that we have to keep the patient, namely, the magistrate's order.

5589. That is your warrant?—That is our warrant.

5590. That is a legal matter which, of course, is of great importance as a safeguard; but from your point of view I should think the contents of the medical certificate are of great importance and interest?—That is so.

5591. Then you have to make a report to the Board of Control within 24 hours of the reception of the patient?—Yes.

5592. Then what is your next step?—In more than two and less than seven days we have to send a summary of the patient's general condition, bodily and mental.

5593. Then you have to make the month-end report?—Yes.

5594. We know all this already, of course, so I will just take it shortly. After that you have to make a report at the end of stated periods?—That is so.

5595. Continuation reports?—That is so.

5596. Now, of the patients who reach you in this way have you had, in your experience, any reason to doubt the propriety of their reception in your institution on the ground of their insanity or sanity?—No, none whatever.

5597. Have you ever had a case as to which you were in some hesitation?—Do you refer to my experience in England?

5598. Yes; will you confine yourself to the Retreat? Of the cases tendered to you there, accompanied by these documents, have you ever upon your examination of the patient had reason to doubt the propriety of the detention of the case?—Yes, I have. To have said "None whatever" was perhaps rather sweeping. I have in this sense, that patients have arrived who I thought might with wisdom have been treated elsewhere. For example, a patient arrives in acute delirium, which one believes will recover in the course of three or four days. The relatives have sufficient money, and it crosses one's mind, "Now this was foolishness." Of course, the person was mentally out of touch with his surroundings, and anybody could have certified him, but it would have been a wise proceeding medically to continue that patient's treatment at home.

5599. That is rather a different type of case; that is the person who for the time being, but in your view only temporarily, is of unsound mind, but the unsound mind is not the concomitant of a settled state of insanity?—No.

5600. That class of case might be dealt with without certification, but the case arrives at your premises certified?—That is so, and that is what I have sometimes objected to.

5601. But that class of case is probably not so troublesome as the class of case where the person is on the border line. No one can define insanity, I suppose you will agree, doctor?—I will agree, yes, for the purposes of this Commission.

5602. I should have thought for all purposes.—It is a legal term, and not a medical one, so I should not try.

5603. Let us be very careful. It is a question of degree, is it not?—I would like to know what is coming, before I answer that question.

5604. What I want to get at is this: Do you not find in your experience that there are cases as to which it is very difficult to decide whether the boundary line between medical unsoundness of mind and medical soundness of mind has been crossed?—Yes.

5605. That always strikes me personally as the class of difficulty that must confront you in administering the laws relating to insanity?—In the cases that arrive certified, my experience has always been that that line has been passed by a very long way.

5606. In fact, may it not be this, as we have reason to believe, that many cases might never have crossed the line if they had been brought to the knowledge of the proper practitioners at an earlier stage?—In general that statement is true.

5607. Therefore is your experience this, that those who do reach you under a reception order have unhappily passed the frontier?—Yes; but you must not regard the frontier as a bourne from which they are not going to return at all.

5608. No, but there is no right in law to detain a person against his will unless he is of unsound mind?—That is so.

5609. What I want to know is this: Whether you have ever felt difficulty as to the legal right of detaining a particular person on the ground that he or she was not of unsound mind?—I do not think so, ever, at the time of admission.

5610. Of course, that may result from the circumstance that as matters stand there is not adequate provision for what I may call preventive treatment, with the result that the cases that are certified have gone so far that they present no difficulty?—That is possible. It is hardly the point you were asking me, is it? Your point is: Are the certified patients that I receive certifiable?

5611. Yes?—The answer is yes.

5612. Now you said your difficulties, if any, arose not at that stage, but at the later stages?—Yes; and how they arise is interesting.

5613. Of course, convalescence is a gradual process?—Yes.

5614. And I do not suppose even the most skilled alienist can fix a moment of time and say: Before that moment of time a case is properly certifiable, and after that moment of time the case has ceased to be certifiable?—I entirely agree with you. I was once rude enough to write that it is only in courts of law that a person is sane on Monday and insane on Tuesday.

5615. But looking at it from the medical point of view, your right to detain being dependent upon the continued unsoundness of mind of the patient, do you tell us that you never have any difficulty in judging when the patient has passed out of the region in which he or she may be legally detained?—No; but in convincing other bodies, yes. May I explain the difficulty?

5616. If you please?—A patient comes in acutely ill, and in my first report, from two to seven days, there is no difficulty. I write a description to the Board of Control of an acute mental person. Within three weeks the patient is weak, exhausted, showing traces of confusion still coming over him every day or two, but obviously very well on the way to recovery, and I have to sit down and write a report at the end of the month justifying to the Board of Control, who have not seen the patient, his continued residence in the hospital. That difficulty is a small one, but it is astonishingly real, because the Board of Control, if the monthly certificate is in the least weak, at once write back, because their function in this regard is to safeguard the very point you raise—they at once write back to say "Let us hear more about it," and they frequently enclose a form, and say, "Send us that form filled up in a week or fortnight or in a month." It is difficult, because the patient knows he is getting better, and is only too thankful to remain till he is better. His relatives know it; I know it; but I have got to write out this document, searching my brain for some terrible symptoms to justify the Board of Control saying he is still insane, and is legally detained. That is all right. I do not see how we can avoid that.

5617. Sir David Drummond: How do you deal with the case in which you have searched your brain and have not been able to arrive at a reason?—I discharge the patient and let him come in as a voluntary boarder.

5618. Earl Russell: Would it be possible to get over the difficulty in some way by using different words on the certificate and having a different kind of certificate in which you said the patient was convalescent, but that it was still desirable that he should have care and treatment?—If there were a certificate of that kind I should frequently use it.

5619. You would adopt it?—I should gladly adopt it.

5620. Chairman: But you would still require to have powers of compulsory detention in such a case?—I would not, really. If I had not powers of compulsory detention at this moment, have the Commission any idea of the percentage of patients who would leave?

5621. Tell us about your patients. Supposing you opened the door and you had no power to detain: how many would leave in twenty-four hours?—About a fortnight ago I did a small experiment, which I quite realize has no evidential value, and you could no doubt tear holes in it, but it is of value. I discussed with my colleagues a form of question, and we arrived at this question: "Do you definitely resent your detention here?" We took a morning at random when there were in the building 162 patients. Of those 162 patients, 12 were voluntary boarders, which left us for the purpose of experiment with 150 certified patients. Every one of those patients, whatever his mental condition, was asked this question. The rules I gave to my colleagues were these: If the answer is in the least indicative of resentfulness, that they do definitely resent it, put it down as "Yes," even though it may be said in mischief or in spite, put it down. If the answer is unequivocally "No," put it down as "No." If it is not unequivocally "No," put it down as doubtful. 15 patients (10 per cent.) answered, "Yes," that they resented their detention; 46 patients, that is 31 per cent., gave incoherent answers or doubtful answers, or were silent; 89 patients, or 59 per cent.—more than both the others put together—said unequivocally, "No," they did not resent their detention.

5622. Of course, one does not quite know how far those answers might be dictated by the desire of the patients to please the questioner?—As I said at the beginning, it is of no evidential value whatever. It is also possible that I stood over them with a stick, and applied duress.

5623. I do not suggest it, but you have already warned me not to try and tear holes in it?—No; I said it was possible that you could do so.

5624. Mr. Jowitt: I am thinking of the political principle, that you give the other side all the doubts and take the 10 per cent. as your own?—Is it not interesting?

5625. Chairman: It is exceedingly interesting.—Of course, the only way of interpreting it is to give me and my assistants a certain amount of credit for being neither scoundrels on the one hand nor dupes on the other, with a certain knowledge of our work, and sympathy with the patients.

5626. Now on this point of the detention of the persons on the way to recovery, as you have said, there is some difficulty in fixing the point of time when they ought to be discharged?—That is so.

5627. But when their recovery is established do you discharge your patients at once?—Certainly.

5628. How are they discharged from your institution; what is the procedure? Of course, the petitioner can always ask for the release, whether recovered or not recovered?—A recovered patient can be discharged by my authority or by the petitioner. Funnily enough, the Board of Control always put down "by authority of the petitioner", but the patient can be discharged by myself or the petitioner.

5629. When you see that a patient is approaching complete recovery, what do you do yourself? Do you notify the petitioner or the relatives?—I have a talk with the relatives generally or write to them and try to satisfy myself as to the future of the patient. In fact, very much more than the public imagine, the difficulty in the discharge of a patient is due to the unwillingness of the relatives to be bothered with the patient; and I write a very large number of letters, in which I have to urge quite strongly upon relatives their responsibilities in the matter. It is all perfectly right and legal, and so on, especially in the case of a patient with regard to whom I cannot swear that he is, strictly speaking, recovered; and the relatives frequently take that attitude. They say, "Doctor, is this patient recovered?" I say, "Well, no she is not, but I think she might very well be tried at home; I think she would do pretty well at home." And they say, "Oh, well, it is not easy at home." And, of course, it is not easy, but the relatives are frequently unwilling to accept one's judgment that the time has come when the patient might be tried.

5630. Earl Russell: Do you ever adopt the system of monthly trial?—Yes, frequently. We never put it for a specified time; it can always be renewed; we very very frequently adopt that system.

5631. Chairman: In the case of private patients, who may be persons of considerable means, there may be a motive on the part of the relatives for desiring a continued detention that may not operate in the case of pauper patients. I suppose you do have patients with considerable property under your charge?—That is so.

5632. Have you had any experience of cases where you have had reason to suspect that the relatives desired to keep the patients away as long as possible? I am not thinking of the motive that they had difficulty in accommodating them at home; I am thinking of a more sinister idea.—With an unrecovered patient in a way they are perfectly right. You are asking me whether I impute a motive to relatives other than the one they give?

5633. Yes. Of course that is a difficult question to answer?—It is. I know what you mean, and I do not think I can honestly say so. I have come across things which I thought were rather fishy and persons who I do not think were just thrilled to do the very best for their relative. I certainly will not go further than that.

5634. The patient is ex hypothesi recovered, and ought to be discharged?—If he is ex hypothesi recovered, I would simply say he must go at once.

5635. The case of a person more or less recovered is a person still certifiable, and certified in fact?—If I feel very strongly about it I stretch a point and discharge the patient recovered, and thus force the hand of the relatives, and they have to do it.

5636. Do you attach importance to there being two medical certificates appended to the reception order in the case of the private patients?—I think it is a great comfort to the magistrate and to the public, and I can imagine it being a safeguard to the patient. I do not think it is a great safeguard to the patient.

5637. I think we may say that we are rather impressed with the undesirability of there being a distinction between the machinery of certification for so-called pauper patients and that for private patients?—I think that is very wise.

3 December, 1924.]

Dr. HENRY YELLOWLEES, O.B.E., M.D., and
Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5638. And we are considering whether we can make any recommendations upon it. The pauper patient is certified on one medical certificate and must be seen by a justice of the peace. A private patient is certified on two medical certificates and need not be seen originally by the judicial authority, but may call for a visit from the judicial authority within 7 days, as we know?—That is so.

5639. Now if we are to assimilate the procedure in both cases, can you assist us at all with any suggestions? Would one medical certificate in the case of the private patient, coupled with a compulsory seeing of the patient by the judicial authority, be adequate?—I think that the second medical certificate is a much greater safeguard to the patient, if that is what you are anxious to know, than is the seeing by the justice. Of the two I think the second medical certificate is the better safeguard.

5640. What I ventured to put to several of the preceding witnesses was this, that there must be many cases in practice where the unsoundness of mind is so obvious that a second medical certificate might be redundant. Of course it costs money, one has got to remember?—That is so.

5641. What do you say to the idea that where there is any doubt either in the mind of the first medical practitioner or of the justice of the peace, they should have the right to call in a second opinion before certifying?—I do not know if my mind works quickly enough to take in all that at once. I hardly think it would be very satisfactory for the justice of the peace; I think it might be a comfort for the doctor; but it is putting a great deal upon the doctor in any case. It is much happier for the doctor to know he has a colleague with him, and if you give him that right, I think he will exercise it in every case. It is a point that I had not considered but it is very interesting.

5642. If we have to assimilate the procedure in the two classes of cases, which we may have to recommend, one is very anxious to know from a person of practical experience what we should prescribe as the necessary preliminary to certification. It must be adequate and it must be reliable?—Are you concerned with the legal irregularities in the papers? Are you concerned with the fact that the average magistrate will sign papers which are from a technical point of view hopeless and have to be sent back for amendment?

5643. Yes. We have heard a good deal about that from official sources, but I think the question of the adequacy or inadequacy of the filling up of the forms is perhaps not a matter we are on for the moment. It is a question really of what persons are to intervene. In the case of the pauper patient two persons intervene, a justice of the peace and one medical practitioner. In the case of the private patient three persons intervene—the judicial authority, who after all is a justice of the peace, and two medical practitioners. Now if assimilation is to take place, I gather your view is that in all cases two medical opinions would be better?—I would be inclined to add one to the pauper patient.

5644. And you make the point on it, which is perhaps of importance, that in a responsible matter of this sort any professional man prefers to have the assistance of a second opinion, or the comfort of a second opinion?—That is so.

5645. Earl Russell: You must remember, of course, that the second certificate has to be made without consultation. He is not supposed to talk it over with the other man?—It is not likely that I forget that; but it is for the purpose of helping each other with responsibility.

Chairman: It is the knowledge that the patient will not be certified unless another confirms his opinion.

5646. Mr. Jowitt: It is sharing the responsibility?—Yes.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Before you leave that point, Sir, would you ask the witness what is his view with regard to the provision of Section 31, which provides that the second certifying doctor should be the patient's ordinary attendant?

5647. Chairman (To the Witness): Tell me about Section 31. It provides that one of the certificates should, where practicable, be under the hand of the usual medical attendant, that is to say, of the attendant who has some knowledge of the case?—That is so.

5648. Now do you think it desirable that that should be used as much as possible?—I do. Of course it is sometimes extraordinarily difficult.

5649. I was just going to say, one can imagine great difficulties practically; in your case probably there is not so much difficulty because the private patient has presumably been in the hands of a practitioner?—From that point of view it is less difficult, but, on the other hand, the private patient has travelled about more; he may have been in other places, and perhaps has been abroad and not in touch with his medical man for a long time, or possibly has gone as a voluntary boarder.

5650. Earl Russell: You mean there is a good deal of doubt as to who is his regular medical attendant?—Yes, there is a good deal of doubt.

5651. Chairman: Of course in the case of an alien or a lunatic wandering at large he would have no regular medical attendant?—That is so.

5652. May I take it that this section of the Act is of value in this respect, that the medical attendant will be most naturally familiar with the history of the case?—Yes. My opinion of this section is that it is a good section; what it ordains is very wise, but it is essential that it should say "whenever practicable," which it does, because to make it a hard and fast rule would bring about very great inconvenience and hardship at times.

Chairman: I do not know whether I have put the question in the form you wanted it put, Mr. Stewart?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes, Sir. I wanted you to call the attention of the witness to that provision which is the real safeguard, as we suggest, namely, that somebody who has had previous knowledge of the case should, wherever possible, be consulted.

Chairman: You observe, of course, that Section 31 relates only to private patients on a reception order following on a petition.

Witness: That is so.

5653. Have you any view as to whether a similar provision should be made with regard to pauper patients? If they have a usual medical attendant, the certificate should be by the usual medical attendant wherever possible? It might be the panel doctor?—I should have thought that such a provision would be wise and right. I do not pretend to know how it would work, but I should have thought it would be very desirable.

5654. It is really recommendatory rather than mandatory. If it contains the words "whenever practicable" it would not safeguard cases where there is no medical attendant?—That is so.

5655. Earl Russell: Have you considered the possible objection to the usual medical attendant from this point of view: that he might be extraordinarily reluctant to certify until it was too late, by reason of the fact that he was the usual medical attendant?—I think that that is not an objection, because for better or worse he is the patient's medical attendant, and, presumably, he will know more about the patient than any other physician; and if he happens to be too conservative, that may be a misfortune, but I think the benefit of his knowledge of the patient ought to outweigh it.

5656. And you do not think the patient would suffer by the delay?—I do not think so much as he would probably benefit in other ways.

5657. Sir David Drummond: Has it not come under your notice personally that practitioners have actually declined to certify because of their objection with reference to the point that Lord Russell has raised?—Occasionally, not very often, that is so; but I do not quite see how this suggested clause would make that matter worse, because if the patient's own medical attendant is going to be reluctant to certify, surely the average strange medical attendant would be equally reluctant, the more so when he heard that the gentleman who knows the patient is not going to certify.

Chairman: Except that the medical practitioner who is the usual attendant is ordinarily a personal friend, and it is therefore a more painful or difficult duty to certify a person who is your friend.

Sir David Drummond: And the fear that he will not be the medical attendant after the recovery of the patient.

5658. Chairman: Supposing a patient after leaving the Retreat returns to ordinary life and he knows Doctor So-and-So was the person who put him in, would he not say "I would rather change my doctor now"?—The answer to that is that it simply does not happen in my experience.

5659. Sir David Drummond: In your experience?—Yes, I may be wrong.

5660. Sir Humphry Rolleston: What, in your opinion, would be the feeling of the public generally, supposing we were to adopt the recommendation that has been suggested, that we should only have one certificate for a private patient. Would they feel that a protection had been removed?—In my opinion they would feel that a protection had been removed.

5661. They would consider it really a retrograde step from that point of view?—I think there would be a good deal of noise made about it.

5662. Even if there was the suggestion that either the one doctor who certified or the justice should have the option of calling in a special individual to give, so to speak, a consulting opinion?—I do not think it would do. If the doctor did not avail himself of the right, he would be in a most invidious position with the unfortunate patient afterwards. "There was this doubt and he did not even take the trouble," says the patient, "to call in another man. The moment he has not got to do it by law, he simply does not do it."

5663. So that if there was that in the background, in practice you think it would come to two certificates still?—I believe so.

5664. Chairman: Have you any opinion as to whether one of the practitioners who certifies should be required to have any special qualifications?—Yes. I have no improvements to suggest in that except the improvement of medical education.

5665. That is to say, all round?—Yes, all round.

5666. But do you think public confidence would be increased if one of the medical certificates had to be given by a person specially skilled in mental ailments?—After all, it is the magistrate who says whether the person is insane or not.

5667. But he properly proceeds upon the evidence before him, which is two certificates?—That is so.

5668. Do you think that if one of those certificates were required to be given by a person specially conversant with mental ailments, that would be an advantage and an additional safeguard?—There again it is so hard to say. One gives the public every credit for being completely sincere, but you could use it either way. You could say "There you are, you are going to rope in the insane. You get these terrible mental specialists who see everybody insane and you will not let a plain unprejudiced doctor look at him." On the other hand, the public might say the precise opposite.

5669. Now, on this question of detention, do you find, as a result of your census, that the patients who are most anxious to leave are those who are most unsuitable to leave? Which class of them express their desire to get away?—The paranoiacs—that is the condition known as chronic delusional insanity, which is very much rarer than one would believe from the papers—and a few of the elated patients; certain patients in the condition known as simple mania will give an angry, furious retort, and will say the unpleasant thing. Those are the two classes that are anxious to go.

5670. Now, dealing with quite another topic, we want to know what provision you have for the treatment of patients. You have the establishment, of course, and we have heard about the recreation you provide, and all the rest of it; but from a purely medical point of view, what facilities have you for treatment, to what extent do you need to provide treatment?—You need treatment very much more than people imagine; but you leave aside the social life of the place, the entertainments and so on, failing to realise, before you get any further, that treatment of a very definite order—

5671. I fully realise that the whole life of the place with its home surroundings and the discipline are themselves curative?—That is the idea.

5673. Or in a nursing home?—Or in a nursing home. He is examined in precisely the same way and his physical condition is duly noted, any physical abnormality or disease is appropriately treated as it would be in a hospital. He is probably treated also, if he has certain symptoms such as sleeplessness or depression, by living outside on the verandah the entire day. Then it is considered whether he is a suitable case for any of the forms of psychological treatment about which we hear so much? The essential point of all these courses or systems of treatment being that they demand the intelligent co-operation of the patient. Is he in a condition to do that? If he is, the patient is taken as the special province of one or other of the assistants, is spoken to and conversed with on suggestion or analytical lines as may be thought right. I happen to have two assistants who are trained and qualified in psychology, as I am myself. The question of glandular therapy, which is perhaps one of the more hopeful and more modern ways of treating mental disease, is also considered, and he is probably put on a course of one of the glandular extracts which are being now experimented with. Of course, when I say "experimented with" I lay myself open to the retort "You experiment with your patients."

5674. Earl Russell: You mean thyroid, and others?—Yes, thyroid and others. Then, of course, we have a visiting dentist, and a large body of opinion at the present day, as you know, sets great importance on sources of sepsis, especially in the teeth, and we have these examined as routine by our visiting dentist and anything of that kind done. I am installing a continuous hot-bath treatment, and all these various methods which experience has shown to be of possible use in the treatment of insanity or the bodily symptoms associated with it.

5675. Chairman: To what extent do you use drugs?—Just to the extent that I think is required. Do you mean sedative drugs?

5677. Earl Russell: Do you not have many restless patients?—We have our fair share of acute patients, but of late we have had very few patients of that kind. The last time the Board of Control Commissioner came he paid a surprise midnight visit with me. This is in order to show you the way they go into the matter. The next morning he asked me to let him see all the sedatives used that night and in the last month. On the night that he chose at random he notes in his report that he did not happen to hear a single sound, and the whole of the sedatives used were, I think, four drachms of paraldehyde; that is to say, there were two doses of paraldehyde in the 160 cases.

5678. Mr. Jowitt: For one night?—For one night, but that may vary, of course.

5679. Chairman: It has been suggested that in some instances there is an abuse in the administration of purgatives?—I have never given croton oil to a mental patient since I was born—never once. Is that what you were referring to?

5680. I was not going to refer to that specially, but do you have to administer purgatives to any extent?—It is a very important thing to regulate the bowels of a patient naturally, as in every hospital.

5681. With regard to the issue of drugs, what control have you over them, as medical superintendent? What is the routine for the issue of drugs; who prescribes and who administers?—My assistants prescribe and dispense. The sister in charge of each ward has the ward medicine cupboard with all the things you use. The only person who has a stock of any size is the night superintendent, who has the matron's duty over the whole house at night.

5682. Have you control direct or indirect of all the drugs that are used?—Yes.

5683. Do you know to what extent they are used, to whom they are administered, and when?—I cannot tell you any morning, unless I take the trouble to look, who had been given drugs the night before.

5684. Earl Russell: But there is a record kept, I suppose?—Yes, there is a record kept.

5685. Chairman: It has been suggested that violent drugs are used as a punitive measure for the purpose of punishing patients. Have you ever experienced that at any part of your career?—I have never experienced it. The nearest I came to it was a practitioner who insisted that the only remedy worth thinking about for delirium tremens was 30 grains of calomel. That was a general practitioner who tried it on sane people, and he was in a mining village in Scotland.

5686. The hardy Scot may possibly survive that treatment, but it does not suggest to me that that doctor was thinking of punishing the effects of delirium tremens, but was thinking of curing them. What one has heard of is that medicine has been used as a punishment?—I cannot imagine any class of physician countenancing drugs of any kind being used as punishment. I cannot understand a physician in charge of a patient with pneumonia giving his patient any drug with any other object than the well-being of that patient; and why the unfortunate physician who treats mental disorder (not that I resent it) should have to defend himself against even the imputation of giving drugs to his patients for other reasons I have never been able to see.

5687. The suggestion has rather been made that in some instances the attendants have done so, not that the medical superintendent has done so?—Of course the only people who have access to drugs are the responsible heads of the wards, or ought to be.

5688. Would the ward sister herself see that any drugs that were issued were given to the patient for whom they were intended?—In a large place she might not; she probably would in our case. She would probably give it to the head nurse or to one of the nurses who was doing the medicines. Of course, there again it is so easy to control these things in a comparatively small place.

5689. In your establishment there is no risk of anything of that sort happening?—Not the slightest.

5690. Earl Russell: It is a very common delusion of patients that they are being drugged and that their food is poisoned?—That is so. That is very frequently said.

5691. Chairman: That is just one of the difficulties in valuing testimony that comes from these sources—that it may itself be subject to delusions?—Yes, although there is an interesting thing that only a mental specialist can tell you. It is commonly said that when a patient makes a complaint it is easy and simple to put it down as a delusion. I talked the matter over with my assistants the other day and we were considering our various delusional cases. It was pointed out that there are certain patients whom you or anybody would see at a glance were hopelessly and utterly insane; yet their slightest complaint I would believe, and believe at once. On the other hand, there are patients whose complaints it is right and proper to disregard, not necessarily because of their delusions. Patients' complaints are not most frequently the result of delusions. They are the result of spite and pettiness. The most complaining patient of all is an epileptic. We do not have epileptics at the Retreat. I am speaking on general principles. An epileptic patient very frequently has no delusions at all.

5692. Earl Russell: He is simply lying?—He is simply lying. It is simply not the case that even the most insane patient's complaints are turned down by saying "That is a delusion." If one of my assistants came to me and said Mrs. So-and-so complains that the nurse did this but it is a delusion, I think I am right in saying that with regard to the majority of my patients I would view that statement with suspicion. I would say I would like to hear more about that; I would like to go and see her. Of course, the kind of delusion you do get is this: I asked one of my colleagues, when she was writing my census, to write down at random some of the remarks she got in answer to the question: "Do you resent detention here?" The first remark she got was "Don't talk nonsense, Margaret"—Margaret was her Christian name. The second was "No, there is nothing wrong in this place." The third was "Why should I resent it? This place is protecting me; I am more likely to resent having to go." All those patients are insane.

5693. Chairman: Then you rather give us this warning, that when it is said that an account given by a patient of some particular occurrence is a delusion, it may not be a delusion; it may be true or it may be malicious intent?—Yes, it may be. It is very often a misinterpreted thing, like the complaint of the patient of whom Mrs. Crosland told you; the patient who heard these noises had misinterpreted the whole thing; she is a very very malicious patient; she has recovered and for the moment she is away. In that mildly elated state she was discharged. She was just contentious; she was interfering, fault-finding, almost intolerable, and hearing these sounds and noises she quite characteristically wrote a report and complained to Mrs. Crosland to the effect that there were tortures going on and so on. That is the kind of complaint that patients make.

5694. Now there is one other matter we have to ask you about, and that is your views as to the treatment of incipient cases and the treatment of cases without certification. You are familiar with the movement in that direction?—Yes.

5695. You cannot have been with Professor Robertson without knowing a good deal about this matter. Would you just give us briefly your views as to the policy which could best be adopted in these matters? First of all, are you in favour of a provisional system under which patients might receive treatment without certification?—Do you know, Sir, it is almost impossible for me to answer you, because the matter is so chaotic. I am not very clear about it in my own mind, and the only way in which it could be fought out, I should think, would be as a result of comparing the results of the various people who have tried experiments in a small way.

5696. We are to have the advantage of hearing what has been done at Maudsley, but I think you may help us on the general policy of it. It is our duty to produce cosmos out of that chaos to which you have referred?—That is so. To begin with, there is no objection whatever at the present moment to treating the uncertified patient anywhere you like.

Dr. HENRY YELLOWLEES, O.B.E., M.D., and
Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5697. You have yourself voluntary patients?—That is a different point.

5698. But it is related in this sense, is it not, that you may have a person, for example, who feels that he or she for the time being is rather upset, but has not yet reached the certifiable limit, who would say, "I should like to go to Dr. Yellowlees' care," and is admitted voluntarily. That person may never reach certification, because of the advantage of being treated at the early stages. That case, if arrangements were not made for voluntary admission, might have to stay out until it became certifiable. We have had cases where they cannot take voluntary boarders, and they have been heartbroken about cases that they have not been able to take?—I do not say it would have been the right thing, but as the law stands there would have been no objection to the voluntary boarder going to a nursing home.

5699. Earl Russell: With a chance of a prosecution?—No, excuse me; no chance of prosecution. Why?

5700. Chairman: Suppose the patient had gone there on the edge, so to speak, and while there became of unsound mind?—Then there is a chance of a prosecution.

5701. Is the unhappy patient to be thrown out of the nursing home, or is the owner of the nursing home to run the risk of prosecution? It is that sort of thing we want to devise redress for, if we can?—The moment the voluntary boarder begins to show signs of illness, the Board of Control insist that he shall be certified.

5702. Because otherwise you would have no right to detain him, and his going away might be detrimental to his own health and injurious to the public?—That is so.

5703. Earl Russell: But that is not the reason they want him to be certified. It is the fear that you would be breaking the law if you kept him there uncertified?—The reason they want him certified is to safeguard me and themselves from breaking the law.

5704. Chairman: Supposing the law were re-adjusted on the lines of the Mental Treatment Bill, namely, that voluntary patients could be received and could be detained for a short period of, say, 72 hours, as proposed in the Bill, so as to allow in the case you figure of the necessary steps being taken. If that were done a very large number of people would never reach the certifiable limit at all?—By far the larger number; but it is not so easy as that.

5705. We do not have to handle the practical problems you have to deal with, and we want assistance from you. We do not want to suggest things which are impracticable to persons like yourself?—The fallacies are these: That an early case is necessarily not a certifiable case, and will recover; and that an acute recoverable case can be treated without certification for a short time. Well, the commonest case of all the cases that come in as voluntary boarders is the melancholic; it is probably the commonest form of mental disorder. Now simple melancholics can invariably be induced to come into the place voluntarily. The only reason for having to induce them at all is that they are slow; they object to taking any initiative. Once they have taken the step and have written the request for admission they are perfectly content to remain; they retain their modesty and their dignity and their sensitiveness, unlike many. They are very reasonable indeed, but they have one symptom, the majority of them, namely, a tendency to suicide, which makes them the most difficult patients a mental hospital can possibly have. Now what are you going to do with a person of that type? The patient wants to be there; the patient has come because he or she is afraid that the suicidal impulse or depression will be too much for them; they have come to you to help them. You say to them "Very well, come in; we will do everything that science knows to avert it, and if it cannot be averted we will see you through." The moment the disease comes for which the patient has sought help he becomes suicidal, and becomes a very real danger to himself, and we have to certify him.

5706. I follow that class of case. Now, let me put another type of case to you. Suppose a case of acute mania, but transitory, a mere incident in an otherwise normal and sane life. We have been told that these acute cases are generally the most curable?—Yes, that is so.

5707. Is it not unfortunate that in order legally to detain that person, who for the time being obviously requires restraint, it should be necessary to certify, when after the lapse of a week or a fortnight he may be susceptible of being restored to ordinary life? Why should that class of person have against them a mark, "This is a person who has been certified as insane"? The question is whether every case should necessarily be certified as a preliminary or as a pre-requisite of any detention?—The case you have mentioned differs from the melancholic case to which I have referred in two points only. They are both recoverable, and both will recover. But your acute case does not realise he is ill; he has no insight; and, secondly, he is not a danger to himself, but he is a nuisance to others; he is tending to be violent and unpleasant; otherwise he is the same.

5708. Take both those cases, with their varying features. Have you any views as to the desirability of some provisional method of dealing with cases like that, which are recoverable, so that, interposed between the onset of disease and certification, there might be a period during which the patient would be under observation and treatment, and might emerge cured without certification at all?—Well, I have often wondered whether it would be possible to give some authority to the relatives of the patient, but I do not know how it could be done. I have no thought-out scheme at all; I have worried about it for years.

5709. Earl Russell: Are you not thinking of the better-off patients when you speak of giving the relatives some authority?—Yes.

5710. Chairman: Far the larger proportion of cases are essentially not the type you have to deal with?—Of course, you are making a great step at once if you recommend the admission of voluntary boarders to county mental hospitals. At present they cannot go, as you know; but in the last resort the question is inclined to be a financial one, as you indicated at the beginning.

5711. Earl Russell: Then the Chairman put to you a further step, besides that, you know. Suppose the justice of the peace, whose business it is to pronounce the detention order, had a suspensory power longer than the present very small number of days, by which he could suspend that order to see if a patient improved under treatment, and yet by a mere flick of the pen could certify him at any moment when it was required?—Without seeing him again?

5712. I do not say that. The whole point is to provide that if the man does recover quickly nobody shall say he was a certified lunatic?—I should think it might be arranged to give a power of that kind to the medical superintendent. Once you could make some safeguard, and convince yourselves and the public that his desire would be to avoid detention as long as possible.

5713. It is not us you have to convince; it is the public?—Exactly.

5714. Chairman: There are persons, unhappily, whom people would regard as outside the ordinary pale of humanity, because they are not mentally sound and cannot be cured. On the other hand, there are a great many people in our modern civilised life who have temporary breakdowns of one sort or another, but in many cases nothing more than an illness. It is not a permanent lesion or a permanent degeneracy, but an illness?—That is so.

3 December, 1924.]

Dr. HENRY YELLOWLEES, O.B.E., M.D., and
Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5715. What we all feel, and the public feel, too, is that it is unfortunate that there should be attached to those persons, because of what is merely a transitory stage, the kind of stigma which will attach to people who are degenerate, and who do suffer from other manifestations of insanity, and are persons differing from their fellows. We do not want to put all these people into the same category?—Two questions, Sir: Firstly, the permanent degenerate cannot possibly differ more from his fellows than does the acute maniac at the moment; secondly, does the stigma arise from the patient having been certified, or from his having been in an institution which also accommodates the second class of whom you speak?

5716. The public attach more importance to hall marks, and the fact that a person has been convicted, let us say, if I may take a case with which I am more familiar, is obviously a black mark against that person. There it stands; it is something which does not admit of discussion?—That is so.

5717. Similarly it is said that, when a person has been certified, we need not go beyond that: that person was insane, at least for a time, and therefore that person is regarded as to some extent differing from his fellows?—Do you think that stigma would attach if the person had been a voluntary boarder and had recovered without being certified?

(After a short Adjournment.)

5720. Chairman: Dr. Yellowlees, there is one figure I think we should have from you which would be useful, namely, the proportion of nurses to patients in your institution—can you give us that?—Yes. For every one nurse there are rather less than two patients—about a patient and three-quarters to each nurse.

5721. That is a very high proportion?—It is a high proportion, and in a sense it is misleading, because it includes a large number of patients who pay for the exclusive services of one or perhaps two nurses, which, of course, tends to raise the average.

5722. Then will you tell us what are the charges made for patients—have you a scale?—There is a scale, which briefly is this: The standard charge is five guineas weekly. Higher rates are charged for private accommodation and special nursing if these are desired. Specially low rates are charged and grants made should the patient be connected with the Society of Friends. That, of course, is because the Retreat is a Quaker institution and was primarily for Quaker patients alone.

5723. Do those terms yield a profit?—They yield in an average year a small profit. Of course, these terms have not been operative long enough to know, but the terms we charge generally yield a small profit on the year's working.

5724. What is done with the surplus?—It is applied, after writing off the usual depreciations and so on, either to improving the place or to decreasing the rates of board paid by patients.

5725. There is no inducement to anyone to make any money out of the undertaking?—None whatever. That is, of course, the characteristic of a registered hospital, and all the registered hospitals do a very large amount of charitable work. For example, our charity, because of our position, is limited to Friends, but our lowest rate for Friends is £1 11s. 6d. a week, that is if we give them what we call our maximum grant. Now £1 11s. 6d. a week is very considerably below the cost of maintenance.

5726. Earl Russell: It is not so far off the ordinary pauper rate?—No.

Chairman: I think those are all the questions I desire to ask you. My colleagues will ask you some questions now.

5727. Miss Madeleine Symons: Dr. Yellowlees, you do not have any children at the Retreat, do you?—No. There is no definite age at which we do not receive certified patients. I have a girl of 15 just Chairman: No, I think not.

5718. Earl Russell: But then the voluntary boarder system would not do for your acute case; you must have some power to detain him?—Cannot something be done in that way? I wish I could help the Commission more, but it is the most difficult of all the points.

5719. Sir David Drummond: You seem to associate in your mind this kind of early treatment with mental hospitals, not with general hospitals. Would you think of it from that point of view?—My view of that is this: I think that the mental hospital ought to be such (and that was the point of my last question to the Chairman) that mere residence in it will not convey a stigma. I have no objection to the general hospital treating the cases of acute insanity if it provides the staff who have gone through the mill of practical experience in treating insanity, and provides the necessary facilities; but I think the mental hospital of the future will be a place where there is every possible facility, and a place to which people will come, and that we shall begin to differentiate at the other end; that we shall remove, not the early recoverable patient from the mental hospital, but I foresee, years ahead, the removal of the chronic, demented, degraded, incurable case.

now; I was most unwilling to have her, but she is the youngest I have had for many a day.

5728. Unwilling because you do not think they ought to be in the same institution as adults?—I think it is most unsuitable.

5729. Do you, from your history of the cases, think that many of them start when they are young, or when they are quite children?—It is, of course, impossible to point to anything and say that this is the cause of insanity, but I think that the inherent instability which is the root cause of a large number of forms of mental disorder has been present from a very early age, if not from birth, and is sometimes manifest in childhood. Especially is that so in the disease which is commonly called dementia præcox, in which I am quite sure that abnormal symptoms can be seen in the childhood of those persons who ultimately become sufferers from it.

5730. I was asking you because in various ways in children's courts, and elsewhere, one comes across a good many children who are not mentally deficient, but are abnormal; and I wondered whether you had any views as to whether anything ought to be done about it, from your experience?—What you say is very true and very regrettable. It is hardly in my own line. I have no definite remedial measures to suggest, and I believe that these children of whom you speak do exist and many of them do later become the subjects of dementia præcox.

5731. I thought it would be interesting if you, or perhaps Mrs. Crosland, could tell us something about the cost of maintenance in the Retreat—perhaps the cost of maintenance and the cost of food separately, if you have those figures?—(Mrs. Crosland): You mean the whole maintenance, including the costs of the attendants, and everything?

5732. Yes?—It comes to about four guineas weekly—that is very rough.

5733. Earl Russell: Is that without capital charges?—(Dr. Yellowlees): Without capital charges, but it includes everything else, the cost of the tradesmen and everything. (Mrs. Crosland): The cost of the food alone varies probably between 12s. and 13s. per head per week.

5734. Chairman: Do they all have the same dietary—is there a general standard of diet?—(Dr. Yellowlees): There are small differences between the diets of patients, male nurses and female nurses, but they are very slight. There is a rather more generous allowance for the male nurses, but within fairly close limits they have the same dietary apart from the special cases of sickness. The whole family, by the way, is about rather over 300, although only 170 are patients, that is to say, it is even more than one staff to 1½ patients, if you add in the maids and the extra workers, the plumbers and engineers, and joiners, and so on.

5735. Earl Russell: Dr. Yellowlees, you take in such cases as your committee select; you are not bound to take in any case that is offered you in any way, are you?—No. It is not even my committee, because they do not have time. I can personally, acting I take it with their support later on, decide whether or not I will take or will retain a case.

5736. You have a free choice, I mean?—We have a free choice.

5737. Are your cases in fact selected cases?—In fact they are not, with the exception that we do not take patients suffering from epilepsy, and we do not take patients suffering from the grosser forms of mental defect.

5738. No G.P.I. cases?—Oh yes, any number. When I said mental defect I mean congenital defect; we have any number of G.P.I.'s.

5739. Now on that same question I notice you talk in your précis about popular fallacies in regard to the grading of patients. I do not think you have developed that yet, have you?—No, except incidentally when we were talking about melancholia. The popular fallacy about the grading of patients is this, that all the recent cases are necessarily recoverable, and will not hurt to be with each other, but would hurt to be beside chronic patients. That is very often the reverse of the truth. There are many chronic patients who appear to be perfectly sane—in fact it is the chronic patients whose insanity it is sometimes difficult to tell—there are many chronic patients who are perfectly decent, quiet, ordinary, well-behaved, very pleasant fellows, and they will not recover. There are many recoverable cases who are most unpleasant, noisy, filthy in their habits, dirty and untidy, and possibly suicidal. Finally there are many cases who although they may be recent you could tell from the beginning are, humanly speaking, unrecoverable and will not recover. Thus you can see that when you talk of having an admission block, purely reserved for the recent recoverable cases, it is not quite so simple as it sounds until these considerations are studied. I can imagine at least four consecutive admissions, each one of whom would be most unsuitable to be put with any of the other three.

5740. When you said popular fallacies you really meant fallacies of the general public?—Yes.

5741. I thought you meant fallacies of other members of the medical profession?—I do not say that some of my professional brethren do not share these fallacies, I am afraid they do. It is quite simple when they consider them, but the public are apt to speak on this point of admission and grading of patients without thinking.

5742. I do not think we have heard very much of your voluntary boarders?—No, there are a very small number resident, but more than half the admissions in any one year are voluntary boarders. We have, roughly speaking, 90 to 100 admissions in the year, say 100 as an average, and of those just on 50 per cent. are voluntary boarders. In the year 1923 the proportion of voluntary boarders was just over 48 per cent. of the total admitted. Why there are so few voluntary boarders of the number resident on any given day is, of course, that the voluntary boarders are naturally of a favourable type as regards recovery. They recover, they go away, and you have always the residual population of chronic incurable cases to swell the number of certified patients.

5743. You mean that given a resident population on any given day of 10 or 20, it would mean that four or five times that number had been in and out during the year?—That is so.

5744. What is your number at the moment of voluntary boarders?—At the present moment there are 12 or 14 voluntary boarders resident in the hospital.

5745. These are not certifiable, or should you say some of them were?—As soon as they are certifiable I ought to certify them, but if I think a case is going to recover I fight it out with the Board of Control and use the law's delays as best I can, and the Board of Control are becoming very much more reasonable in that respect.

5746. I am sure they would, of course, subject to the fact that it is their duty not to break the law?—Quite so; of course we must safeguard the patients themselves.

5747. Do you say that if they become voluntary boarders you exercise no restraint on them when they are in your hospital?—I would need a definition of "restraint" before I could answer that.

5748. You would use pretty strong moral suasion if you thought it was undesirable they should go out?—I should simply tell them they will not, and if they will I should say "Very well, you cannot come back, you will have to go altogether." I tell them that is the essential part of the contract, that they agree to carry out my suggestions for treatment, and my wishes, and if they do not carry out my wishes in the matter I say: "Now this cannot go on. Either I have to have the legal right to do it, or else you cannot stay."

5749. And do you find in most cases that is most effective, that they have the sense to submit?—Yes, I think in almost all cases where it arises, the majority of the voluntary boarder cases that one has to do with are cases which have no particular will in the matter; and that is the point Lord Onslow's Bill would have met to a certain extent. The patient is willing enough to come, and then perhaps gets a little worse and ceases to care, has no volition in the matter. Now it all depends, as you know, on how you put the question to the patient, and the Commissioner of the Board of Control is very strict on the whole. Of course he always sees every voluntary boarder, and asks the question, he never misses. He says, "Do you know you are a voluntary boarder?" "Yes." "Do you want to stay here?" and the patient says, "Oh, yes; it is all right," and if the Commissioner is very thorough, or perhaps not tremendously experienced, or is anxious to make the patient a certified patient, or thinks it wise, then you see how readily you can make a patient in that state say anything.

5750. He is really a person without any reasoned volition?—Yes. I say the Board of Control is getting very much more human in that matter. If they are satisfied that the patient is perfectly content to remain, and is not desirous of leaving, they allow us a pretty fair latitude, which is all to the good of the patient.

5751. Now I want to go back to another subject, and that is the subject of the medical certificate. All your patients, of course, come in with two certificates?—That is so.

5752. Do you find, as a rule, these certificates agree pretty reasonably in their account of the patient's condition and symptoms?—Yes, they give different symptoms, showing a common cause as a rule, or if there is anything striking they probably both have got it.

5753. And do you find that the certificate of the regular medical practitioner is fuller and is able to give you more facts than the other one?—No, I cannot say I have ever seen any difference between the two on the average.

5754. Because primâ facie he ought to be able to give you a better and longer history?—He is not asked to give the history, so that it would not come out in that. In subsequent correspondence with him, or from a form we very often send, it does come out.

5755. And from that you get some assistance in treatment?—There is no doubt about that whatever.

5756. Now you think that, although most of the cases are free from doubt, the public would still be alarmed if one medical certificate was all that was necessary in all cases?—I believe the public would be alarmed.

5757. You think if any change were made in the way of assimilation, it would be better to go to the expense of getting two certificates in pauper cases rather than one in all cases?—I do.

5758. Mr. Jowitt: Would you, Dr. Yellowlees, assimilate the process with regard to the necessity of a personal inspection by a magistrate?—No, personally, I would not; I do not set any particular store by the justice or magistrate visiting the patient.

5759. Earl Russell: In either case, or only in the private one?—Personally in either case; but I do believe that the public regard it as a safeguard.

Mr. Jowitt: I think we had evidence from some medical gentlemen that they themselves attach considerable importance to the visit by the magistrate.

Chairman: Yes, that is so.

Mr. Jowitt: You do not agree about that?

Chairman: They like the idea of the intervention of some neutral and unprofessional person.

5760. Mr. Jowitt: He comes in as the man in the street?—Does he not fulfil that function by signing the order, and was not the evidence you heard to that effect?

5761. No. I think I am right in this, that in the case of a private patient it is not necessary for the magistrate personally to see the case?—That is so.

5762. In the case of the rate-aided where there is one doctor, the magistrate has to see the case?—Yes.

5763. You would like, would you, rather from the point of view of alleviating the public anxiety, two medical certificates in each case?—Yes, I would.

5764. Then you would be prepared to say that that having been done, it would be unnecessary for the magistrate to see the case?—I would.

5765. And, if I follow you rightly, your reason for that is that, of course, you perhaps think that the man in the street without any technical knowledge cannot form an opinion which is of value?—That is so. I believe that the magistrate forms his opinion, whether he sees the patient or not, upon the written evidence which is presented to him, and I do not think that his examining the patient as well really helps him to form that opinion, although it may comfort him when the patient is obviously grossly insane.

5766. Earl Russell: Are you not overlooking the fact that it gives the patient some outside representative of the public to make a protest to if he is, in fact, being wrongly certified?—I was about to say that I believe the safeguards for the patient are so good, in my opinion, that even if this were an additional safeguard, which I question, he can very well do without it. I do not believe that a person who was not certifiably insane could be passed by a magistrate's order, and could reside in a mental hospital, as at present constituted, for a week without the case being raised and looked at.

5767. Earl Russell: Yes, but he might not like a week?—I will say a day if you like.

5768. Mr. Jowitt: Let us analyse this a little further. Of course one appreciates the advisability of the man in the street being there, if the popular impression is that there is some great conspiracy on foot among the medical profession?—We must have him somewhere.

5769. As an actual judge of sanity, or insanity, do you say this, that the opinion of a man in the street is really worth little or nothing?—In many cases it is quite worthless. In obvious cases it is as good as anybody else's.

5770. In border line cases, anyhow, you say the opinion of the man in the street is really valueless?—I do.

5771. The trained alienist, or the medical man, would be able to appreciate symptoms which, of course, would not be obvious to the eyes of a lay person?—That is so, or not so much symptoms as their significance.

5772. Now I want to ask you another question. You have given us an account of your institution. I may say some of us have heard of it before, and I may take it, may I not, that so far as human institutions can be satisfactory, the circumstances in which your institution is run make for efficiency in every possible way?—We believe so, we think so.

5773. I mean to say you are fortunate in having a very keen and active committee?—That is so.

5774. I will not refer to yourself, but you have an admirable staff?—I have an admirable staff.

5775. Perhaps I may be allowed to say the staff have an admirable head?—Kindly do not.

5776. And you have a very adequate nursing staff, and you have every possible touch with the outside world for your patients?—Yes.

5777. And a sufficiency of money?—Yes, a sufficiency. We are not endowed but we can, it being a concern of the Society of Friends, touch on them for money when we are in a very bad way. At this moment we are building a nurses' home, and an appeal to the general public would have got little or nothing, but the Society of Friends stands by and helps us, so finance does not really distress us.

5778. So that without wanting to blow your own trumpet for a moment you are, you realise, in a much more favourable position than many of these larger asylums who have to deal with a couple of thousand or 2,500 patients?—I do realise it. Of course I have experience of other institutions, not as their head, but I quite realise what you said.

5779. In your case you know personally and see two or three times a week every inmate of your institution?—That is so.

5780. Therefore you are in the closest possible touch with them and see how their maladies are progressing?—That is so.

5781. From your favourable position you have to deal with the question as to whether they have advanced sufficiently to be allowed out, or to be discharged?—I have.

5782. Now obviously the state between the point of malady and the point of recovery, the border line, it is impossible to draw with any precision?—That is so.

5783. Between light and darkness you must have a twilight?—That is so.

5784. And the personal equation must enter largely into a question of whether a patient shall or shall not be discharged?—Yes.

5785. In order to guide you to make up your mind in any case you can go by stages; you can, first of all, try the effect of a visit to a concert, or allowing the patient out to tea with his friends near by, then you can put him on parole?—That is so.

5786. And gradually by degrees see if the patient is or is not trustworthy?—Yes.

5787. And that is the method upon which you proceed before you make up your mind to discharge a patient?—That is so in the great majority of cases.

5788. Does it not occur to you that even for you, with your training and having comparatively few inmates, it would be an appallingly difficult task to make up your mind as to when the border line has been passed, unless you could go by those stages?—Do you mean, if I had not those means of finding out, how else could I find out?

5789. Yes. You have to make up your mind whether a patient can be discharged. You have these facilities for his going to a concert, or tea with his friends, or to stay with anybody, and you are called upon to make up your mind. Has this man recovered, as has he not recovered?—You have, firstly, your experience of similar cases, and, secondly, you have trial and error. One ought to know the circumstances to which one is going to discharge the patient. Very well, try him out in those circumstances, reproduce them as much as you can. However poorly off the patient may be, he is going back to stay with someone presumably; very well, let them try him for a day or a week; or let him go out on leave of absence and then, if he breaks down when he is out, let him come back.

5790. Now I want to ask you to give us the benefit of your opinion if you will. I want to see if we can devise any methods to make this task rather easier for those in charge of our asylums, where there is bound to be absent that element of personal touch. My impression is that the visiting committee in some cases are apt to be—I do not use the word offensively, a little bit too much under the thumb of the medical superintendent, to lack initiative, so to speak. Is there any other method which you can suggest, the interposition of an independent medical committee, or medical man, to assist the superintendent in coming to a conclusion as to whether a patient may be discharged?—Well, Sir, the point about that is this, that one would have to know, is the superintendent a person who, on the average, is more likely to let them out too soon, or to detain them too long? You speak of the committee being possibly under the thumb of the superintendent, and you speak of the possibility of having some independent person. Is that to be sure that the superintendent has noticed the recovery, or to be sure that the superintendent is not letting them out too soon?

5791. Of course, there is a danger either way; there is a danger to the community at large and to the patient if the patient is let out too soon; but, on the other hand, if the medical superintendent errs the other way there is danger, is there not, of patients, who have been properly certified and who have been kept in an asylum for a considerable time, being retained in the asylum after their sanity has been restored?—If there was the least doubt in such cases when the question is raised, and if the medical superintendent has the least idea in his own mind that the patient is fit to take his place in the world again, the answer is: Try it—and I believe that every medical superintendent works on that line. I do not see how any independent tribunal you could invent would help. To begin with, you would be substituting an independent tribunal for one biased in favour of the patient, if I may say so, which would be a pity; and, secondly, no tribunal would know, unless they cared to get it up with much pains, the history of the case and the circumstances of the patient.

5792. You must not judge the knowledge which a superintendent of a large hospital has of the history of the case from the same point of view as you have in your small home?—Surely every assistant would have a reasonable knowledge of these important factors in connection with the patients under his charge.

5793. But you would agree with me to this extent, would you not—I will not put it any higher than this—that there is a grave danger that persons who have recovered may be detained in asylums unduly long?—I am sorry, Sir, but I cannot agree; I would like to for the sake of broadmindedness, but I cannot do it. I have never experienced it, all our experience has been the other way.

5794. Then you think the danger is of their being discharged too early?—It is not a real danger in any case; it is trouble and expense, but that is the side on which it lies, in my experience, both in Scotland and England. I have read of the point in larger asylums.

5795. I did not hear your early evidence. Have you had experience in dealing with large asylums?—Not what you would call large in England. I have been, in one pauper asylum of 400 beds, the only assistant, and I have been one of several assistants in the Edinburgh Royal, which contains 1,000 beds.

5796. I am asking you to contemplate a harassed man who is dealing with a population that is a good deal too large for him to deal with adequately, and who is called upon to take a responsibility which may be a grave responsibility?—The only case in which it is really a serious responsibility is the question of the convalescent melancholic, and sometimes in a very few cases a man with homicidal ideas and delusions against his own relatives, but those occur more in the story books than in real life. Apart from these, which are a problem, I cannot see any objection to the superintendent going on the rule, which I believe he does adopt, “When in doubt let it be tried.”

5797. Mr. Snell: I did not hear the early part of your evidence, Doctor, but in the latter part you spoke of drugs being given at nights, sedatives or purgatives, by your deputy. Would those deputies be medical men, or people with medical knowledge?—The drug would have been ordered, of course, by the doctor and given by the night superintendent.

5798. It is not that any person would have access to give them of their own volition?—No; it is precisely the same as is done in a general hospital; the drugs are ordered for the night sister, and she discharges the duty.

5799. In your evidence you said there were many border line cases in which the opinion of the man in the street would be more or less valueless?—I did.

5800. This would apply practically also to the opinion of the lay justice of the peace who would sign a certification order?—That is so.

5801. On the matter of the danger of discharging a patient too soon, you mean it would be dangerous to the patient to return him to the strain of outside life before the composure of his mind had been completed?—It would very possibly invite a recurrence of his illness.

5802. Owing to the outside strain that he might have to face?—Going back to the circumstances in which he had broken down.

5803. Mrs. Mathew: Did I understand you, Dr. Yellowlees, to say that you used suggestion treatment?—I said so. There are very few of the insane who can advisedly be treated by suggestion, but it is a form of treatment with which I have had a great deal to do in other cases, and the application of suggestion to the insane is a very interesting thing. Of course, suggestion was used and is used daily, but was used in mental hospitals long before it was used anywhere else and long before the public had any particular interest in it; but there are still, apart from the obvious suggestions—encouragement and hope which one gives to all patients—only a few mental cases who are amenable to suggestion treatment.

5804. And you have found it useful?—I have found it useful in a very few cases.

5805. Sir Humphry Rolleston: You have never seen any bad results, have you, from suggestion?—Do you refer to suggestion aided with hypnotism?

5806. Either with or without the induction of sleep?—No, I have not; but then I have selected the cases with some care. I can well imagine that, given in unsuitable ways to unsuitable patients, you might have much trouble.

5807. You do not think that you could ever induce crime by suggestion, do you?—No. It is one of the subjects on which I made a certain number of experiments when I wrote a small book on the subject. It is rather a difficult thing to experiment upon, because you have to let the patient into the secret. With the aid of two colleagues, however, who were good about it, I experimented on that matter with the sane. But my view is that you cannot get a crime committed under hypnotic suggestion.

5808. Now it was suggested to you that patients were kept in public asylums unduly?—That is so.

5809. You have no evidence to support that, have you?—None whatever.

5810. That is a suggestion which from a medical point of view you would rather strongly oppose?—As regards my own experience I oppose it. I say it is simply not the case. It may occur in public asylums, and I can imagine it much more likely to occur in a very large institution that was under-staffed, and so on, unless the patient's relatives were sufficiently vocal.

5811. If it occurred then it would be a pure accident. There is no object in retaining a patient?—

The suggestion that there is any object or motive in doing it is to my mind grotesque.

5812. You have had a great deal of experience with private patients?—I have.

5813. I should like to ask you a question as to the function of the petitioner, whether in a certain proportion of cases the petitioner is not entirely satisfactory; but from the nature of the case someone has to take up that rather unpleasant duty, and he discharges it without very much enthusiasm or without much interest?—That is perfectly correct.

5814. Therefore the petitioner is a source of a certain amount of anxiety to people like yourself?—That is perfectly correct in some cases.

5815. Now how would you view the suggestion that in those instances some kind of official petitioner, analogous perhaps to the Official Receiver, might be appointed?—My only objection to it is that the patient's relatives (dealing with private patients) so very strongly resent as a rule any official interference. The less official interference they can have of course the happier they are. I can see it might be a very good arrangement. Of course I think in the majority of cases the petitioner does his work fairly, but there are cases precisely as you have described.

5816. Sir Ernest Hiley: Could you tell me what is your annual percentage of readmissions as compared with those of ordinary county mental hospitals?—I am very sorry that I have not got it in my mind, and I do not think it is in my report.

5817. Could you send it in afterwards?—I should be very glad to; I will do that with pleasure.

5818. Sir David Drummond: Dr. Yellowlees, would you tell us what is the distinction between a registered hospital and a private hospital?—I will. The registered hospital is managed by a voluntary committee who have no pecuniary interest in its welfare. A private asylum or licensed house is managed by a man or a company who are directly interested financially in it.

5819. Is that the only difference?—No, that is the essential difference.

5820. I want to know for the sake of the statement going on the notes?—The licensed houses, generally speaking, are, I think, on the whole, smaller; they give more accommodation, many of them, to each patient. Patients who pay very high rates of board generally go to some of the licensed houses; patients who desire a tremendous amount of privacy and have practically the whole of a villa, which is run in connection with a licensed house. They generally have few patients and they are, with few exceptions, perhaps, not run on hospital lines. They are not satisfactory for acute recent cases. I do not say that against them at all, but their type is more of a retired place for a chronic patient. They are under much more stringent inspection and safe-guarding than are the registered hospitals, because of their constitution. They are more frequently visited, for example, by official bodies, and their number is not being added to; no fresh licences are being given. I do not think that the fact of their proprietors being financially interested in them for one moment does affect their treatment of their patients, but the factor is there.

5821. Now do you think that with your knowledge of private licensed and registered hospitals throughout this country, there is sufficient accommodation for private insane patients?—I do not know, Sir, if I have been in England long enough to answer that question wisely. I should have thought that for private patients the accommodation is fairly good, but I really do not pretend to answer that question with wisdom.

5822. You cannot give me a definite answer?—I cannot.

5823. Then if it were considered desirable to expand that accommodation, in what direction would you suggest it should be done?—Well, I think the registered hospital is as near the ideal form as you can get. I believe in the hospital ideal, and I believe in the absence of any possible financial interest in the prosperity of the place.

5824. You think the extension should be in the direction of the registered hospital?—That, I believe, to be the best we have got.

5825. Now would you expand an opinion you gave, it was to the effect that it was very desirable to have a lady doctor on the staff?—Yes.

5826. Tell me what the advantages are to the hospital and to the patients?—More than half the patients are women, and of those women there are a large number, not all by any means, who prefer to be treated by one of their own sex. More than half of the nursing staff are women, and of those a large number prefer to be treated by one of their own sex.

5827. Do you suggest that the medical superintendent should in many cases be a lady?—Not yet. To a certain extent I would like a few of man's rights left, but I have no doubt that it may come to that. It is one of the difficulties at the present moment that we cannot give her promotion.

5828. You tell me that the treatment of the women patients is in the hands of the lady doctor alone; the male assistant does not see the cases?—Of course he sees them; they work in absolute harmony; one has to relieve the other, which is one of the draw-backs in a way; she has to relieve on the male side and he on the female side when one of them is out.

5829. He sees the female cases?—Certainly. There is a cardinal rule I go on, that whatever else happens or does not happen, I myself, the matron and the senior assistant, who is a man, must know everything about every patient.

5830. And you seriously tell me that women patients prefer to be treated by a woman?—I did not say so; I said that some of them did. A large number of them express no opinion. Of course the Society of Friends has feelings upon that matter, as you no doubt know, and possibly that is one of the reasons why it came in at an early date. This particular subject was discussed by the Conference between the committees and superintendents of asylums and the Board of Control a couple of years ago, and there was a considerable difference of opinion upon it; but it seems, I think, only reasonable, that out of three medical officials one should be a woman, if she is a properly trained woman.

5831. But you still maintain that the head should be a man?—No, I do not; I think in the present state of things it would be rather difficult for the head to be a woman, but I do not think a man has any prescriptive right to being a superintendent of an asylum. I should be sorry for any woman who tried the job.

5832. You referred to the fact that in your experience the certificates were often very inaccurate?—That is so.

5833. Were you referring to the medical certificate or to the magistrate's certificate?—Neither. Mainly to the petitioner having failed to fill in the forms accurately.

5834. The petitioner, not the doctor?—The doctor fills in the things about his patient properly. What a doctor does in a moment of aberration, for example, is to sign a certificate "11th November" instead of "11th June." I have had that happen.

5835. But that would not occur very often, would it?—Almost every certificate I have to return in connection with some part of it, generally the petitioner's part; but the dates are most confusing, and there are technical irregularities of that kind.

5836. As a rule the medical certificates are fairly accurate?—The statements of the patient's symptoms are thoroughly accurate, I have rarely any complaint to make about them.

5837. You are quite satisfied with the form of the certificate, simply a statement of what the individual doctor has seen, and with no reference to the history of the case at all? This is a very important matter from a professional point of view?—I think that I could write out a better schedule than the present one easily enough, but I do not know that there is very much to be said against it, except that it might be a little less archaic in its phraseology.

Mrs. CONSTANCE M. R. CROSLAND.

5838. Do you think it is desirable that the doctor's statement should be limited strictly to the statement of what he saw at the time and absolutely independent of history?—Well, that is hardly so. He has two things to do. He must give facts observed by himself, and there is a special place for him to give information obtained from others, and in that place he can surely give any salient features. Of course, the certificate is not a medical report. The certificate is a statement by a medical man to convince a lay person of a certain thing, and it has to be framed with that object in view.

5839. Then you are perfectly satisfied with the certificate?—Yes, if it were a shade easier for the average man to understand. I have no complaint with the form of it.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you ask the witness this question, Sir, with regard to the Retreat: Whether there is any special plant or any special appliances to be found there, such as would not be found in an ordinary hospital.

5840. Chairman: Well, Dr. Yellowlees, you have been in various institutions of different types, as we know. You have talked of baths, and so on. Have you appliances in your Retreat that are not to be found in public hospitals, let us say?—No; I do not think we have anything as to which we can lay claim to being unique. My particular method of the continuous bath is an invention, but there are many other methods just as good. We have not got many things that many other places have, of course.

5841. Sir David Drummond: Have you not an institution in Scarborough?—No. We had our holiday home at Scarborough, but, as a matter of fact, our lease of it has run out.

5842. Have you no place of the kind now?—We take a summer house year by year. We have two detached villas in the grounds, and we have a detached house a mile away.

5843. Under what conditions do patients live, either at Scarborough or a mile away?—A mile away they are sent on leave of absence, because the place is not technically "The Retreat," and a Sister is in charge there, and one of my colleagues visits it daily.

5844. Chairman: You cannot say that you have at the Retreat any equipment over and above what one would find in a reasonably modern public hospital?—In a modern hospital, certainly not. We have an absence of padded rooms. We have not certain things which you would find somewhere else.

5845. Mr. Walter Stewart: Could not the witness tell us what is the approximate average duration of residence of the voluntary inmate at the Retreat?—I am afraid I shall have to send that information to the Commission.

Chairman: I should like to have that information, and then we can give it to Mr. Stewart.

Witness: If you please.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Would you ask the witness, Sir, whether he has observed, in connection with Section 31, that very often the petitioner fails to state the reason why the regular medical attendant has not given the second certificate? The section provides that the petitioner should state why that has not been done. Has the witness observed in any case within his knowledge that there has been that failure on the part of the petitioner?

Chairman: Just one moment. I am looking at the form. Does not the form provide that you must state it?

Mr. Walter Stewart: Yes, that the petitioner must state it if the regular practitioner does not certify.

Witness: There is a special space in the form for it. It is on the medical certificate.

Chairman: I have got the form of medical certificate, which is Form 8.

Mr. Walter Stewart: Section 31 says it shall be part of the petition: "shall be deemed to be part of the petition"; those are the concluding words of the section.

Chairman: The point is, why do not the doctors say so? There does not seem to be any place provided in the form.

Mr. Walter Stewart: No.

Witness: But there is, sir. I cannot recollect whether it is in the medical certificate form or the petition, but it is there in every single case. "The reasons why this petition is not presented by the usual medical attendant are as follows."

Chairman: However, I do not see that Dr. Yellowlees can help us in this. If the form is inadequate, the form must be made adequate.

Mr. Walter Stewart: The question I was asked to put was whether the witness had noticed that there was a failure on the part of a petitioner in any case to explain why the regular medical attendant had not certified, whether he has ever noticed the case of a petition in which there was that failure?

Witness: In every case where that is omitted, and it always appears on the form, though for some reason it does not appear to be here, as in the case of every other irregularity, the Board of Control (to whom we have to send copies of the papers precisely as received) return the papers to us, with red ink requests for emendations.

5846. Chairman: And would that be one of the emendations required by them if the petitioner had failed to state why the regular attendant was not one of the certifiers?—Most certainly. No case ever remains with that question unanswered. The Board of Control sent me back a paper the other day because one of my colleagues had signed himself "Assistant Physician" instead of "Acting Medical Officer," so I can assure you they do not miss the larger question.

5847. Earl Russell: Can you suggest to us any reasonable ground for the provision of 14 days in the matter of an escape? You have had an experience of an escape. Is there any point in that provision of the 14 days?—No; I have often wondered what it was for. I suppose it is to save the trouble of re-certifying, if he was taken back reasonably soon.

5848. Why should it not be a longer period?—You do give him a chance of having recovered in the period. I do not see any use for it.

5849. You would not say that a patient who had been able to maintain himself at large for 14 days was necessarily sane?—No, I would not, by any means.

5850. You cannot think of any reason for that particular provision?—No, I cannot.

5851. Chairman: It is arbitrary?—I think it is arbitrary.

Chairman: We are much indebted to you for the most interesting evidence you have given us.

* See Appendix XVII.

(The Witnesses withdrew.)

Dr. J. G. PORTER PHILLIPS, M.D., F.R.C.P., and Mr. LIONEL L. FAUDEL-PHILLIPS called, and examined.

5852. Chairman: I understand, Dr. Porter Phillips and Mr. Faudel-Phillips, you are both here together to give us evidence in a conjoint form and to supplement each other's statements?—(Dr. Porter Phillips): Yes.

5853. First of all, Dr. Phillips, you are a Doctor of Medicine, and a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and you hold the post of Physician Superintendent to the Bethlem Royal Hospital?—Yes.

3 December, 1924.]

Dr. J. G. PORTER PHILLIPS, M.D., F.R.C.P., and
Mr. LIONEL L. FAUDEL-PHILLIPS.

5854. And you are Physician for and Lecturer in Mental Diseases at St. Bartholomew's Hospital?—Yes.

5855. And are you Physician to the Hospital for Nervous Diseases (out-patients) and Lecturer to the Royal Free Hospital School of Medicine for Women?—I am.

5856. You have, I think, studied the Terms of Reference to this Royal Commission?—I have.

5857. And are you in a position to place before us your views on one or two of the topics upon which you are specially qualified to speak?—Yes, I hope so.

5858. I think your experience has been obtained as the result of your present position as medical officer of a registered mental hospital, and as a physician to an out-patients' clinic, and also from private consulting practice?—Yes.

5859. And you have made a study, of course, of the literature of this subject as well?—I have.

5860. Has your experience been derived entirely from treatment of private patients as distinguished from rate-aided patients?—That is so.

5861. I think the Commission would like to have your views upon the question of the treatment of voluntary patients without certification?—The voluntary boarder system has been in vogue at Bethlem Hospital I think for the last 40 years, and from careful observations made by my predecessors and by myself, I think we are agreed that it is a system which should be encouraged in many ways.

5862. What is the total population of your institution at Bethlem?—When we are full, 300 patients.

5863. How many of those will one find to be voluntary inmates?—At present nearly 40 per cent. are voluntary patients.

5864. Will you tell us a little of your experience with voluntary patients, and how the system works?—A straightforward voluntary patient of course gives no trouble; he readily makes up his mind; he knows that perhaps he is ill, and he seeks advice, and on the advice perhaps of his own medical practitioner or of his relatives, he is admitted in an easy manner. There are patients, however, who find a difficulty in making up their minds, but on gentle persuasion by their relatives, or on the strong advice of the practitioner, they are induced to apply to the hospital for admission. They have to sign a form which is placed before them, clearly indicating to them their exact position, and the conditions under which they will live at the hospital. Regarding first of all their detention, they know definitely that if they give 24 hours' written notice to the physician superintendent, or his deputy, he or she can leave the hospital. They also know that if there are any complaints (that is also stated on the paper) to make, they have to put them in writing or verbally, so that they may reach the proper quarter. At times we find a difficulty during the first few days. The patient may feel undecided as to whether he should remain or not, but on the whole we have little trouble in legitimately persuading the patient that in his own interest he had better remain. There is no coercion of any kind, and on the whole we find that they are willing to remain.

5865. These patients, of course, would be paying patients?—Not necessarily. A very large percentage of the patients admitted to Bethlem Hospital as private patients are admitted on a free basis, quite 70 per cent. of them are free. (Mr. Faudel-Phillips): It varies very much, but it is safe to say 70 per cent.

5866. Who provides for their maintenance there?—The foundation. It is a charitable foundation. (Dr. Porter Phillips): The difficulty, of course, arises if the patients become mentally unbalanced. Occasionally we find patients who show signs of temporary loss of memory, or confusion, which may clear up in the 24 hours. From our experience we are not keen on taking immediate steps, but we usually give them some limitation as regards time, two or three days; and if the mental condition does not clear up then we have to appeal to the relatives to remove the patient and to take steps to carry out certification, if necessary.

5867. Then the 24 hours is the period which the patient agrees to as a period during which he may be detained, even although he wants to go out—he contracts to that effect?—Yes; we do not carry that out strictly; that is purely a time limit, so that we may get in touch with the relatives.

5868. Yes, because the case one naturally figures is the case of a patient who has come in on a voluntary basis, and then unfortunately the case deteriorates, and the patient wants to go out at once, and you recognise that the case is one where it would not be expedient to allow him out. In such a case you have 24 hours' moratorium, so to speak, and that would enable you to get into touch with the relatives and to get an urgency order?—That is so, but we always like the patient to leave the hospital if he is not too ill, and then be brought back again.

5869. Brought back on a new status, either under an urgency order or an ordinary reception order?—That is so. I think it would have a bad effect on the patient if the patient felt that at first he was admitted as a voluntary patient, and then, because he happened to be showing mental symptoms requiring certification, we had taken advantage of his detention there.

5870. Chairman: You want to discriminate between the two periods of his residence?—Yes.

5871. So far as a person is able to enter into this relationship with you, I do not see much difficulty; but there must be many cases where a patient has really no volition and could not properly contract with you to stay for 24 hours, or for any other time. Do you take such cases as voluntary patients?—No, we refuse them.

5872. Then you do not have any of the class of patients contemplated in Lord Onslow's Bill, a patient without volition, for whom the relatives may contract?—Not at present.

5873. Would you regard that as a desirable extension of your present practice?—I certainly think so, yes.

5874. In the case of your voluntary patients, is the proportion of recovery high?—Fairly high, considering the acute character of the illnesses we have to deal with. We have got up to over 50 per cent. recoveries; last year it was slightly less than that.

5875. Does this method of receiving patients on a voluntary basis enable you to treat to recovery a considerable number of cases which are restored to society without certification at all?—Yes.

5876. We are much interested as a Commission in this question of avoiding certification, while at the same time securing for patients the same measure of beneficent treatment. Do you advocate an extension of this system of voluntary residence in institutions?—Yes, most emphatically.

5877. And do you think it would be desirable to extend it to the rate-aided patients in public asylums?—Undoubtedly.

5878. I think on this question of the difference in the position between the private patient on the one hand and the rate-aided patient on the other, you take the view that there is really no reason for discriminating between the treatment of the two classes of cases?—In my opinion, no.

5879. In certification there is, of course, a different code applicable to the two, as we know?—Yes.

5880. If we were to recommend the assimilation of the position of the two classes of patients, what would you regard as the system of certification which should be adopted for all classes?—As I have suggested in my précis, I consider, in the first instance, there might be some temporary observation order put into action.

5881. For all cases?—For all cases.

5882. Then the temporary observation order would not have the quality of a certification?—No.

5883. But would be something short of it?—The word "observation" meaning a good deal.

5884. Would it require to be accompanied with some power of control or detention?—Undoubtedly.

3 December, 1924.]

Dr. J. G. PORTER PHILLIPS, M.D., F.R.C.P., and
Mr. LIONEL L. FAUDEL-PHILLIPS.

5885. But something short of the full strength of a certification order?—Yes.

5886. Now do you contemplate that in that period of observation a certain number of the cases would pass out?—Yes.

5887. And in that way escape certification?—Yes.

5888. Where would you contemplate such persons being kept during this period of observation?—Under the present system the housing question would be rather difficult, because most of the institutions are out of London—the large institutions.

5889. I think we may say we do not very much like the idea of utilising the workhouse as a place of observation. Other suggestions that have been made are that the general hospitals might have a department for the purpose; and another suggestion is that the asylums might have associated with them a department for observation purposes, or I suppose a hospital, such as your own, might have an observation department?—Undoubtedly. I think there are a certain number of cases that might be quite adequately looked after and treated in a general hospital; I do not mean in the general wards, but in a special wing or special ward. I have in my experience been called upon to give an opinion regarding the mental condition of certain patients, and I formed the opinion that the patient might in a few days or a week recover his mental balance, and I have suggested that he should be treated as an ordinary patient, perhaps in a side room. Within the last two or three months I can recall three or four cases in which there was a desire on the part of those responsible in the general hospital to certify. In those particular cases I recommended that they should continue treatment a little longer. In all three cases the patient showed signs of rapid recovery, and two out of the three have completely recovered, and neither of the three cases has been certified. One felt justified in recommending that. I think it is quite within the law to suggest that. The patients perhaps were showing certain mental symptoms, and yet their conduct was not such as to require control or restraint. These early cases may be associated with general or physical illnesses, and I think especially in those cases they should have every opportunity given them to continue in the atmosphere of a general hospital.

5890. One would desire, if possible, of course, to avoid the creation of a new class of institution, if one could avail oneself of existing institutions. The association of the asylums would be avoided if the observation order applied to a ward of a general hospital?—Yes.

5891. Would the advantages of such observation orders include this, that persons would not be deterred by fear of the stigma of certification from going at the early stage, at the outset of their illness?—I certainly think so.

5892. And would you thus perhaps be able to arrest incipient cases more frequently than is now possible, where people put off to the last moment going to the asylum?—Quite so.

5893. So that it would have a double advantage?—Yes.

5894. It would not only avoid certification, but also possibly prevent incipient cases developing?—Yes; and it is not only that, of course. I am in charge of two out-patient mental departments, and one finds there are patients presenting themselves quite readily, quite eager to receive advice and follow out treatment in the early stages; they feel, by coming to a general hospital, fairly safe, and they are not apprehensive, and they seem to have more confidence not only in themselves but in the physician dealing with the case.

5895. It would also enable cases which, while for the moment acute, were merely transitory, to be treated, and again to avoid certification?—Undoubtedly.

5896. Then I think you have views with regard to the certificate itself, and you have a preference which corresponds with what the statute also prefers, namely, that the medical attendant of the patient himself should be one of the certifying doctors?—Yes, I think that is essential.

5897. The statute provides "wherever possible." Of course it is not always possible?—Not always.

5898. Would you recommend the extension of that to all cases, pauper as well as private?—Yes, to all cases.

5899. Have you anything to say to us on the subject of out-patient clinics?—Yes, I have just touched upon that. One finds a great number of patients who can really receive treatment with benefit in an out-patient clinic. I find that a difficulty in dealing with patients in an out-patient clinic is that very often their trouble arises from their social setting at home, and one finds it extremely difficult to remove that. They come up to the clinic, they are examined, they are given treatment, and I have noticed that they appear to be considerably better even in that short time, in those early stages at any rate, and they go back home feeling (from what I have gathered from evidence) that they have really received benefit by that visit. But as an out-patient clinic is only held once or twice a week they have to wait at home, and wait until perhaps the next visit, it may be a week hence, and during that time many of the militating factors are at work; and all the good that one has done perhaps during the visit is undone during the week; so that I think the social setting of the patient is an all important thing, and that is a difficult question in connection with out-patient clinics.

5900. Of course they have to remain resident in their own homes, with all the concomitant disadvantages. So you find the chances of curative treatment are much enhanced if the patient can be taken away from such surroundings?—I think most of them, if not all, would benefit greatly.

5901. On the other hand, do you find there are cases which can be treated to recovery as out-patients?—Yes; we have a fair number of patients who are treated in the ordinary way, with a weekly visit, and perhaps in the course of two or three months they have completely recovered.

5902. You are, as you have told us, Physician for, and Lecturer in, Mental Diseases at St. Bartholomew's Hospital. To what extent is mental disease dealt with at St. Bartholomew's, which is a general hospital?—We only have the out-patient department definitely dealing with early mental patients; we have no wards there.

5903. When you lecture do you have demonstrations for your students?—Yes.

5904. You take an out-patient case?—We have out-patient cases, yes.

5905. You describe the case?—Yes. We generally have a number of students who attend the out-patients' department and sit there with me, and the salient points and chief features of the case are discussed; in that way there is a kind of demonstration.

5906. Those cases, I suppose, are not certifiable cases, are they?—I should think some of them are, a small percentage, but there are some patients who are definitely certifiable.

5907. Of course, your interest is not the legal interest; you are looking at them from the medical point of view?—Purely from the medical point of view. Some of them are quite unfit to come up regularly to the out-patient department; they ought to be under care and treatment.

5908. Suppose you see a case which is of that character, what do you do? Do you take steps to see that the case is certified and sent to an asylum?—I simply inform the relatives, or the practitioner who is dealing with the case. I usually interview the relatives if they are present, they usually are; and if not, I generally write to the medical practitioner who has been dealing with the case, drawing his attention to the fact that in my opinion the patient is quite unfit to be an out-patient and should receive indoor treatment somewhere.

5909. I take it your ideal is that you would send such a patient who was not able to benefit materially from out-patient clinic treatment to some intermediate observation ward for a time?—Undoubtedly; that would be an ideal way of dealing with it.

5910. Under some modified order?—Yes.

5911. And a period would thus be interposed in which the patient could be studied further, possibly treated to recovery, or possibly disposed of by detention under a certification order?—Yes.

5912. Do you think the interposition of such a stage would be of great value not only medically, but also from the point of view of the public relationship to mental disease?—Undoubtedly; I think it would provide adequate protection for the patient, which is a great feature at the present time; and before certification was resorted to one could form a very definite opinion, and perhaps in a number of cases certification would not be needed.

5913. Then the only other topics to which you refer are, first of all, the terminology at present used in connection with mental disease: Are you anxious to remove from the terminology of it, so far as the public are concerned, the suggestion of stigma which attaches just now to words like "lunatic" and "asylum"?—Yes. I think they are very unnecessary and very unpleasant, and they do rather hurt the susceptibilities of patients and relatives.

5914. And you would approve of the assimilation of the terminology of this branch of the public service to that of an ordinary hospital as far as possible?—Yes.

5915. Then I think you have some views also on the question of the training of nurses. Perhaps you will tell us a little about your nursing staff at Bethlem?—The nursing world at present is, unfortunately, in an unstable condition, but at Bethlem we have a fairly good staff. With regard to training, they are trained by the sister of the ward, or the charge male nurse, and I think I can safely say that all our charges, that is, the sister on the female side and the charge male nurse on the male side, are individuals of fairly long experience; and the nurses receive the ordinary ward training from them. They also receive instruction from the matron, and, in addition to that, they have a systematic course of lectures and practical instruction by the medical officers. Throughout the whole of the year they are attending classes and demonstrations, and, as you know, they have to pass examinations in order to justify their position.

5916. Do you think that the conditions of service and the remuneration of the nurses at present make the career an attractive one?—I think, comparing it with general nursing, it is fairly favourable.

5917. Do you approve of mental nurses having at some stage of their training some general hospital work?—I strongly advocate it.

5918. Would you put it before or after their period of specialised mental training?—I should think in many ways it might be preferable before and in some ways, one might say, during the training; that is to say, having been appointed to the staff of a mental hospital, at some later period of their training they might go to a general hospital for their general training; in fact, we have done that at Bethlem on certain occasions in order to train a nurse for special duties; we have sent the individual to a general hospital for three to six months, or longer if necessary; six months is about the longest period recently.

5919. Have you, in connection with Bethlem, any library?—Yes, we have, if I may say so, a very well equipped library, and we also have a pathological department.

5920. Is your institution visited by students?—Yes, and qualified practitioners.

5921. I do not propose, subject to what my colleagues may wish, to take you over all the topics we have heard so much of to-day from Dr. Yellowlees as to the general administration of the code, unless you have any special points you wish to bring before us of the difficulties you have experienced in working the code of law.—No, I have listened to Dr.

Yellowlees' evidence this afternoon. I do not think it stimulated me with regard to any new ideas.

5922. Then I think we might take a little evidence from you, Mr. Faudel-Phillips. You are a governor of Bethlem Royal Hospital, are you not?—Yes, I have been for about 20 years, I think.

5923. And your father, Sir George Faudel-Phillips, was a governor from 1888, and president of the hospital from 1897 to 1912?—That is so.

5924. And your grandfather, Sir Benjamin Phillips, was a governor from the year 1857?—That is so.

5925. So that we may take it you have hereditary associations?—There is a long family connection.

5926. There is a Mental Hospitals Association, is there not?—Yes.

5927. And Bethlem Royal Hospital is a member of that Association?—That is so.

5928. Does the Association meet from time to time to consider matters of interest to you?—They do. They meet more frequently than I have attended, but I have been there.

5929. But you are a member?—That is the case of many associations to which we all belong.

5930. I think you were appointed Treasurer of the Hospital in 1920?—That is so.

5931. And in that capacity one of your chief duties is to preside at the weekly meetings of the sub-committee at which petitions for the admission of patients are considered?—That is so.

5932. Are all the persons who are to enter your institution interviewed by you personally?—Yes, by me and, generally speaking, by a certain number of the Committee—the patients before we enter the committee-room, and the relations after we have entered it; that is to say, we go with the doctor, we interview the would-be voluntary boarders, because we make a practice to hear from them whether they wish to remain; we do not coerce them, but we ask them. The doctor informs them who we are, and asks them to say voluntarily whether they wish to remain as voluntary patients or not.

5933. But does this interview which you have with the patients apply to all classes of patients, both voluntary and certified ones?—Yes, that is so.

5934. I should have thought that some of the certified patients would not perhaps be in a position to have an interview?—In those circumstances I always make a practice of seeing the patients who are certified and are in bad health or in bed, or, possibly, in padded rooms. I do not ask the rest of the Committee to go. If they want to they can, but I invariably see every patient myself on admission.

5935. You will have in the case of the certified patients, of course, the reception documents; that is to say, the certificates and the order of the magistrate?—Yes, the doctor has those things.

5936. Do you see those documents yourself?—I always see them on the table every week; they are brought up to the Committee on the admissions.

5937. Do you have complaints from your patients to any extent?—Not to any extent. We do have complaints obviously from people who are unbalanced and who have troubled minds, but, as a matter of fact, we have extraordinarily few.

5938. Do you get your complaints in the form of letters sometimes?—Yes; generally speaking, they are addressed to me personally, or else to the Committee, or the Chairman of the Committee. They are brought to me on Wednesday morning, I read them, and I always make it a rule to interview those patients. Very often patients write in every day or oftener, and I have the privilege of getting the letters through the post, so I get them at home as well as at the hospital; but if the patient is not an habitual letter writer then we go and see him always, after the Committee is disposed of.

5939. Do you see the complaining patient alone?—Any of the Committee who like to go. I see them, and invite any of the rest of the Committee and the doctor to be present at anything they have to say.

5940. In investigating these complaints have you ever found that there was substance in them, and found things that required setting right?—Very rarely. I have occasionally found a clue, but very, very rarely.

Mr. LIONEL L. FAUDEL-PHILLIPS.

5941. What is the type of complaint—generally?—The general type of complaint is that they want to leave that afternoon or the next day; they have had enough, they are not ill, and they must go home.

5942. They are complaints against being kept there?—Yes.

5943. Have you had any complaints about their treatment or about their food?—I would not like to say that in 20 years I have not known of a complaint, but it is very rare; I cannot recall one at the moment.

5944. The majority of the complaints you receive are against being detained?—Yes, that is the general type of complaint.

5945. When you get a complaint which is not habitual you do see the patient yourself?—Always the same day.

5946. Have you ever found any case in which you have had reason to doubt whether the detention was proper or not, apart from the medical view of the case altogether?—For the last 10 years certainly not. Since I have got accustomed to it, I have never had any doubt in my mind that a patient who has complained has been wrongfully detained.

5947. Do you consult with your medical superintendent with regard to the case?—I always do where possible. If he is not there—and he generally is—I always insist upon the medical superintendent or one of the other doctors being present at the interview. I never will see them alone except in rare cases. I had a case of a man to-day who kept me for 20 minutes; he would not let me go, but that was only to comfort him; he was a man who was very actively mentally ill.

5948. You have seen to-day a patient in your hospital without a doctor at all?—Yes, I did. It is very difficult to say the doctor was not present, because the interview was in a large dining room in which we could be observed.

5949. Could he hear what was being said between you?—Not a word; we could be seen, but not heard.

5950. When you heard this patient's complaints to-day what sort of complaints were they?—He has a Russian name, but he spoke in a mixture of German and Hebrew. I am acquainted with German, but my knowledge of Hebrew is very small, and it was very difficult. One of the complaints was that the doctors were trying to poison him, and that he could not take the medicine which they gave. I think I subsequently learned that he had had a sleeping draught last night; but, at any rate, he could not take the medicine they were offering him, because they were trying to poison him. That is a very common delusion. Then he said he had some differences of opinion with his son who had put him into Bethlem, because he was neither ill nor mad, for reasons which were not very clear. I think they must have been in Hebrew; but they were not very clear. The result of it all was that he must be taken out to-night, because if he were not removed he would go mad. That took about 20 minutes, and then I had had enough.

5951. There is no doubt about his mental condition?—No, none at all.

5952. It is interesting to us to know that in your institution even a patient so obviously deranged is entitled to have an interview with you alone and does have it?—Yes, he is entitled to it, I think.

5953. Are you in favour of the system of voluntary patients?—Very much.

5955. That is the sort of case Dr. Phillips has just been telling us about: the patient who recovers partially, and then chooses to remain on?—Yes, of his volition.

5956. Do you think that the admission of voluntary patients to Bethlem may go some way to remove the association of hopelessness that is apt to characterise an asylum in the public mind?—I think so definitely, because there are obviously very many cases which come in and clear up. I am not a doctor, but I can say I have had experience of them. As voluntary patients they come in free and go out free, without any sort of stigma of certification.

5957. Of course we cannot but realise that there is a certain legacy of unfortunate association still lingering round the mental hospital of all classes. We are much concerned to assist in removing that so far as possible, and in removing the cause for it so far as possible. Do you think that not only a system of voluntary patients, but also, possibly, a system of observation of patients who were under a qualified control, might further assist that process, so as to reduce the number of persons actually certified in asylums or in registered hospitals?—Undoubtedly.

5958. Do you view with favour any system which would reduce the actual number of certifications?—I do.

5959. Speaking again as a person very conversant with this world with which we are dealing, do you think that the stigma of certification is still an actual real thing in the public mind?—I think so, undoubtedly. Not only do I think that, but I can give it you in a curious form. The word "Bedlam." Bethlem is very little known, curiously enough, except among people of the medical profession, and the word "Bedlam" is still a very potent factor and a very great drawback to the tremendous work our hospital does.

5960. The name of your institution in that corrupted form has passed into the English language, and suggests a place of disordered and unruly inhabitants?—Yes, a place of madness—of people who are mad.

5961. And, therefore, association in these matters may be a very potent social factor which it is very desirable to avoid as far as possible?—Very.

5962. On the patients leaving, do you ask them to express their opinion of how they have been treated?—No, I never ask them, but I wish them good-bye, and in 99 cases out of 100 they thank the staff, the doctors, and incidentally, the Committee, for what has been done for them.

5963. Is that statement volunteered to you before or after the effective discharge has been granted?—After the effective discharge has been granted. They do not come in to wish us good-bye until that has happened.

5964. Because it has been suggested that persons who have not yet been discharged might desire to conciliate the person who had power to discharge them, by saying pleasant things?—I would say this, that very often patients are actually discharged before they can leave the hospital; they may have to remain in the hospital for a week before a home can be found for them.

5965. But the discharge is effective?—Yes. We do not wish them an absolute good-bye until they have received their discharge.

5966. And, moreover, you do not solicit testimonials from them?—Never.

5967. Merely on parting they often express their appreciation?—Yes.

5968. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Do you think it would be possible to modify and to extend the system of voluntary boarders, so that when a person came in he might say, "I wish to come in, and I wish now to bind myself to stay and to be detained for a period to be decided by you." I mean now they can leave in 24 hours?—(Dr. Porter Phillips): I think it would be a great help.

5969. Do you think it would be practicable?—I presume so.

5970. You would be able to judge whether that person was sufficiently sensible to justify you in deciding as regards his freedom?—I certainly think so.

5971. In that way they would avoid the slur of certification?—Yes. For instance, a patient who has come in as a voluntary patient and later on is certified, on recovery has at times expressed this view to me: "I wish I could have remained as a voluntary patient. I came in as a voluntary patient originally, and now I have been certified."

5972. Has the possibility of such a plan been discussed and put aside?—Not to my knowledge.

5973. But you would think it was quite reasonable?—Quite reasonable and practicable.

5974. There was one point with regard to teaching I would like to put right. You do not wish to leave the impression that all the teaching you gave was limited to the out-patients?—Not at all; they come to the hospital.

5975. And you also have post graduates at Bethlem?—Yes.

5976. In connection with your clinic at St. Bartholomew's, have you anything in the way of social service, or anything that can be included under the auspices of the new Society of Mental Hygiene? Do you have people who go into their homes?—I am hoping that will come about; it is a thing I am very interested in. It is being started in one or two hospitals, and I am hoping that St. Bartholomew's will follow suit.

5977. Or lead?—Yes.

5979. But it would be an advantage to have an expert man for a particular district?—Yes.

5980. Sir David Drummond: Dr. Phillips, do you think the accommodation for private patients throughout this country is sufficient?—That is rather a difficult question, Sir. I presume so.

5981. You think it is?—Most of the institutions I know have certain vacancies for private patients. That is the only means by which I could judge.

Chairman: Thank you very much; we are much indebted to you both.

MR. W. FAIRLEY (Assistant Secretary).

The Rev. P. S. G. PROPERT, Mr. R. A. LEACH, Mr. JAMES H. FORD, and Mr. J. W. FLINT, J.P., called and examined.

5982. Chairman: We have this morning before us representatives of the Association of Poor Law Unions, who are to give us some evidence on matters with which they are specially familiar. The evidence which they have to give us to some extent overlaps, and I am going to suggest that we might ask Mr. Propert, in the first instance, to give us his evidence. The other gentlemen who are present will hear what he says, and if they have anything to add, they might give us their personal experience, but we do not want of course to duplicate the evidence. Mr. Propert, you are, I think, President of the Association of Poor Law Unions?—I am.

5983. You have been a member of that Association since it was established, and a member of the Council of the Association for 18 years?—Yes.

5984. You have also been Chairman of the Fulham Board of Guardians for over 25 years?—Yes, since 1900. I have been elected 25 or 26 times.

5985. We should like you to assist us this morning with your views on the existing legislation in so far as it affects your duties as Poor Law authorities. I think you are brought into contact with the Lunacy administration through the Lunacy Act of 1890, which has various sections in which the Poor Law authorities are referred to?—Yes.

Mr. J. W. FLINT, J.P.]

5986. I think in particular the sections are sections 13, 14, 16, 20, 21, and 24?—Yes, those are the chief sections. I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am really giving evidence as an ordinary guardian; I do not claim to have very great technical knowledge or legal knowledge of the subject. Mr. Leach, who is on my left, will deal chiefly with the matters which have come up from time to time, views from the guardians which have come to the Association; he has evidence largely on those points which have come before the Association. He is clerk to the Rochdale Union, and Mr. Ford is clerk to the Leeds Union. Mr. Flint is a member of the Sheffield Board of Guardians, and also a justice. I might say, in answer to your statement, that my experience as a guardian during the past 30 years suggests to me that, as a whole, the Lunacy law in relation to our work as guardians is working smoothly, and I would say satisfactorily. During the whole of that time (I speak now as a guardian) no serious complaints have come to us as guardians. Of course, there have been matters of detail, but during the whole of that time it is very remarkable that nothing in the nature of serious complaints has come before my Board, with regard to the relieving officer; he is working, of course, independently of us under the Acts, and the work has gone on, as I say, very smoothly. I think the absence of friction indicates that, generally speaking (I am not going into details of administration), in Fulham the whole thing has gone smoothly and satisfactorily.

5987. Have you not found the rather complicated provisions of the Act a little embarrassing sometimes?—So far as we are concerned, I think I have attached to my précis some letters and papers which indicate the details upon which we have had from time to time difficulties.

5988. We have been a little struck as a Commission with the complexity of the Statute as regards the different methods in which you are brought into contact with cases?—That may be so.

5989. And I conceive from those letters that legal questions have to some extent embarrassed you?—I am not now putting forward medical views. I have a great many opinions, and I have expressed some of them with regard to certification, the necessity for uniformity, and I think the power or the lack of power, of the justice to remand—things of that sort. I can give a number of opinions, but I am giving now evidence as a guardian, and I say from the point of view of the Board we have had very little friction indeed.

5990. That is what we want to get.—Yes, as a Board we have had very little trouble, if any.

5991. At the same time we are concerned with the legal code which exists at the moment.—My co-witnesses will give a good deal of evidence upon that point. I do not wish to pose as a legal or medical authority.

5992. But, after all, the law is handed out to us as citizens to administer, and what one wants to know is whether you have found the existing code, from the administrative point of view, in any way lacking in clearness or in precision?—I should not say so. The large majority of our cases are dealt with in Fulham under Section 20 of the Act. I suppose other witnesses will probably say they have dealt under other sections, but we have dealt almost entirely under Section 20. The relieving officer receives information; he visits the case; if in his opinion there is an element of urgency about it, he brings it to the workhouse, and then within three days a justice is called in; and it appears to me that there is a very short time there by implication. It seems to me the justice must certify or discharge the patient. Of course, he can suspend under another section—he can delay the case, but that gives no power to remand, and we have found a difficulty here.

5993. That relates to a matter we have been considering—the desirability of having a period during which investigation and observation may take place?—Yes. I think there is certainly a need for delaying and further investigation, and further observation, and we do use the other sections of the Act which give us power to suspend the order, but there appears to be no power to remand. You can delay and you can suspend. The other day I went in to see a patient, and I found on the order the magistrate had written in the margin, "I remand this case." Very often there is an infringement of the Act, because they feel there should be further observation than that which is given under the various sections of the Act.

5994. You are aware probably that in the case of private patients it is open to the judicial authority to adjourn a case for 14 days for further investigation?—Yes.

5995. Would you welcome a similar provision with regard to rate-aided cases?—Certainly I should. I think there should be, as far as possible, uniformity, and I think that, if there was an extended time for observation and treatment, fewer people would be sent to asylums. I think that is quite possible. That is rather a medical opinion, but that has come out in my experience.

5996. I shall not trouble you with the rather technical legal points to which those letters relate. I have studied them myself, and my colleagues have also, but it is not an appropriate topic for discussion here?—No. I see you have had evidence upon that point before too.

5997. We have, but your letters are certainly very useful in that respect.—May I say that on one occasion a man was brought in to our observation wards, and the magistrate was in doubt about the case. I think he rather had views—I do not quite know what view the medical officer took—but the justice refused to certify in that case, brought up in one of those letters; so they discharged the man, and he went home and cut his throat. That was a case in which the magistrate felt: "Well, I must certify, or discharge," and he discharged him, and that brought up one of those letters which I have attached to my précis—this man was discharged by the magistrate. The magistrate refused to certify, or to detain him in the workhouse, and he was discharged, and went home and cut his throat. That was one of the occasions when I say the working of the law was brought up for discussion by our Board.

5998. I would like your view on quite a general topic. We are rather struck with the extent to which the Poor Law administration is brought into contact with Lunacy administration, and the machinery of the Poor Law is utilised. There is some feeling—I do not know how far it is well founded—that that is rather an unfortunate association, and that persons who hitherto have not come under your charge in any way, artisans, or respectable working people, by the mere misfortune of becoming mentally afflicted find themselves brought into the Poor Law atmosphere, which is to some of them distressing. Have you any general view upon that?—Yes, I think I have. I cannot say that that has come out very much in Fulham. Our observation wards are quite distinct buildings. I am in London, and therefore I am not giving evidence from a country point of view. In London these observation wards are really little hospitals. I think there are nine beds in each, male and female, and they are placed under the infirmary; we have transferred them to our infirmary, so we treat our people who come in as sick people. Being under the infirmary they have trained nurses, they have medical attention every day. On that point I think this has interested me: let us suppose the matter was separated altogether from Poor Law administration and became known as part of the lunacy laws. I think that it would mark the patient much more than under the present circumstances. For instance, our ambulance goes down a street to-day—no one knows whose it is; it is not distinguished in any way; the neighbours in London see that an officer has gone into a house in a street, they do not know exactly why he has gone there. The patient is taken away; he becomes better and he comes back again, or he may be taken to the asylum, but he is not branded there and then; they do not know that it is a question of lunacy. We know the public are very afraid of mental disease and, I think, under the present circumstances there is less likelihood for the public to take up that position; it becomes part of the general administration and is not separate and distinct.

5999. There are, of course, two quite different stigmas, if I may so call them, there is the stigma of certification, that a person has become of unsound mind, and there is also rather a social stigma—the stigma of having had to be relieved by the rates; and it has struck us that by the utilisation of the Poor Law machinery a person who becomes mentally sick becomes for the time being pauperised—let us use the word, while a patient who suffers from an infectious disease, or any ordinary ailment, and goes to an ordinary general hospital, does not suffer that disadvantage?—Quite.

6000. One appreciates that you must have some institution to which you can take patients?—Yes.

6001. And your institutions have been utilised for that purpose?—Yes.

6002. But in consequence of utilising them, as they are provided out of public funds, the patients then become to that extent rate-aided?—Yes. What I regret is that the Poor Law is becoming so tremendously popular—it is becoming extremely popular. Since the Representation of the People Act there is no disqualification. Our hospitals are becoming remarkable institutions, and the people have votes. I am a guardian of 30 years' standing, and I belong to the strict school. I have been in favour of legal relief. When I began there were distinct disqualifications, and there was the stigma; that is passing away, and the Poor Law has become extremely popular and in fact public aid is generally becoming popular.

6003. I do not know that we desire to encourage that?—Exactly, that has been my view.

6004. It is a slightly different aspect of it that I am considering, a class of person to whom rate aid is distasteful—who is independent?—I am sorry to say that there are very few people to whom it is distasteful; it is passing away, I assure you. I live among the people; I have lived in a congested area for 40 years, and I say that this feeling of the stigma is passing away.

6005. I am not at all sure that in the public interest it is desirable that it should pass away?—Look at the hundreds and thousands of able-bodied workmen who come to the Poor Law without hesitation. We spent £36,000,000 in the year before last largely in relieving able-bodied workmen. They have come by their thousands, for instance, the ex-soldiers; one would have thought the ex-service man would have felt it, but these come. We have dealt with 300,000 persons, ex-service men and their dependents in the past year. I am simply giving evidence, I am not expressing now preconceived opinions at all, I am giving what I have felt from living among the people, and I believe, looking back 30 years, that the Poor Law is not so unpopular as it was, and really there is no ground for the stigma in these days.

6006. I appreciate that point of view, but I am not sure that it is in the public interest that reliance upon public money should be encouraged. What one is rather thinking of is this, that there is an implication, in a resort to the rates, of destitution—that is the accepted word?—Yes.

6007. And even in the case of the able-bodied whom you relieve that right to be relieved depends upon their being destitute?—But Mr. Adrian, formerly the legal adviser of the Local Government Board, has given a very wide definition of the term "destitution" which does not mean that people may be without means, but that they may be destitute of the particular thing which is necessary either to their existence or to their physical well-being.

6008. Again, if I may press my point a little, it is this: that persons, who are not destitute in any sense of the term while they are in possession of their senses, have to find their way, if they become mentally afflicted, to asylums through the medium of the Poor Law. It is that point which I want to emphasise rather.—There is an escape from that position by dealing with a case under Section 13, the non-pauper class, and I think Mr. Leach will have something to say about that.

6009. In that case you must be satisfied that the lunatic is not under proper care and control, or is being cruelly treated?—That is so, but I think one may assume, in the first instance, that the person is not a pauper, and proceed under that clause.

6010. You have been fortunate, of course, in London owing to the more perfect administration that you have here?—I should not like to say here that London is really more perfect.

6011. It has larger resources, shall we say?—The resources are better.

6012. You are able to take your mental cases really into a hospital, as you call it, rather than into a Poor Law institution. Although it is a Poor Law institution in law, it is in character and administration more akin to a hospital?—That is so.

6013. And you are enabled to treat your patients in a period of transition, so to speak, as if they were in a general hospital?—Yes; that is my evidence.

6014. But, owing to the circumstance that it is a Poor Law institution all the same, they must for the time being be treated, as we know, under the Act as persons who have been relieved at the expense of the public, and therefore from that aspect are rate-aided patients?—That is so.

6015. Unless, of course, you use Section 13?—Yes, and there is the escape; you may assume at first that the case is non-pauper, and it is not treated as a pauper case unless it is so ascertained—for instance, by calling in the medical officer.

6016. Calling in a medical officer? "A person who is visited by a medical officer of the union, at the expense of the union, is, for the purposes of this section, to be deemed to be in receipt of relief." That is Section 18.—Yes, that would be so. Of course, the guardians can recover the cost afterwards if it is found the patient can pay.

6017. Of course, cases which are for the moment treated as pauper cases pass into an asylum, and then it is one of your duties, is it not, to find out whether they have means?—Yes.

6018. If you find that after all the patient has sufficient means for his maintenance in the asylum you recover from his relatives?—Always.

6019. And in that case provision is made for the transfer of the patient to a private category?—Yes, always.

6020. Now take that case. It seems to me rather an interesting case—a person who has sufficient means for his own maintenance. He is brought to you, you know nothing of him at all; he passes into your hands, and is ultimately certified; shortly afterwards it is discovered that he is a person of adequate means, and he then becomes a private patient. But en route he has passed through a stage in which he has become a rate-aided patient, and he could never afterwards say that he has not been a pauper?—For the time being, yes. You would have to do this in any case, you would have to ascertain the means; and it is found that a great many of the cases that come in ought, to my mind, to be non-pauper, but they have no objection to receiving a certain portion of the cost which is necessary for their maintenance. I have not found (I am giving evidence as a guardian) among quite important people socially in a sense, not wealthy of course, but I have not found in Fulham in the whole course of my 30 years that anyone has ever come to me and said, "I very much object to the fact that I have been treated as a pauper." That is my evidence, and that is quite correct. Many people have come to me and rather suggested they would like to receive help.

6021. But we have had a great deal of evidence that the word "pauper" is an unhappy word.—Yes, we all agree; in fact we have had that up at the Association over and over again—nomenclature. There is a regular school of thought now in our country who wish to smooth down everything absolutely, and we are getting all kinds of suggestions; in fact, we shall have to go into the question of nomenclature. They wish to replace old words which have their meaning. Of course words, like coins, go out of currency. I believe they objected, in the first instance, to the word "poor," and somebody suggested the French form would be better, and they introduced "pauper." Now "pauper" has become unpopular. "Lunatic" was quite a proper word at one time, but has got out of currency; people do not like it. Now they are asking for a change. I think my colleagues will give evidence that we often use the term "mental hospital patient," and so on, but in our actual documents we have to use legal words, because the Act uses them, and therefore the word "lunatic" stops, because it is in the Act. But we suggest changes; we are not opposed to that in the least. "lunatic asylum" becoming "mental hospital," or "pauper" becoming "rate-aided."

6022. We are not going to enter upon those large topics of sociology just now. What I am rather concerned with is this, that there is no particular harm in calling a thing by its own name, if it deserves its own name; but there are cases in which the name, let us say, of a pauper, is, through the machinery of the law, attached to persons who do not deserve it. That is the point I am concerned with for the moment, and the invocation of the machinery of the Poor Law, excellent machinery for the purpose, and indeed the ordinary machinery to hand, has had the consequence, which some people seem to resent, of associating this form of illness with pauperisation. —Yes, I know the school very well.

6023. And one has to consider among other things whether it is possible to dissociate the two ideas, possibly in nomenclature, and possibly to some extent in administration, and treat the mentally afflicted person very much as you would treat a patient who is suffering from an infectious disease, and who now has to be notified and taken to an infectious diseases hospital—in short, treat the lunacy administration as a branch of the public service rather than as a Poor Law incident. It is a point one is rather interested in; it is a large question of administration?—Yes, I quite appreciate that view, but my evidence does not support the idea that there is a tremendous objection to the present machinery.

6024. And it may well be, as you say, that there is less reluctance now to be associated with Poor Law administration than was formerly the case. We hope it does not mean that the independence of the nation is being sapped?—It does certainly.

6025. I wanted to have your view as to whether you found in experience that people are unhappy at this association with the Poor Law as an episode in their lives?—My evidence is negative on that point; I do not want to say anything more than that.

6026. Now I see that you have a view, which I think most people share, that it is desirable to assimilate the treatment of mental illness as much as possible to the treatment of other forms of illness?—Yes, I regard it as sickness. I think my colleagues will give evidence upon that point too. I am speaking as a guardian.

6027. Meeting the people?—Yes. These gentlemen are technical experts much more than I am.

6028. And you would favour, would you, any expedients whereby that aspect of treating this affliction could be developed?—Yes, I think there is room for some variation in the present law on that point.

6029. To get the element of detention or incarceration, as far as possible, eliminated and the aspect of treatment emphasised?—Yes, quite, I agree with that entirely. We have tried to do that in Fulham, but we have found the law was against us.

6030. We are here, of course, to consider possible amendments of the law; but do you find that by having a separate infirmary at Fulham with what one may call a hospital atmosphere, you are enabled, although it is technically Poor Law treatment and treatment of alleged lunatics, to give your administration rather the aspect of medical than of legal treatment?—Yes, we do, and we have made every effort to emphasise that aspect of it.

6031. One other matter I think you allude to—we have really touched on it already—as you know the code for certification of pauper patients and non-pauper patients is different?—Yes, quite.

6032. You would be in favour, I take it, of assimilating the two methods?—Yes. I am not so keen myself upon the number of doctors, whether it is one, two, or three, but I think whatever is agreed upon that should be uniform. I think the liberty and the freedom and the protection of the subject, and the protection of the community should come in exactly the same in both cases, because, after all, these interferences are really for the protection not only of a particular individual but of the public.

6033. I do not think any of us appreciate why there should be more precautions in the case of one class of person than in another, because the liberty of the subject is as important in the eye of the law whether it is a duke or a pauper, or a millionaire or a person on a weekly wage?—Yes. I think that was due to the fact that that was not so much appreciated a few years ago, in the old days.

6034. What, of course, may have had something to do with it is, that in the case of the private patient often there is much more property involved?—Exactly. There may be interests at work there which do not come in so much with the poorer man, but I think the question of liberty and protection is equally important.

6035. I think I may say we should all agree with that aspect of it and, of course, the medical certificate is the evidence upon which the subject is deprived of his liberty?—Yes.

6036. The medical certificate is the evidence adduced to the certifying authority, and one has to consider, if there is to be assimilation of the two cases, the private case and the pauper case, what would be an adequate precaution for all cases?—Quite so. Of course the justice appears to me to come in to protect the public; he represents the public, and as far as I can see, of course I am not an expert, no one can be detained in a Poor Law institution for more than 14 days without a justice's order.

6037. Of course he represents the public interest?—Yes; he is there to see that the public interests are protected.

6038. You suggest that the examination of lunatics or alleged lunatics should be more formal?—I do. I have rather varied my opinion.

6039. I was wondering what you meant exactly by that?—I have varied my opinion. There have been cases, I have no doubt, in the country sometimes where people are examined in bed, and are taken to the house of the justice, and so on. I should like to vary my view upon that.

6040. What is your reconsidered view upon that?—I think now that in dealing with people whose minds are out of order perhaps less formality is better than too much formality; the atmosphere of a Court and that sort of thing, might perhaps from a medical point of view be prejudicial. My evidence on that point has varied, because when I consulted one of the relieving officers I got the idea of more formality rather from him, but I happened to meet a highly qualified medical man the other day, and I mentioned this point, and he pointed out that every formal process where the mind is a little unhinged might perhaps have a bad effect rather than a good effect.

6041. We have two things to reconcile, we have to see that every proper precaution is taken to prevent improper certification or detention, and at the same time to see that those steps are not such as themselves to bring about the very thing we want to avoid, namely, the mental illness?—Quite so.

6042. Do you think the avoidance of the forensic element is desirable?—Yes, I think so. If we could get treatment without certification sometimes it would be an important distinct advantage from a medical point of view; that is my opinion. I think that treatment without certification, and without all this Court business, might be an advantage. I agree with you.

6043. We have, of course, always to keep clearly before us this, that you cannot interfere with the liberty of the subject without some sanction, as we call it?—Exactly.

6044. And it is to accommodate those two ideas that is really our problem?—Exactly.

6045. Some people have thought that the forensic element is too conspicuous, and that people feel as if they had done something wrong if they are brought before a justice?—Exactly.

6046. One wants to get rid of that idea, because you are not taken before a justice when you have pneumonia. At the same time, when you have pneumonia you do not find yourself deprived of your liberty?—There should be a sufficient formality at the same time to safeguard.

6047. Now just one other question, and then we will go to your colleagues, who will tell us of the more technical matters. In your experience, have you formed any idea as to the desirability of having two medical certificates in all cases?—Yes, I have formed some opinions upon that; that is rather a matter which has come up before the Association.

6048. Then shall I ask that of the other witnesses?—Yes, I think Mr. Leach will deal with that, although I am rather against having two always.

6049. One idea which did occur to us was that as the great majority of the cases are straight, simple cases, it might be unnecessary from the point of view of public expense to have two opinions?—Certainly.

6050. But, on the other hand, that in a case where there was any dubiety, the class of case where you would ask for a remand, if a remand was open to you, there might be two?—Yes, I have felt with regard to that point that a good deal depends upon the character of the qualifications of the doctor. A man, I feel, should be qualified for this work, although, of course, every man is qualified, but I think there is a particular experience necessary in this work of certification.

6051. You will appreciate we hear views on both sides of almost every question, and some people think that the alienist, or expert, is undesirable, and that it is better to have the ordinary general practitioner?—Yes; you will hear evidence on that point from my colleagues.

6052. Then I think we have taken from you the general view, and we are obliged to you, and I will keep these letters?—Please do.

6053. I think perhaps we might take Mr. Leach, who has given us a more elaborate and technical précis, as our next witness. Mr. Leach, you are second Vice-President of the Association of Poor Law Unions of England and Wales?—Yes.

6054. Just tell us a little about your Association, first of all. What is it?—The Association of Poor Law Unions of England and Wales is an Association set up by Statute under which any and all members of Boards of Guardians may be members for the furtherance of their own administration, and for obtaining amendment where they find in administration any matter of law is not sufficient.

6055. It is a conference, really, of experts?—Yes, certainly, it is a conference of the chosen representative of members of boards and of their corporations.

6056. Do you meet from time to time?—There is an annual meeting, and there is a Council that meets frequently with its committees, the Parliamentary Committee and the General Purposes Committee, and it issues annually a very fine report (handing in the same).

6057. Earl Russell: How are they chosen? By a general meeting of all the people, of all the unions, or what?—No; each board elects its own representatives, who are limited to two; they may be two guardians, or they may be a guardian and the clerk. (Mr. Propert): The great point is, it is a constituent assembly—that is, the members of it are members of boards of guardians.

6058. Chairman: And I see it is your province to consider legislation that is passing at the time, and to make suggestions upon it, and also to consider the Poor Law administration, and to confer with each other, exchange experience, and so on?—(Mr. Leach): That is so. I think at the annual meeting, there are nearly a thousand representatives. (Mr. Propert): There are 590 boards of guardians who are members of the association, out of about 630. (Mr. Leach): Yes; their population aggregates to 35,000,000—in fact all boards, excepting a very few small rural unions, are in membership. There is all the difference between this and a conference. There are statutory Poor Law conferences set up under a statute specially, but this is an association, distinct from conferences, to insure the betterment of the administration of the law where an amendment of the law is desired. This Association comes to conclusions; it passes resolutions, it takes steps, determines its way, as distinct from a Poor Law conference which may meet together for the purpose of discussing a particular problem and separates without anything being done.

6059. I see you are a statutory body founded under 61 and 62 Victoria, chapter 19, and therefore you have a status?—Yes.

6060. But so far as the lunacy administration is concerned that will be one only of the many topics you will have to consider?—Yes.

6061. And I see in this particular report you have put in that that subject was under your consideration, among many others?—Yes.

6062. Now you, I think, in addition to holding office in the Association, are Clerk to the Guardians of the Rochdale Union, and have been so since 1886?—Yes.

6063. And you are also a barrister-at-law?—Yes.

6064. We should be glad to have from you your observations upon any topics which you think it would be useful for the Commission to consider in their general survey in the matter of certification, detention, and care which we have under consideration. Perhaps we might take the subjects you speak on in the order in which you have put them before us. Your first point, if I may say so, is perhaps hardly germane to our enquiry, the question of the inadequacy of the statistics. You want further information, I understand, in the annual reports of the Board of Control?—I think more complete information (that is why I mention it) would strengthen the demand for dealing with cases of certification without the order. However, if the Commission think it is not germane to their enquiry, perhaps I had better leave it.

6065. I think it is a little remote from our enquiry, except that I can see the bearing which you refer to, that at present there is no means of knowing how many cases have been dismissed, and you think that that would show that many cases are brought forward without being really certifiable cases. They are brought up for examination, and the present system is efficient to this extent, that it discards the cases which are not certifiable?—Yes. For instance, speaking about Poor Law infirmaries, the medical officer under Section 24 of the Act, may, when he finds a person has got a mental breakdown, and has to be under care as such, use his own certificate for 14 days.

6066. Yes, but he has got to certify that the person is insane?—Yes, but before the end of that 14 days the person may be free, he may reclass the person again as a sane person. I mention that as indicating that probably if as much was known as might be known by obtaining fuller statistics, it would strengthen the demand which is becoming very strong amongst the guardians and outside, that there should be some way of dealing with a case of mental breakdown without dealing with it under the Lunacy Act, if there is any likelihood that in the course of a few days, or a few weeks, the patient may have recovered his sanity.

6067. It would illustrate the number of cases which are of a transitory character, and therefore might be treated without certification—that is your point?—Yes.

6068. We have that in mind.—On that matter, if I may say so, I was looking at the statistics for the mental hospitals in Lancashire—there are five. I noticed that last year, 1923, admissions numbered 3,087, and where they were sent to the asylum under a justice's order 10 per cent. were discharged as recovered within six months, and 8 per cent. discharged as recovered within three months.

6069. And the further statistics which you wish would show that a considerable number of the cases brought up had really recovered within a shorter time still?—Yes, and yet they have to be dealt with and certified under the Lunacy Acts by a medical officer as persons of unsound mind to be kept in the hospital.

6070. Take the 14 days' case: A person might recover in 10 days, and, if the illness were of so transitory a character as that, you think that certification should be avoided?—I think so.

6071. I follow your point. We might just get on the note the additional statistics which you think might illustrate that. You think it would be desirable that the number of persons dealt with in England and Wales under the Lunacy Acts as alleged lunatics, where the proceedings are abortive from one cause or another should be recorded?—Yes. If I may put it in this way—I know the Commissioners have got to report ultimately on this matter, and I do not suggest that these statistics can have a permanent place annually in the records, but I thought—excuse me if I am making a suggestion that I ought not to do—but I thought if the Commission obtained these statistics, say, for a year or more back, under all the heads that I have given, the Commission itself might be assisted in ultimately framing its recommendations. The Royal Commission on the Poor Law and Relief of Distress did obtain a special return for 12 months of all classes of chargeable persons dealt with by the guardians, to assist them in coming to what they thought they should ultimately have to recommend, so that if the Commission are going to consider or suggest that there may be a way of dealing with mental breakdown, on the lines of the Bill of two years ago, they might find, if they have a special return of that sort, very much support for the recommendation. I do not know whether I have put it rightly, but that is my view.

6072. You think that is a source of information to which we might reasonably resort in connection with this topic?—Yes, I think so, without giving them a permanent place in the annual returns.

6073. Shall we just take the other points on which you think we might obtain information? You suggest, in the second place, the number of alleged lunatics removed to Poor Law institutions in England, under Section 20, until the case can be dealt with by a justice. Next you suggest we might get figures as to the number of persons removed, or temporarily detained in Poor Law institutions by orders under Section 21, subsection (2)—these are known as the 14-day orders?—Yes.

6074. And on the expiration of the 14 days they are set free, or sooner?—Yes.

6075. Then you think the number of persons detained for not more than 14 days in the Poor Law institution on the sole certificate of the medical officer under Section 24 (1) might throw light upon the subject?—Yes.

6076. And as to what befell these patients?—Yes.

6077. And lastly you refer to the number of lunatics, in respect of whom a summary reception order may be made, allowed by the justices under Section 22 to be taken charge of by a relation or friends?—Yes.

6078. Your view is that information from these sources would strengthen the case for some reform of the law in the direction of the treatment of transitory cases without certification?—Yes, that is my point.

6079. Then in the next place, we have the subject of the method of certification. Now you have not only had practical experience, but you are also a member of the legal profession. Have you found the existing code difficult to work in the matter of certification, and the precautions prescribed?—Yes.

6080. I am putting it quite colloquially, if I may say so; and, reading the important sections with which you are concerned, it seems to me that the programme that is laid down for the official to work to is rather complicated?—It is.

6081. It is not so precise as it might be in a matter of so great importance. I have no doubt that it is to some extent the survival of earlier systems which have been carried forward, but personally I always feel that when a code is handed down to officials for administration, the programme of the code, so to speak, and the steps to be taken, should be set out with great precision and clearness. I think we have all felt from our study of those sections, and the varying views we have heard and the extraordinary variety of practice under those sections, that the programme cannot be so precise as it should be. Have you experienced that yourself in working it?—In 1901 the statement of the case was put before Mr. Macmorran on behalf of the Poor Law Officers' Association as to when the relieving officer should deal with a case under Section 13, and when he should deal with it under Section 14. Mr. Longbottom, the Clerk at Halifax at that time, put before the Yorkshire Officers' Association that relieving officers in taking as many cases as they were doing under Section 14, were too readily classing these alleged lunatics as paupers, which was a mistake, and that if a person had had no relief until the case was reported as a case of alleged lunacy, if they had had no relief at all from the Guardians, it should be dealt with under Section 13.

6082. And so avoid the Poor Law association?—There is a Poor Law association, the Poor Law machinery is still used, because you have got to have either the relieving officer or the constable, or the overseer, under Section 13.

6083. True, but he is not a pauper, and then he may be sent to an institution to which, if a pauper, he might have been sent?—As soon as he gets there he is classed as a pauper, unless he is re-classed on the private side, so that the Poor Law machinery, or the police machinery, is still there in dealing with a case before the justice. After the case gets into the asylum, or the hospital, then they go down as pauper cases, or rate-aided cases. I have Mr. Macmorran's opinion here—may I hand it in?

6084. I should like to read it very much if you will be good enough to hand it in?—There is the statement of the case. (Handing in the same.)

6085. It does seem to be a little difficult to know under which section to proceed. The classification of mentally afflicted persons is peculiar. There is in Section 13 the classification of the person who "is deemed a lunatic and is not under proper care and control, or is cruelly treated or neglected"?—Yes.

6086. And then you have the next class of person, a person who is a pauper resident, and who is deemed to be a lunatic, and a proper person to be sent to an asylum; and then we have the person who, whether he is a pauper or not, is wandering at large?—Yes.

6087. It is a little difficult, I should imagine, in administration to know the category to which to relegate your case?—You will find in Rochdale we deal with all cases, unless they are in receipt of relief at the time the case is reported, under Section 13. I think I am right in saying (you will take some statistics that Mr. Flint has put in) that the great majority of their cases are dealt with under Section 14. At Manchester and at Liverpool they have supplied me with statistics—there are, in those two cities together, something like 2,000 mental cases a year. I believe the great majority, as I think Mr. Ford will admit for Leeds, are dealt with under Section 14, although they are not in receipt of relief except in a medical sense before the case is reported as a case of lunacy. I think it of great importance that the person, whoever he is, should have, if he is an alleged lunatic and is brought before a justice, all the precautions, and all the safeguards, and all the protection that is given under Section 13.

Earl Russell: As the Chairman has just pointed out to you, you cannot deal with a lunatic under Section 13 without making one of two reflections on his relations—either he is cruelly treated, or is not under proper care and control—that is what the statute binds you to.

Chairman: I do not know whether not being under proper care is a reflection.

Witness: One's own experience is this, that the persons generally dealt with under Section 13 are persons whose friends and relatives are very kind and humane, but the case is such that in their own home, while there is no actual destitution in the sense of there being shortage of food, or "destitution" within Mr. Adrian's meaning, they may not be under proper care and control. As a matter of fact, it is the friends and relatives who come and tell you that they are not under proper care and control—their own doctor says the alleged lunatics are not under proper care and control.

6088. But does the diversity of practice to which you have alluded not rather suggest to you that the code is a little indefinite in its guidance?—I think it is too awkward altogether.

6089. At the same time one must recognise that it was founded on a recognition of different types of cases. The class whom you have in your mind, let us say the persons who become mentally afflicted in their own home, form one class of case. Then there is the class of case of the lunatic wandering at large. Somebody out in the street here suddenly has an onset of insanity, and something has to be done immediately. The difficulty is that there is no place to take such a person to at once except either a police office or a workhouse—these are the only two institutions that are available for his immediate reception?—They would not keep him in the police office.

6090. A constable might take him to the police office to see the sergeant in charge, and would be told at once to pass him on to the workhouse?—Yes, under Section 20.

6091. But that class of case is a case by itself, and not so frequent, I suppose, as the ordinary case of illness overtaking a patient in his own home?—It is surprising, the great majority are taken under Section 20 first, a very small percentage of the persons dealt with under Section 13 are taken from their own home to the asylum.

6092. They pass through this intervening stage?—The doctor advises the relatives to have them taken away at once, the officer is called in, and they are taken away under Section 20; except a very small percentage. The Lunacy Commissioners, now the Board of Control, some time ago in their Annual Report laid emphasis upon the advisability of getting the patients taken direct from their home. What can you do? The doctor comes, the relatives say, "We cannot look after them. You must get them away," and the officer goes, and he finds that under the conditions of Section 20 for the safety and welfare of the patient he ought to be put under care and control temporarily. I think Mr. Ford will bear me out, and Mr. Flint too?—(Mr. Ford: Not entirely. (Mr. Leach: That shows a difference at once, but I think you will find in this return I suggest that the vast majority were taken under Section 20 before they were taken to the asylum or mental hospital, although there may be cases dealt with under Section 13.

6093. Chairman: Have you to arrange in practice with the asylum before you get a patient sent there?—Yes.

6094. I am thinking of the time that is required. One wants to look at these things practically. Then take a case where this unhappy misfortune has befallen a home, let it be either the head of the house, or one of the members of the family who suddenly becomes uncontrollably insane. Something has to be done at once. You say there was a feeling that it was desirable, if possible, to have those patients taken direct to an asylum?—Yes.

6095. Can that be done in practice?—In practice it cannot be done, because you have got to ascertain whether there is room in the asylum where you are going to take the patient. In Lancashire the chief administrative officer for the Asylums Board is at Preston. There are five asylums in the county. You have got to ring up or telegraph to the administrative officer at Preston to find which asylum of the five you may take this patient to. (Mr. Ford: Might I suggest that that question is taken as applying to Lancashire?

6096. (Chairman: Yes. Let me take this as an illustration. Does this intervening period in the workhouse or the workhouse infirmary really serve three purposes—first of all, it secures immediate care and supervision of the patient?—(Mr. Leach: Yes.

6097. Secondly, it enables the justice of the peace to be invoked, and to come to the infirmary for the purpose of seeing the patient, and there pronouncing upon him, with the assistance of the medical opinion; and, in the third place, it gives you time to make arrangements, if the case has to be certified, for its reception in an asylum?—Yes; if he is dealt with under Section 13, the justice does not necessarily need to see the patient. If he finds that he may make an order he may say, "Instead of making a summary order for the asylum I will make a 14 days' order."

6098. Perhaps I should have added that—there is a fourth advantage in that it enables the case to be reviewed in suitable surroundings with considered medical opinion, and the outcome of it may be that the case is retained in the infirmary under a 14 days' order, and may ultimately never reach an asylum at all?—Or be set a liberty.

6099. Whereas if a case is taken direct from the home of the patient, no other place but the asylum is available?—That is so. Of course, I do not see really in the big boroughs, where they have their own asylum, why Section 20 should not be extended to the borough asylum, just in the same way as with a private case under the provision for dealing with private cases, you may get them in the asylum before a detention order is actually made. (Mr. Propert: Must the asylum be mentioned in the order?

Chairman: Yes.

6100. Earl Russell: A great many superintendents very much regret not getting them at once; they think a patient suffers in this intermediate stage?—(Mr. Leach: Yes.

6101. Chairman: There is that difficulty, that you may not have in the Poor Law infirmary the same facilities for treatment, or the same skilled care of the case that you would get in an asylum. You cannot, of course, provide the same equipment?—You may not have the same equipment, but, as a matter of fact, you may have quite a high standard, if not a higher standard, of nursing. That has always struck me, that the bulk of nurses in mental hospitals are not fully trained nurses.

6102. You mean in general nursing?—Not fully trained in general nursing.

6103. In mental hospitals the nurses were not in practice trained in general nursing?—They have not got the full certificate of general training. It rather seems to me the position is this, that you insist on a higher standard in your hospitals for the nursing of the sane than you have any guarantee of as regards the nursing of the insane; I should have thought if there was to be any difference it ought to be the other way about.

6104. We have had some evidence already with regard to the desirability of nurses in mental hospitals having training in general hospitals at some stage of their training, at any rate before they are put in responsible charge of wards. You approve of that, do you?—I do most certainly. At the same time, if I may say so, I have been in the Poor Law service for over 50 years as clerk and assistant; during that 50 years I have been going to asylums with the guardians under the section referred to, and I am bound to say that always on my visits I have found the greatest care and humane treatment and kindness has been manifested by the staff to all the patients there. Still there is that fact. I have always felt that you have not the highly skilled nursing, you have not got the nurse with a general training in your mental hospital that you get in other hospitals.

Mr. J. W. FLINT, J.P.

6105. You are familiar with the provisions of the Nurses Registration Act of 1919?—Yes.

6106. The register there has to contain a general part, and then there is a supplementary part containing the names of nurses dealing with mental diseases. There is a special qualification?—Yes. I attach a great deal of importance, first of all, to the general training.

6107. Now take the nurses in your workhouse infirmary—have they any special qualification for dealing with mental cases?—If we have a sick case—of course you may have a mental case which is healthy, apart from mental breakdown—if we have a sick case, during the time they are there we have them dealt with by the general trained nurses—under the matron of the hospital.

6108. But do you have nurses specially trained in mental disease?—In our place?

6109. Yes?—No. We have some of the attendants who have got the certificate of the Medico-Psychological Society—not all of them, but some of them.

6110. Then these are nurses of a special qualification?—Yes.

6111. Now on the question of the safeguards under the existing lunacy law, I see that your Association has considered the question of the desirability of two medical certificates in every case. Will you just tell us how you stand now upon that subject?—The resolution of the Association was that one doctor with the justice is sufficient. My own personal view is that there ought to be at least the safeguard that is given under the latest legislation touching other mental defectives; and I attach a great deal of importance not only to there being two medical men, but that one medical practitioner should be a medical practitioner who is approved for this matter either by the Board of Control, or as under the Mental Deficiency Act by the local authority.

6112. You think he should be a specialist, do you?—I do. I have given a case where there were six medical men called in.

6113. Yes, I read that case with much interest. There was a great diversity of medical opinion in that case?—Yes. My own feeling is that there should have been a trained alienist, or a brain specialist; I have not a word to say against a general practitioner, but I do not think there would have been all that trouble if, in the first place, there had been a trained brain specialist called to the assistance of the justice.

6114. That view, I think, is shared by many. There is another view, you know, that the alienist is apt to think us all insane. You know the popular idea that a person who is always dealing with these cases is too ready to certify?—Yes. Still I think there ought to be two, and that one ought to be specially qualified. During the war young men came out of medical schools with four years' training. They were at once dealing with and certifying cases of alleged lunacy for the purpose of reception orders.

6115. Look at it for a moment administratively. There is this difficulty, of course, that these cases often arise suddenly, and have to be dealt with at once. Could you always have at hand, particularly in rural districts, the necessary specially qualified man? I can see that in London and in large centres possibly such a person, or a deputy, could be obtained always, but is it practicable, do you think, all over the country?—My idea many years ago was that there should be districts for this purpose, larger than unions, an aggregation of unions. You would be able to get your specialist to hand probably within three days, or within six days. The opinion is worth waiting for, especially if the drawback is that if you do not get it you may get a person certified and put under detention as a lunatic who ought not to be so. I always think there is a great protection in one sense inside the asylum, because if the medical officers found there a person who was not insane they would make representations to the Board of Control, and get the discharge at once; but the great thing is to save people from being certified and placed under order as lunatics.

6116. Then we take it, do we, that you regard it as a desirable improvement on the existing legislation that if there is to be only one certifying doctor he should be selected for special qualifications in that matter, or, if there are to be two, that one of them should have those qualifications?—Yes, as is laid down in the Mental Deficiency Act.

6117. Then, I think, your Association has considered the question of dealing with cases without certification?—Yes.

6118. Of course you are aware of the terms of Lord Onslow's Bill which was introduced into the House of Lords?—Yes. The annual meeting of the Association in 1923 adopted the Council's recommendations as regards that particular provision in the Bill.

6119. The resolution there was a general resolution viewing with alarm the increase of insanity, and urging the Government, or the Minister of Health, to take up the question and devise measures for prevention and possible cure; but I do not think that resolution dealt specifically with the point we are interested in for the moment, of dealing with incipient or transitory cases, without certification?—Yes, we have done that. Legislation for the temporary treatment of mental disorder without certification under Clause 4 of the Mental Treatment Bill has the strong approval of the Association of Poor Law Unions: (Resolution of the annual meeting in 1923 adopting the Council's recommendation in the matter). I can put the resolution in.

6120. Clause 4 of the Bill you have just mentioned provides for the temporary treatment of mental disorder without certification, and contemplates the reception of a patient into an institution for a period, which is not to exceed six months, for treatment, and provides for methods for obtaining the consent of the patient to his treatment. The thing that strikes one as the practical difficulty (I do not know whether you have any view upon it or not) is this, that certification, of course, has for its object the giving of control, power to detain; it is the preliminary to the power to detain. If you have no certification the corollary is you have no power to detain. If you have no power to detain, may you not find it difficult to deal with a voluntary case where the patient does not want to remain in the institution, and where it may be a symptom of the ailment itself that the patient wants to get away. Do you favour any less stringent form of certification—something which would enable the medical superintendent of the institution to detain the patient for a limited period without certification?—Yes, without certification under the Lunacy Act, certainly. He has that power now in the case of an infectious disease, in the case of a delirium tremens, under the Poor Law Acts.

6121. Could you give us a reference to the power to detain an infectious case. I know you have to notify infectious diseases?—I think it is in the book I have handed up.

6122. Would you look at it. I should like to know what power you have to detain infectious cases?—If the medical officer finds a case that comes within that provision he can detain under his own certificate until the next meeting of the board of guardians, who go into the case then as to whether he should be further detained.

6123. Is that in the case of an infectious disease?—Yes, or a case of delirium tremens.

6124. If you will hand in a reference later it will do?—So that in a case like that if the man wants to go home, he is told, "No, you have got to be cared for; you cannot have your liberty; you have got to stop here until the guardians meet"; and that is a certificate which he gives under the Poor Law provisions, and I do not see why that provision should not be adopted in lieu of Section 24 (1) of the Lunacy Act.

6125. Are you aware that under the Mental Treatment Bill there is a period of 72 hours' notice provided, which seems to contemplate this, that a person who has gone into an institution for treatment voluntarily, uncertified, cannot leave without 72 hours' notice. Now 72 hours, of course, would give time for certification of a case, if certification then became necessary, would it not?—If certification were wanted, yes.

6126. It does seem necessary, does it not, that there should be some provision enabling the superintendent of such an institution to exercise control, though not necessarily the full control which you have under certification, if some control over the patient is necessary in his own interest?—I think so.

6127. Do you think that would be achieved by providing that such patients should not be allowed to leave without a certain period of notice such as is proposed in the Bill?—I certainly do; that is my own view. Sometimes a doctor has got to think for his patient.

6128. Then you deal in your précis at considerable length with a topic which is rather outside our purview, namely, "the participation of representatives of boards of guardians in the management of county and borough hospitals"—that is a topic I could imagine which is partly political, and perhaps not very much to our address. But will you tell us this: Have you any suggestion to make on the subject of the visitation of patients by guardians? At present I take it the guardians have the right to visit any institution in which patients of theirs are housed?—Yes.

6129. They have, however, no legal duty to do so as the law stands—they have the right to go?—No. The Board of Control attach great importance to their doing so.

6130. Perfectly. We have been concerned in our enquiries with what I may call the possibilities of contact between the patient in an institution and the outside world, an important safeguard in our view. Do you attach importance to the guardians, who are outside persons, having access to patients in institutions?—Yes, I think they should have, most certainly. Of course, apart from the visiting committee it would serve the purpose of management and outside contact as well.

6131. I see your point, but it has been suggested that it is perhaps desirable that the patient should be visited by two classes of persons, firstly, the visiting committee, who have their official duties and who are bound to visit; and secondly, the guardians, who have the right, though not the obligation, to visit, thus bringing the patients into contact with yet another outside interest. It has been suggested that the visits by guardians, or indeed by visiting committees, are apt to be perfunctory. Have you taken part in any visits yourself?—Yes, any number.

6132. What have you done as a guardian visiting an institution in which patients of yours are housed?—I have visited as a clerk. I have not the privilege of being a guardian.

6133. Do you go with the guardians?—Yes.

6134. You have been at plenty of such visits?—Any number.

6135. I would like very much to hear from you what your guardians really do when you are with them?—First of all, I supply the guardians with a list of the patients in the institution.

6136. Who come from their district and for whom they are responsible?—Yes, and of their residences before admission to the asylum. That has the advantage of drawing the attention of the individual members of the deputation to patients particularly from their own parish.

6137. Are the guardians specially selected for the visit, or do they volunteer to visit?—They are selected by the board and divided into sections. They have a spring visit and an autumn visit; they go to the five asylums; there would be about six sections. At one time they only went annually. The district auditor thought the deputation very big and he surcharged the expenses; he cut them down to the number he thought ought to go. The Local Government Board upheld the surcharge, but remitted it in the exercise of their equitable jurisdiction; so the guardians said: "Well, we will see our patients, but instead of going once a year we will go twice"—which meant that the deputations were cut down. Quite as much money was spent as previously, but it had the advantage of a half-yearly visit. My practice is this. I give them this list; they see the patients; very often patients have been there some time, chronic harmless patients who want to be sent to the workhouse, and where that is so, especially if the guardians have got a decent mental hospital, as we mostly have, the guardians are very careful to ascertain whether that can be done, and they generally go into it. If it is not a case of that sort or a case of recent admission, they are very careful to ascertain from the medical officer whether there is any likelihood of the case being discharged recovered within a reasonable time, and all this information that they get and which they bring home is very comforting to the relatives and friends. I attach very great importance to the guardians visiting their own cases at least once a half-year; I think 12 months is too long.

6138. Earl Russell: Are these visits made with or without notice to the asylum?—Where you get a large number of patients in an asylum it is for the convenience of the medical superintendent there to send in the night before and say you want to see your patients the next morning; because if you do not do that you may find that in some of these large asylums—at Prestwich there are over 2,000 patients and a large estate—it may take them a considerable time to get the patients together. Of course we have a right to go without any notice at all.

6139. Chairman: Are the asylums in which your patients are housed large asylums?—Yes, Lancaster at the end of last year had 2,485 patients, Prestwich 2,680, Rainhill 2,094, Whittingham 2,762 and Winwick 1,578. They are all large asylums, and they are pretty well full. As regards what I am going to express now, if I may—it is a layman's opinion—I always think that new cases ought to be sent, in the first instance, to hospitals where there is not this large aggregation of patients, although notwithstanding that, as I have already mentioned, there is a recovery of 8 per cent. of the cases admitted within three months of admission to the asylum.

6140. Mr. Micklem: A further 10 per cent. within the six months?—No, that includes the 8 per cent.

6141. Chairman: There is, as you know, a question of policy as to the size of asylums—the best size to have. You have, apparently, experience of large asylums. Have you found that your patients seem to suffer in any way from the fact that they were in such large institutions?—No, I do not know that that is so. If an alienist found I ought to be put under control and they put me in a place where there are 2,000 or 3,000 patients, that would probably set up an added depression.

6142. Yes, it is like so many of the other questions—there are two sides to it. The larger institution, we are assured, permits of better classification?—And as a rule commands, probably, a higher grade official at the head.

6143. And also, of course, will be enabled to have fuller equipment—I mean laboratories for pathological work, and so on. It is a balancing of considerations of course, as in so many of these matters. You have alluded to one matter which struck me as interesting. You find that a number of patients in the asylum would like to get back to the workhouse, that is to say, those who have been inmates of the workhouse and are moved to asylums would wish to get back sometimes?—Yes.

6144. Is that a common experience?—Yes, that is my experience, and it will be borne out by my colleagues.

6145. There is a provision in the statute for the transfer of patients from asylums to workhouses?—Yes, it is Section 25.

6146. Can you tell us why that is not taken more advantage of?—It is in the hands of the asylum authorities whether they are to come under Section 25; the guardians have no control over that. I venture to say that if the hospital is a large hospital and there is a very large amount of accommodation, unless there is pressure for accommodation they are more likely not to use Section 25.

6147. But we have heard evidence that the asylums have about reached the limit of their capacity just now, and it seems to me that some relief for that might be found by the transfer to the workhouses of cases from asylums, that is to say, old people or chronic cases, at present occupying beds in the asylums. If the patients themselves desire it, as you have told us many of them do, do not you think it would be proper to avail ourselves of that provision?—Certainly. In my own union we had a contract with Prestwich for over 20 years, under which we took a number of patients under Section 26.

6148. That provides for an arrangement being made?—Yes, and in that case they are kept on the books of the asylum.

6149. But are housed in the workhouse?—Yes, and they are under inspection by the asylum medical officer. Of course, in the case of a contract like that, the Board of Control have to make special rules, which become part of the contract.

6150. Has that contract come to an end?—Yes, because the pressure at the asylum ceased; we got a new asylum at Winwick. That bears out the point that the use of Section 25 is largely in the hands—it is in fact entirely in the hands—of the asylum people.

6151. Let me put this to you: We have to take a large view of this matter from the point of view of what can be done with the financial resources of the country at the moment. The erection of new asylums is, of course, a costly matter, is it not?—Yes.

6152. Particularly with the modern ideas of asylum accommodation?—Yes.

6153. On the other hand, is it not the case that many of the mental wards of workhouse infirmaries are at the present moment only half full?—Yes.

6154. Does it not occur to you that if there were some saving effected by transferring patients from highly-equipped asylums, patients who desired it, to workhouse infirmaries which are not at present fully occupied, you might in that way be able to effect some economies and possibly be able to improve the asylums for those who could benefit from them; I mean, one wants to take a large view of the whole situation. Is that sound, do you think?—I think it is sound. I think it ought to be coupled with the condition that if they are taken over, which is not the case at present, there ought to be the same aid to the guardians towards the cost of maintenance as there is now in the case of an asylum, where the old four-shilling grant obtains. It is stabilised for the time being; but as soon as ever you transfer them under Section 25 that grant is lost; although when you bring the same patients in by a contract under Section 26, although those patients belong to the same union, you get the grant in that way.

6155. At present when a patient is sent from your union to an asylum the union remains responsible for that patient and pays whatever may be the establishment charge per head?—Yes.

6156. Towards the relief of your rates you get four shillings per head from the grant in aid?—Yes.

6157. You would therefore have to defray the balance yourself?—Yes.

6158. I should have thought that as the maintenance in a workhouse infirmary is less than the rate per head in an asylum?—No, not always. (Mr. Ford): Not in the larger ones. (Mr. Leach): The reason for that is this: Take the 2,000 patients here, you get a great many of those patients who are able to do work in the different departments, but the class of patients that you bring in under Section 25 or Section 26 are chronic helpless persons who need greater care.

6159. Now, tell me this: Is the reason why there are relatively few of those transfers under Section 25 this, that if you have them in your own hands in the workhouse infirmary there is no grant for them?—There is no grant.

6160. Is not that a deterrent?—That is one. If there is pressure on the local authority under the Lunacy Act, if there is a shortage of asylum accommodation, they will make use of Section 25 for all they are worth, and Section 26, but if there is not pressure, well, they will not do it. The only case you get back under Section 25 is the case of a harmless patient who wants to come home, or where, as often as not, the relatives and friends want a patient to come to the workhouse because they are too poor to pay the cost of visiting him elsewhere.

6161. If you get your patients back under Section 26, that is, under an arrangement, the patients remain certified and under the asylum charge. Do you get a grant in such a case?—What you do is this: The asylum pay you your charge, and the union which has to meet the charge for the asylum (the patients are still on the asylum books) is getting the grant. It is a roundabout way of doing it. For instance, we have this case within my own experience. You brought a case under Section 25; you bore the whole cost of maintenance; there is no grant. But there were some of my union cases while that contract was running which belonged to Rochdale; they were boarded out from the asylum as asylum patients in the Rochdale workhouse. We paid the asylum their charges, that patient being on their books; we got our grant towards that charge, and they were paying our charges on account rendered. That is to say, you could get nothing under Section 25, but you can manage to get something under Section 26.

6162. What one would like to know is this, whether there is any deterrent, due to the grant in aid, to the utilisation of Sections 25 and 26?—I do not think so in these days, but it is a matter of fact that the original purpose of the four-shilling grant was to get guardians to send their old chronic cases to the asylum, and it has been a very costly grant because it has meant the erection of large mental hospitals for a class of case that might have been kept at home.

6163. You are touching there upon a large question of policy which I think is interesting. The asylum with its equipment is naturally directed, or ought to be directed, to the cure of patients?—Yes.

6164. There are a large number of cases, are there not, which are recognised and must be recognised, as incurable?—Yes. I received notice of a case this week—the death of a patient who had been there since 1885. We have cases of patients who have been in the asylum for 40 or 50 or a longer number of years.

6165. And those cases might just as well have been in your workhouse, so far as their prospects of recovery were concerned, or any benefit they could get from treatment in an asylum?—Yes. Of course they were probably rightly sent to the asylum in the first instance, but they may as well after long detention have been back, if they are harmless and chronic, in the Poor Law institution. They are sent back where there is pressure, but not where there is not.

Mr. J. W. FLINT, J.P.

6166. But what is of much interest to us is the fact that many of them, as you told us, would wish to get back to the workhouse?—Yes, to see their friends. I have got the reports here. There are five medical superintendents of mental hospitals in Lancashire. In my reading from time to time—I have read a lot in years gone by—great complaints have been made by superintendents of mental hospitals of relatives and friends dropping off visiting patients after they have been there a while, and the medical superintendents have spoken of it as rather a lamentable and regrettable thing, because the patients are out of touch with their relatives.

6167. The relatives cease to take an interest in them and possibly they may not be able to afford the expense of paying the visits. Therefore the patients feel they would be in closer touch with their relatives if they were in the workhouse of their own union, where their people would come and see them?—Yes.

6168. Suppose one of your patients in your asylum says, "I want to get back to the workhouse where I would see my own people," what do you do?—I have had a case within the last fortnight where the relatives came and asked that their brother might be brought back to Rochdale.

6169. What do you do in that case?—We write to the medical superintendent and ask if there is any reason why this request cannot be carried out. If it is a very old case, as it is in this instance, they discharge him to the workhouse.

6170. Then you got him back?—Yes. That is where you make a request, but if there is no pressure in the asylum, you do not get them back, except you ask for them.

6171. But the value of the guardians' visits is in this respect: If the guardian who comes from the locality and knows about the people sees the patient and the patient makes that request, then the guardians can take action?—Yes, we do, and make the request; but if it comes in between the visits, if we get an application of that sort, we always write direct; at any rate, that is my practice.

6172. I am selecting some of the topics which you have brought before us because others of them are not within our province. There is one topic you referred to about which we have heard a little, that is the clothing of patients in asylums. I see you have a view upon that subject?—Yes. I do not want to bring this out before the Commission more than I should, but some years ago, not many years ago, I addressed one of the large Poor Law Conferences on the matter of treatment in Poor Law institutions. One of the things I argued was that although a person was charged on the guardians in a Poor Law institution, if he had his own clothing he should be allowed to wear it, or if his friends could supply him, he should be allowed to have his own clothing, and in my visitation of asylums I have found that in some places they let the patients wear their own clothing. But, generally speaking, in Lancashire the case is that when the officer delivers a patient at the asylum they bundle up the patient's clothes and send them back with him. I think that to take a man or woman out of their own clothing simply because they are in an institution, granted the clothing is decent clothing, is very hurtful and sets up a very hurtful de-classing feeling. Generally, I have put that in my statement. I know no good reason against it. There is a growing practice in Poor Law institutions of letting patients and the inmates wear their own clothing, and in our case if the friends want to do the laundry for the patients at home we let them do it.

6173. Is there any difficulty in getting their clothes renewed?—Not in a large number of cases, but, as Mr. Ford says, there are patients who are destructive. I think that simply because a person is chargeable to the rates in any institution, it is a wrong thing to take him or her out of his or her clothing if the clothing is decent and can be renewed. I see that the Board of Control mention that in their Report of this year.

6174. Yes, the subject is quite before us. Then you have an observation on the subject of inquests. You think that the guardians interested in any particular patient should have a notification?—Yes, that has been before the Association several times, and it is only right that it should be so.

6175. But you would like some regulation on the subject?—I think there ought to be a regulation. It should be done probably in the case of a person dying immediately after admission, where there are some fractures, where the officer who removed might be sent for; but, in the view of the Association, where death takes place the guardians ought to have an opportunity, on notice to the clerk, to attend the inquest. If a person dies in a Poor Law institution, and there is an inquest, the master of the institution has got right away to give notice to the clerk.

6176. Now you, I think, share the view that has been expressed by Mr. Propert on the subject of nomenclature?—Yes. But I do not know whether the term "mental hospital" is not worse than "asylum."

6177. I am afraid it is difficult to neutralise the effect of words, or the associations which they gather round them?—If you take the expression "hospital" under the definition clause of the Lunacy Act—a registered hospital—it does not say that they shall be "mental hospitals"; they are hospitals in which mental cases may be put. They do not put "mental" before "hospital."

6178. That is the statutory definition, of course, for the purpose of the Act. It is an institution wherein lunatics are received.—Yes, but I certainly would not put "mental" before "hospital"; I do not see why it should be so.

6179. Of course, one knows that there are specialised hospitals for other things; you see them all over London—"hospital for epileptics," "hospital for cancer," "hospital for skin diseases," and various types of hospitals for particular maladies.—Yes. I do not know whether it is a good practice. I do not care what it is, a hospital is a hospital, and it ought not to have any dressings, either before or after; it should be simply left "hospital."

6180. Then you have furnished us with a letter which you have received from your special relieving officer. You have a specially designated relieving officer who performs the functions under the Act?—Yes.

6181. I have read it with interest. You have also given us a very large table of statistics.—I thought perhaps it might be of some assistance to the Commission.

6182. Yes, they are very interesting. They show the way in which in practice patients come before you and are dealt with?—I might have added, if I may, the number of cases during the same time which have been dealt with by the medical officer of the workhouse and who, by the end of the 14 days, have been re-classed as sane patients (handing in document).

6183. There is one thing which interests me in your schedules. The first table you have compiled gives us the number of persons who were not in receipt of Poor Law relief when first dealt with as lunatics?—That is so.

6184. That emphasises the point that quite a substantial number of the persons who are dealt with as lunatics had no relation to the Poor Law at all before their malady afflicted them?—That is so.

6185. In your case this covers the period from 1st April, 1923, to 30th September, 1924. I find that no less than 48 of the cases you dealt with during that period had not been paupers in any sense of the term at the time of their affliction?—That is so.

6186. But became recipients of Poor Law relief by the circumstance of their being afflicted?—Yes.

6187. There are 48 of those?—Yes.

6188. Then the next group you give is those who were in receipt of Poor Law relief when they were overtaken by their malady?—Yes.

6189. I find that you have 28 cases of those?—Yes.

Mr. J. W. FLINT, J.P.]

6190. Were these actual inmates of your workhouse or persons in receipt of outdoor relief at the time they became afflicted?—They were persons found inside the institution sick, excepting one; there is only one who had out-relief.

6191. What is your third category? Your third category is called "Poor Law Institution Cases"?—That is what we call the permanent class. The medical officer gives his certificate for 14 days as a proper person to remain; then he gets it supported by another certificate under Section 24, and then the justices make an order. They are really chronic, harmless cases—more of the imbecile class.

6192. Of that class you give us 14 cases during that period?—Yes.

6193. So that the bulk of the persons whom you have dealt with over the period in question were persons who at the time of their affliction were not in any way in receipt of relief at all, but became chargeable through the circumstance of their being afflicted?—That is so. The reason that I have taken 18 months is that that happens to be the period that this officer has held his office.

6194. Then I think, Mr. Leach, those are all the matters, subject to what my colleagues may ask you, that I should like to bring out from you?—If you please.

6195. Then, Mr. Ford, you are Clerk to the Guardians of Leeds?—Yes, I have been for 28 years and have been 45 years in Leeds union altogether.

6196. You, of course, have been sitting here while we have been discussing matters with Mr. ProPERT and Mr. Leach. Have you any further contribution to make to our enlightenment?—I do not think so. I think you have covered all the ground I have set out in my précis, except that I should like to emphasise the necessity of some provision for the border line cases. I happen, perhaps, to be different from other Clerks, as almost every day in the week I am consulted by somebody, most frequently with regard to the very early cases. There is reluctance on the part of persons to take any step unless matters become aggravated.

6197. To what do you attribute that?—The fear that if they even call in their own medical man—I am speaking now of personal friends and people who come to me repeatedly, who are so afraid if they call in a doctor—their brother, or daughter, or whoever it may be, will go to an asylum. There is not the same objection, though there is still an objection, to their being moved, at all events temporarily, to our own institution. May I point out that our infirmary has had separate blocks, called until recently imbecile blocks, since the infirmary was separated from the workhouse in management in 1872. The whole of these have been under the medical superintendent. Our present medical superintendent has been with us for over 40 years, and he has possibly had a greater experience in examining lunatics than certainly any man in our part of the country. It is difficult to suggest what should be done, because I am not an expert from the medical point of view, but I have said in my précis that I fail to see why in the early stages there should be such a definite distinction between the treatment of a person who is mentally sick and a person who is physically sick. We do have cases in our own infirmary that are certainly unstable at the time they are admitted.

6198. Let us pause there for a moment. It is the consequence or the concomitant of the particular class of ailments we are dealing with that some interference with liberty is necessary?—I agree. Later on. When the malady has become pronounced, I have nothing further to suggest, but the sooner the case is dealt with in remedial institutions the better, but not institutions where there is accommodation for an enormous number of people of unstable mind. I should like to see separation made again between them and the old chronic cases. We have cases in the imbecile wards for years and years as happy as they can be, and those people are often happier than people in full possession of their faculties. I, like Mr. Leach, have visited asylums with the guardians for the last 30 years until perhaps the last year or two, when other matters have kept me from visiting, and it has been a common experience that the patients have recognised the guardians and have appealed in the most strenuous terms, "Let us come back to the institution," and we get some of them back, but only on request.

6199. But recurring to the topic you started with for a moment, you are anxious to see a development of the treatment of incipient cases without what one might call the menace of certification?—I agree.

6200. If it can be achieved?—I agree.

6201. As you know, that is a part of our reference. We have to consider that under the second head of the remit to the Commission?—Quite.

6202. One of the practical difficulties that, I think, does press upon us, and has pressed upon all people who have had to consider the problem, is just this: that the incipient case at any moment may become a pronounced case?—Quite.

6203. Therefore some form of control, possibly short of the full control which is given by certification, may be necessary for a temporary period, a provisional period, in such incipient cases?—Quite.

6204. Would you be apprehensive that any form of control or detention against the will of the patient might operate as a deterrent, such as exists just now, in resorting to doctors?—To some extent. As far as the detention was lightened so I think the fear would vanish. May I give you a case in point? I had a close relative of my own who had a certain brain attack. I sat up with him for three or four nights continuously. He switched off from physical convulsions to mental delusions. I asked the doctor who was attending him was he likely to recover his mental balance afterwards. The doctor said it was impossible to say, but there was no place to which that relative of mine could be sent for a short period. He is perfectly well now and going about his business. The probability was that his physical side might become better, but the mental side might be bad for some little time, and the only alternative was an infirmary or an asylum.

6205. What did you do in that case?—In that case, fortunately, he got better in his home, but I would just like to point out that in his position it would have been almost fatal to have certified him as a lunatic. Since then he has retired, but he had a year or two more to work.

6206. Earl Russell: Would it have been equally fatal for him to have gone as a voluntary boarder to an asylum?—Yes, to an asylum.

6207. I meant a private asylum?—I am leaving out Poor Law infirmaries, but even Poor Law infirmaries might be a place of refuge. Some persons would not care to place themselves under voluntary confinement for a time, but there are a considerable number who would be very glad to do so, and who have no more connection with the Poor Law in the ordinary sense than a millionaire has. I think there should be something between the two.

6208. You suggest a ward of a general hospital?—I think so. I have taken a great personal interest in these cases in our own institution. I know so many cases which have been caused by some physical ailment. I have seen cases in which with care in our own infirmary wards the physical disability has been removed, and the mental disability has followed suit, and they have gone away.

6209. Chairman: There is a difficulty there, is there not, in this respect: Take the case of a friend of one's own, a relative in your case, who suddenly becomes afflicted in that way. You naturally want him to get the best possible treatment, and at the same time you want to avoid the disastrous consequences of certification?—Quite.

6210. If he were taken to a general hospital, if the case were a violent case or a noisy case, as these transitory cases often are, would not you have a pretty bad upset of the ordinary hospital régime?—No, I do not think so, any more than in the case of delirium in typhoid fever and other acute fevers; they have to deal with those cases.

6211. That answers that side of it, but what about the facilities for treatment? Do you consider that a patient taken to a general hospital would have the same opportunities for specialised treatment as you can get in a mental hospital?—No, but you must remember that I am speaking of incipient cases only.

Sir Humphry Rolleston: Would you ask the witness, Mr. Chairman, if he would expand a little the physical disabilities he was speaking of as complicating the mental disabilities? Of course nobody would dream of certifying a patient with typhoid fever who had got delirium, but I think it would be useful if the witness would say if the physical disabilities were not accompanied by some mental disturbance which might be certified.

Witness: Might I just correct a statement? I have known a case of typhoid delirium and insanity at Leeds. I am not a medical man. I am speaking again from what my own medical superintendent told me. There are certain diseases which frequently cause a man to be for some considerable time certainly mentally unbalanced; I do not mean delirium for a day or two, but there are acute internal diseases, for instance, I believe, that do at times cause an inflammatory state of the brain, and for a considerable time a man is mentally unbalanced; puerperal cases, for instance, in the case of a woman. I could ascertain what cases there are from the gentleman who has given me the information.

6212. Chairman: Your idea then seems to be that just as at present people send their relatives to a fever hospital, which is provided in most towns nowadays, without any social stigma attaching to it whatever, so also they should be able to send their cases of mental disturbance to a similar general hospital or a special ward of a hospital?—Quite. I am not entirely cutting out the Poor Law hospital. I do not agree that there is any stigma in association with the Poor Law.

6213. I can imagine that you gentlemen do not feel that at all, but the public has to be reckoned with in the matter?—I agree. I point out—I do not want to debate this matter very long—the great distinction that is drawn in our union. The infirmary has been separated from the workhouse; it is in the same curtilage, but the administration is entirely different. In the first place, the applicants draw a very great distinction. If you tell a man there is an order for the institution he says, "What do you mean; that is the workhouse." Sometimes there is the case of a man who is convalescent who is not fit to go back to his home and he is told he will be transferred to the workhouse. He says, "I am not going to be made a pauper." He does not understand any legal distinctions but he makes a distinction. I could give you cases of people of very considerable eminence in Leeds who have asked if their own relatives could be taken care of in our institution and they would pay the full cost. There is no other association of any kind. I find no objection whatever is made to going into a Poor Law infirmary, though there is the greatest objection to going into a workhouse.

6214. You draw a distinction between the workhouse and the infirmary which, although it is really a Poor Law institution, has become associated with the idea of a hospital rather than a place where destitute persons are detained?—What I say is that the public draw that distinction. (Mr. ProPERT: The Metropolitan Asylums Board are under the Poor Law. (Mr. Ford: We are hoping to have an Order very soon from the Ministry of Health in which provision is definitely made, but our arrangement for taking in private cases is tacitly agreed to. There is no law for it, but we do it, in a Poor Law infirmary, cutting out the ordinary machinery. I am speaking now of ordinary cases.

6215. You mean ordinary sick cases?—Yes, in the infirmary. I was just dwelling on the point that the stigma has gone, whatever may exist with regard to the workhouse.

6216. You have your medical staff there?—We have four resident medical officers there.

6217. And the public of your district have come to regard that as just one of the hospitals of the district?—We are linked up with the Leeds Infirmary. We have classes for the students. The Poor Law infirmaries have the beginning and end of disease which the general hospitals will not look at. Cancer cases come to us to die. They are like the chronic lunatics we have been speaking of.

6218. Do you have incipient mental cases uncertified?—Yes, not a large number, but we should like to have a still larger number of cases who could be persuaded to come to us. In some cases they are drafted to the ordinary imbecile wards, and in some cases they go back home. We have a visiting magistrate—and the one who does much of our work has a special qualification—he has been a district medical officer for many years, he has been Chairman of the Board of Guardians, he is a barrister and is senior magistrate and is a doctor—I may say we are very fortunate in Leeds in that the majority of our infirmary cases are managed by a medical superintendent who has 40 years' experience, but even there the magistrate occasionally turns down cases because he is not satisfied that the certificate is strong enough. The majority of the cases are taken under Section 14.

6219. Then, I think, Mr. Flint might tell us if he has anything to add. Mr. Flint, you are a Justice of the Peace and Chairman of the Sheffield Board of Guardians. I think you have been a member of the Sheffield Board of Guardians for 24 years, and you have held the office of Chairman of the Board for the past nine years, and were Vice-Chairman for eight years previously?—Yes.

6220. You have had, as Chairman of the House Committee of your Board, the care of the mental wards of the Firvale Institution?—Yes.

6221. Where you have accommodation for male and female cases—225 in all?—Yes.

6222. I think you have taken a great interest in that institution?—Yes, I have.

6223. We do not want to have matters repeated on our notes. You can tell us if you have anything to put before us by way of supplement to what has been said by the gentlemen who have preceded you?—Generally, I may say that I agree with the evidence of my colleagues, and I ought to say, I think, that I am not here to-day as a representative of the Sheffield Board, or because I am Chairman or hold office, but I am one of the representatives of the Poor Law Unions Association along with my colleagues; therefore, to some extent perhaps, my personal opinions are in abeyance.

6224. Yes?—I should like to emphasise what has been said (I do not want to do so at any length) in regard to the cases for certification remaining under observation for a longer period. I mentioned, I think, in my précis my experience in dealing with these cases, and you will see that I have certified a very large number of cases. Practically I certify all the cases in the Sheffield Union.

6225. I am very much struck with that. I notice that out of 2,587 patients dealt with in the period 1916 to 1924 you personally dealt with no less than 2,377?—That was so.

6226. So that you seem practically to do all the work?—I have seen as many as 10 cases in one day; they were not all certified, I am thankful to say, but you have got it before you.

6227. As an illustration of the statistics that I think Mr. Leach thought to be desirable, out of the total of 2,587 patients dealt with in your district in the period 1916 to 1924, 370 appear to have been discharged—that is to say, no order made?—That is right.

6228. And of those in your own experience, 2,377, 341 were discharged without any order made?—Yes.

6229. That illustrates Mr. Leach's point that quite a substantial number of cases occur upon which it is not found necessary to pronounce an order at all?—Yes, that is so. I think it is only fair to observe, if I may say so, that that is only a small percentage of the total number, and I think it does emphasise the fact that considerable care is taken by the relieving officers, and by the examining doctors, and the magistrates, in dealing with the cases.

Mr. J. W. FLINT, J.P.]

6230. Perhaps I am under a misapprehension. Does "patients discharged" mean patients that have been discharged after certification?—No, before.

6231. Without an order made?—Yes, without an order made.

6232. I notice that you resort in Sheffield chiefly to Section 14?—We do.

6233. Because out of your own cases of 2,377 patients dealt with, you certified 1,559 under Section 14?—Yes.

6234. And only 98 under Section 13?—Yes.

6235. And 379 under Section 24 in the period in question?—Yes.

6236. While of the total of 2,587 in your district, 1,663 were certified under Section 14, 131 under Section 13, and 423 under Section 24?—Yes.

6237. So that Section 14 seems to be the section under which you operate in Sheffield?—That is our custom, and I think it is the custom in Leeds. I believe it is the general custom really.

6238. Now it appears that at Firvale your accommodation is by no means fully utilised?—No.

6239. You have apparently 99 beds in the male block and only 53 occupants at present?—The point in regard to that is—and I should like to say I agree entirely with what has been said—that there is a great deal of available accommodation in Poor Law institutions which might be utilised for this purpose for taking cases from asylums. In our case we have admirable buildings which are not half occupied, and we have some empty blocks; we are already utilising them in one case for mental defectives under the local authority. We have a large number of mental defectives.

6240. You have already given us the figures for the male mental block; in the female mental block I see you have 125 beds, and only 65 are occupied at present?—We are expecting 50 cases from the Grimsby Union; we have arranged to take those, but we have empty blocks which could be utilised for this purpose, quite admirable blocks. They are empty, because, like many other workhouses, I think they are not fully occupied with the ordinary class of inmates. We have considerable accommodation that we could make use of, although we are, as I have said, taking mental defectives from the local authority; and we also have one block occupied with tubercular cases under the local health authority. We are utilising the buildings as far as possible, but there are other blocks which we could utilise for this particular purpose without any difficulty whatever.

6241. Then you would favour the policy of the return of cases from the asylums to the workhouses?—Yes; I think that would relieve the asylums' accommodation to a very large extent.

6242. I think these are all the questions that occur to me to ask you, unless you have anything to add?—I make some reference to the certification of children and their accommodation; my colleagues have not made any reference to that. It may seem a little exceptional perhaps, but I have always felt that certifying children as lunatics has been the most painful part of my duty as a magistrate. This is

(After a short adjournment.)

6249. Mr. N. Micklem: There appears to be a different practice in different unions as to certifying. In your union, Mr. Leach, you say the practice is to certify generally under Section 13 of the Act?—(Mr. Leach): If the alleged lunatic has not been in receipt of relief at the time.

6250. Section 13 only applies to a case where a man is not a pauper?—That is so.

perhaps apart from the Poor Law side, but taking the two together, of course, experience may be useful; it always seems to me to be very regrettable that these cases of young people should be sent to an asylum, which is a mixed asylum for adults mostly, and that there should be no special or proper provisions for dealing with these particular cases. You will notice in some information I got from the Clerk to the West Riding Asylums Board that they admit practically that there is no special provision made for these cases, but there is an intimation there that the policy of the Board of Control is that such cases should not be certified as lunatics, but should be certified under the Mental Deficiency Act. That is obviously impossible, in my view. I spoke to the medical man who examines the great number of the cases in lunacy in our union with regard to this matter, and I pointed out to him the letter that I had received in regard to it; and he was very much puzzled that it should be suggested to him, as a medical man examining mental cases, that he should certify a lunacy case as a case of mental defect. He asked: What did I suggest he should do in the matter; so I said, "Well, it seems to me it is altogether contrary, in the first place, to the Lunacy Act that that should be done," and I said, "Of course it is a case for you as an expert—I am not an expert, I am simply a layman, and you must use your own judgment"; but it seems to me it is rather a curious suggestion that these cases should be certified as mental defectives.

6243. But one knows that the Mental Deficiency Act deals primarily with the class of case that is congenital, that is to say, the incurable case?—Yes.

6244. And, of course, children who suffer from imbecility, and so on, can be dealt with under it; but are you thinking of the case of a young person under 16 who is really for the time being of unsound mind who simply goes off his or her head as anybody else may—is it that class of case you have in mind?—Yes, I think so.

6245. What is your proposal as to how they should be dealt with? Is there any difference in their case from that of an adult lunatic?—There are a number of cases which have been certified as lunacy cases, lunatics, and I should take it that those cases could not be sent to an institution for the reception of mental defectives.

6246. There seems to be some difficulty about that?—I have had a good deal to do with the Mental Deficiency Act, as I have pointed out in my précis, and, as a matter of fact, I attend under that Act as a specially appointed magistrate to examine the cases from time to time.

6247. What is your proposal as to young people who become of unsound mind, but who are not congenitally so?—I suggest there should be special provision made for them.

6248. Do you mean a special institution, or a special ward, or what?—I do not suggest that a special institution should be built entirely for that purpose, but that there should be separate accommodation, that they should not be placed in mixed institutions with the adults, and that separate provision should be made for them. I think it will be generally agreed that there has been a great outcry with regard to children remaining in workhouses, ordinary cases; therefore I think these cases should not be placed with adults in mixed institutions. They are the most pathetic cases we have to deal with.

6251. Then Section 14 deals with the pauper case?—Yes. It may so easily make a person a pauper for the purpose of proceeding, by sending the district medical officer to see the case—that is sufficient. It is thought by some to take the case out of Section 13 and put it under Section 14.

6252. It would be rather a question of caprice on the part of the union?—I do not say that; it is a different view. I have put in the opinion of Mr. Alexander Macmorran.

6253. That opinion deals with this point, does it?—The very point.

6254. Very well. May I just ask you this: I understand that you think that possibly the present safeguards in regard to certification are hardly sufficient—you would require in every case of certification two certificates, one of them by a specialist?—Yes. I adopt what was done under the Mental Deficiency Act. Mind you, I think with my colleagues that a long way should be gone to deal with an alleged mental case without bringing him under certification, but once it is determined that that proceeding has to be taken, I say that the latest safeguards enacted under the Legislature are laid down under the Mental Deficiency Act, which largely follow the lines of dealing with private cases under the Lunacy Act—i.e., there are two medical men.

6255. You have had a very long experience of these cases—have you come across cases that in your judgment have been wrongly certified?—No, I will not say that. First of all, it would not be for me to take objection to a medical man as to the facts or the grounds on which he certifies—I mean classes of facts, the one ascertained by himself, and the other communicated by others. But there have been cases, of course, before the Courts where it has been alleged that they have not been properly certified. We had a case at Rochdale many years ago, a woman named F.F. I think it was. The officer reported this case to me. She had not had relief, and we got the district officer in. The ground of her insanity was a charge that she had made against a resident in the town, who said she was a lunatic. As it came to me, I said, "Well, on the face of it it is quite possible, not at all improbable, that that may be so; you had better deal with this case under Section 13." She was dealt with under Section 13.

6256. That is to say, you got a second certificate?—Yes, and she was sent to the asylum. She was in Lancaster asylum for over two years, and she got discharged as "not improved," and she set up an action against one of the medical men who gave a certificate on the ground that his certificate did not disclose sufficient facts of insanity to warrant the justice in making the order. The case was tried at the Manchester Assizes; it went on for several days, and ultimately the medical man against whom the action was taken felt that probably in the long run, from a financial point of view, he had better make terms, and the terms were made.

6257. But those certificates must have been examined by the Board of Control in the usual way, must they not?—Yes. It is quite a notorious case. I am only giving you an instance where an action was taken 12 months after. Then you have had the recent case, of course.

6258. Exactly the same thing might have happened under your scheme. There were two certificates in that case?—There were two certificates in this case, but neither of the certifying practitioners was a brain expert, and that is why I advocate the adoption of the provision under the Mental Deficiency Act, which requires that one of the two medical men should be a person either approved by the local authority or by the Board of Control—I say, by preference, by the Board of Control.

6259. Thank you. Now may I ask Mr. Flint one question on his figures. I see that you give us the summary of the patients dealt with during the period commencing 11th January, 1916, and ending the 31st October, 1924. Let me just take one year, if I may, 1924. In your case in 1924 nine were certified under Section 13—that is, as non-paupers?—(Mr. Flint): Yes.

6260. And 179 as paupers?—Yes.

6261. Now how do you determine whether a man is a pauper, or is not a pauper for your purpose?—In many cases we are approached by the relatives of the person. The relieving officer is approached because that is the simplest and most convenient way of dealing with the case, and in certain cases they are people in a position to pay the charges and costs.

6262. In that case you classified them as non-paupers?—Yes, obviously, although they are dealt with by our officers, because that is the machinery most convenient to deal with the case, but they are obviously non-pauper cases.

6263. In those cases, of course, there are two certificates in every instance?—That is so.

6264. In the 179 pauper cases there would be only one certificate?—Quite right.

6265. How do you ascertain whether they are paupers? I appreciate you can find out that they are able to maintain themselves, and that they are non-paupers. When do you classify them as non-paupers? They have not been beforehand on the rates, have they?—No, they are only classified here as paupers because they are not dealt with under the 13th Section, and they only contribute part of the cost, some of them not at all, so they are obviously pauper cases. (Mr. Propert): A pauper is a person who is either wholly or partially chargeable to the rates.

6266. But up to the time they are certified they have not been chargeable to the rates, and therefore prima facie they would come under Section 13 and not under Section 14?—(Mr. Flint): No. We deal with all the cases, unless they are brought to our notice, as cases under the 13th Section, that is private cases.

6267. Now I want to ask you one question as to the patients discharged in that year. There were 81—a very large number—of those 179 patients discharged, and I think you told the Chairman that they were discharged before certification?—Yes, but after they had been seen.

6268. Now all of those must have been brought before you, must they not?—They were, all of them.

6269. Did you refuse to certify them?—No, the medical officer refused. Might I say that the medical officer who certifies our cases is what my friend Mr. Leach would call a specialist. He certifies the whole of the cases. He is appointed jointly by the justices to do this work, and where he is doubtful about certifying a case, in order that it may be detained he writes a note to the resident medical officer, and I sign it, asking him to consider detaining the case, putting it on a 14 days' order. We do that in order to carry out what we have been suggesting this morning, that more complete observation should take place before a case is certified. A large proportion of those cases are ultimately discharged and not certified.

6270. They were all cases, were they, in which the relieving officer, or certain other officials, thought there was presence of unsound mind?—Yes, he took steps with that in view, and brought them there for observation.

6271. It seems strange that there should be such a very large number that he thought it necessary to bring in either for the public interest, or for the welfare of the persons themselves?—I think if you look at this table in this particular year the number discharged is unduly large comparatively with the other years.

6272. It is pretty large?—I do not know the actual reason of that, but you see you have only 23 discharged in 1918 out of 170, whereas in the case that you mention there are 81 out of 179.

6273. Yes, but, on the other hand, in the first year there are 52 out of 157?—That is so, yes. I do not want to say that we are different from other unions in the way in which we deal with these cases, but we have a certifying medical man who is very careful indeed.

6274. Those cases would be usually discharged because he had declined a certificate, not because you, as a justice, refused to make the order?—No. I have refused on certain occasions, but really I am always placed in the position of putting my opinion against medical experts, and, of course, one hesitates to take that step.

Mr. J. W. FLINT, J.P.]

6275. Mrs. Mathew: I wanted to ask Mr. Flint about paragraph 9 of his précis, "special mental nursery homes"—is there any such thing?—The Chairman asked me something about that this morning. What I suggest is that there should be special provision. I put it in this way in order to call attention to it, because I do think it is important that young people of tender age when they are certified should not be placed in wards where there are mixed cases, that is to say, adults generally. There are special institutions for boys. I visited one such at Stanley Hall, Wakefield, but there what they call boys range from about 10 to 30 or 40 I found; they are very bad cases indeed, shocking cases. But there are many cases which are not so bad as those that I saw there, and I think there should be special provision made for them so that wards should be set apart particularly for their care and treatment. It is pointed out in the reply I have sent in from the Clerk to the West Riding Asylums Board that the adult patients are rather glad to have these cases in the wards, because they are of interest, and they take a personal interest in them; but, on the other hand, one cannot help feeling that the effect of these adult lunatics upon the children must be very bad.

6276. And children are mixed now with adults, are they?—That is so.

6277. In many cases?—I think in most cases; I do not think there is any special provision made at all.

6278. Then I wanted to ask Mr. Ford, is it because of the better nursing in the general hospitals that he would use them for mental cases?—(Mr. Ford): I do not suggest there is better nursing in general hospitals; I would suggest in my own hospital there is quite as good nursing as in the Leeds general infirmary. Of the whole of our nurses who have put in for their certificates, 100 per cent. have passed; that is as near perfection as you can get, and our scale is one to five patients. You cannot get much above that in a general hospital. I was only suggesting the general hospital for the class that are not of the pauper class. I do not think there would be the same objection in going to a general hospital as going to a Poor Law infirmary, although they would rather come to the Poor Law infirmary than go to an asylum. With regard to the Section 13 cases, there is no reason why we should have them if there is any other body to take charge of them, but at present there is not.

6279. There you suggest the general hospital?—I know general hospitals are overcrowded, but I am speaking of what might take place in the future as a matter of improvement.

6280. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Mr. Leach, you rather gave the impression that you thought with regard to the nurses who were looking after the insane, it was more important that they should have a good general training such as a hospital nurse gets than that they should have a special training. Did you mean that?—(Mr. Leach): No, I meant take the other as a post-graduate course, the special training; they should have the three years' training as general nurses first.

6281. Do you think that you would favour an alteration of the law on the following lines, namely, that a patient who felt that his mind was beginning to shake should voluntarily go to a mental hospital and say that he wished to come in, and that he consented in his present state of mind to bind himself to remain for a certain period, to be determined by the medical officer perhaps in some cases, and that on that voluntary desire he should be detained, even although it may appear to be against his will in the future?—I should say that; but I should also make provision for taking cases against their will without certification, up to a certain point. I have known a patient who has been discharged from an asylum recovered (we had a case like that in Rochdale) who some time after felt that her mind was giving way, and went back to the asylum and asked to be admitted; they took her in and got her certified after admission, but in that case, of course, she had to be dealt with again as a lunatic; but she had that sanity to go straight away to the asylum and ask for admission, and she was admitted; but they could not keep her there without the ordinary certification and justice's order.

6282. But it would be rather dangerous, would it not, to detain a person without putting them under certificate?—Of course in a lot of these cases where a mental breakdown occurs, a sickness, an illness, or bodily ailment has preceded it; they are not of sufficient mentality at the time to express any wish about the matter.

6283. Has it ever happened in your experience (this is another matter) that three guardians have discharged an insane patient from the infirmary without the concurrence of the medical officer, or even against his advice?—No—not three guardians; guardians have power under the Lunacy Act to discharge any person who is detained as a lunatic although there may be a justice's order.

6284. Chairman: It is under Section 81: "The guardians of the union to which a workhouse belongs may make an order for the discharge of any lunatic detained therein." That is the guardians as a whole. Then the three members of the visiting committee may discharge—?—I say the guardians.

6285. Not three guardians?—No, the guardians as a board. That is only in the case of a patient in the workhouse. I take it, it was that class of case to which the question related—have the guardians at any time discharged such a person (under a doctor's certificate or justice's order) in opposition to the advice of the medical officer?

6286. Sir Humphry Rolleston: That is the question?—I have never known it. They have power to do so, but I have never known it done, in fact it is not an uncommon thing in the case of a person who is detained in a workhouse under Section 24, or it may be under a 14 days' order, for their friends and relatives to come to the guardians and ask them to be discharged to their care and custody; but I have never known my Board to order such a discharge in opposition to the opinion of their medical officer, and they are very careful always not to let the persons go, excepting there is a good home for them to go to.

6287. Mr. Ford, do you think that, generally speaking, the Poor Law infirmaries are good places for the treatment of more or less acute cases of insanity?—(Mr. Ford): No, I should not say acute cases.

6288. Then you drew a distinction; you said there ought not to be a hard and fast line between mental illness and physical illness?—Quite.

6289. And you rather drew the analogy and said there was not very much difference between the treatment of infectious diseases and other diseases?—Quite.

6290. Do you think that is a true analogy?—The analogy I was attempting to draw was with regard to the point that in one case you must deal with a person either as a pauper or a non-pauper; that does not obtain with regard to the treatment of infectious diseases; they are treated in an institution that is maintained from the rates; but there is no question as to whether a person before admission is a pauper or non-pauper, nor should there be in the case of a lunatic.

6291. A point has been raised (it is not my point) as to what you would think if the suggestion were made that the Poor Law infirmaries should be abolished, so far as regards the treatment of the insane?—My reply would be, I should like to be informed what it is suggested should take their place. They are an absolute necessity at the present time, whether public feeling is in favour of that or not.

6292. It has also been suggested that they should be abolished as regards their present function, and that they should be reconstituted under the name of hospitals for mental debility, for the reception of patients not under certificates?—Quite apart from my capacity as Clerk to the Poor Law Guardians, I should be glad to see any change I have suggested brought about.

6293. Then you would have to have the institutions occupied by all these people with senile debility?—Yes. In the Leeds Union at all events, the four unions in the city of Leeds, we have enough lunatics to run an asylum ourselves. My own Board is paying £60,000 a year. I see nearly every medical certificate that is given, the grounds given convince the magistrate and convince the Visiting Commissioners afterwards; but as indicating insanity observed either by the medical man or communicated to him by friends some are remarkably thin. A question was asked of my colleague that was not put to me. I cannot give any present cases, but if my long experience may allow me to go back 20 years, I can give you many instances where cases were certified as lunatics who never were lunatics; I say that advisedly, and there is correspondence with the Lunacy Commissioners to prove what I say. The black list cases were sent to an asylum. We wrote to the Ministry of Health and to the Local Government Board, but there was no effective remedy. The medical man certifies; the magistrate says, "I am not bound to accept the certificate, but what can I do in place of it?"

6294. But they could be discharged, could they not?—They were discharged very promptly, but they had been in an asylum as lunatics in the meantime.

6295. Sir Ernest Hiley: Mr. Ford, have you got out any figures corresponding to Mr. Flint's figures for the Leeds Union?—No, but I shall be very glad to send them in if I may.

6296. Has Mr. Leach got anything for the Rochdale Union which gives the number of discharges?—(Mr. Leach): Yes; I thought I had given very full information on that point.

Sir Ernest Hiley: If the Chairman has it I will not ask you anything more.

Chairman: I do not know that they are the same figures that you want.

6297. Sir Ernest Hiley: I was rather curious to know whether the proportion of patients discharged in these other two unions was anything like the high figure for the Sheffield Union?—(Mr. Propert): Roughly speaking, in Fulham they are about half. Would you like the figures from Fulham?

6298. If you please?—(Mr. Ford): I should like to forward them from Leeds, too.

6299. Chairman: If you gentlemen would concert your figures on a comparable basis it would be helpful. If you get figures for different stretches of time, and so on, they will not compare. You might arrange among yourselves to take a couple of years and give us the result. That would be what Sir Ernest would like.—(Mr. Leach): In my case I have given the history in every case.

6300. That is rather too elaborate.—(Mr. Ford): Something on the line of Mr. Flint's figures?

6301. Yes.—(Mr. Leach): I can get them for Manchester and Liverpool too.

6302. Chairman: I think Mr. Flint's way of arranging the figures is very useful.—(Mr. Ford): If you please, Sir.

6303. Sir Ernest Hiley: Mr. Flint, I suppose there is no mistake about the figures you gave us for 1924—your own personal figures? They show 64 patients discharged by you out of 232 presented to you?—(Mr. Flint): In 1924?

6304. In 1924—that means that in one case out of every four the relieving officer was wrong?—I confess I do not understand those figures, because, generally speaking, if you take the average of patients discharged, 341 out of 2377—

6305. That is about 12 per cent.?—Yes.

6306. But this year it seems to have been particularly bad?—Yes. These figures were given to me by the officer who was responsible for dealing with these cases, and I take them to be correct, but there may be some misapprehension. I do not understand it.

Chairman: I think, Mr. Flint, it is not very satisfactory to leave the figures as they are; my colleague, Mr. Micklem, was also in doubt about it. Do you think you are quite right in saying that the patients discharged are patients upon whom the justice has made no order, although they have been presented to him for consideration? I doubt if it can be so many as that.

Sir Ernest Hiley: I am dealing with Mr. Flint's own cases, and I understand that these "Patients discharged," the numbers in that column, meant to him cases which he had refused to certify.

6307. Chairman: Do you think it is so?—No, I do not. My experience is that about 12 per cent. is the usual.

6308. What does "Patients discharged" at the head of that column mean? Does it mean patients presented to you for consideration, or patients who, after certification, have been discharged later on? What you had better do to help us is to ask Mr. Hill, who compiled this, what he meant by that column headed "Patients discharged."—Yes; I will get further information upon that point and send it on.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, would you put a question to Mr. Ford arising out of an answer he gave with regard to the disinclination of people to send incipient cases to asylums?—Is Mr. Ford in a position to tell the members of the Commission what is the reason for the horror which seems to be felt by people with regard to sending those near and dear to them to asylums?

6309. Chairman: I will put the question, but I think it has been asked of a good many people?—(Mr. Ford): I do not think I can give any answer to that. It is not a suggestion of ill-treatment; it is only fear of an asylum; there is a stigma which attaches to a person through life who at one time has been a lunatic, and people dread that stigma being attached to anybody dear to them.

Mr. Stewart: This being a public enquiry might I ask for direction on this point: A number of figures have been supplied to the members of the Commission which I, for one, of course, have not access to. Will any facility be granted to me, as representing the Society for Lunacy Reform, to obtain access to those figures. This evidence, I assume, is evidence given in public. For instance, the table which Mr. Flint supplied to the Commission—one would very much like if it were permissible to have those figures.

Chairman: Some of the tables will ultimately be selected by us for publication, and will be appended to the evidence. On the other hand, for example, to give you the table that we have been examining this gentleman about, which has just appeared to be inaccurate in one of its headings, would be misleading.

Mr. Stewart: I meant when corrected—it is part of the evidence, I take it, before the Commission and therefore hypothetically available to the public; but if it is put in the form in which it is put here, it is not really available to the public.

Chairman: I will tell you exactly how I feel about that. We have been supplied with a great many figures, some of which have no bearing upon the topic we are to consider, and you will understand I have tried to select relevant figures. These are the figures which will appear on the note. A lot of the tables are not always material, and I have always tried to select figures which are of importance.

Mr. Stewart: I quite appreciate that, but if there is a figure which is of real importance to our case—

Chairman: Ask me for it, and you shall have it.

Mr. Stewart: I am much obliged. That percentage of discharge without certification is peculiarly interesting to the Association I represent.

Chairman: When we get this table corrected I shall be quite happy to give you the figures for any year you want of the number of patients dealt with by this particular gentleman, and the number who were discharged without certification, or after certification. If there is any figure of that sort you wish, let me know.

Mr. Stewart: I am much obliged, Sir.

Chairman: Thank you, gentlemen, very much for your attendance here to-day.

(The Witnesses withdrew.)

Dr. F. H. EDWARDS, M.D., called and examined.

Witness: May I hand in this letter, Sir? I promised a patient that it should be put in. It is rather relevant to something we heard just now. (Handing in a letter.)

6310. Chairman: Dr. Edwards, are you Medical Superintendent of Camberwell House?—I am.

6311. Where is Camberwell House?—It is within the Metropolitan area, in South London.

6312. How long have you been Medical Superintendent of that establishment?—Rather over a quarter of a century.

6313. Camberwell House belongs to the category of licensed houses, does it not?—It does.

6314. Licensed houses are dealt with, are they not, specially in the lunacy code?—They are.

6315. I see you have been good enough to furnish us with an historical résumé of the position. I think you might give us shortly an outline of the history of the licensed house in this country, if you will just summarise the first two or three paragraphs of your précis?—Would you like me to read it as it stands?

6316. If you please—the first two or three paragraphs, to put the matter historically?—To summarise it, I think I should say that licensed houses did not come into legal existence till the year 1774. That was really the first legislation which dealt with the insane in any kind of way, excepting an Act which was passed in the reign of George II and which dealt with the apprehension and the detention of people who were dangerous—that was purely a judicial procedure; there was no question of medical examination at all. Such people were apparently invariably confined in gaols. However, at the time of the Act of 1774 there were unquestionably a very large number of insane people in the country, and they were at that time, with very few exceptions (fewer exceptions than those I mention in my précis) confined to what subsequently became the licensed houses, which were then spoken of, of course, as private asylums. A large number were, however, in the poorhouses, and a good many were in gaol. The Act of 1774 really was brought about owing to an inquiry by a Committee of the House which disclosed a very grave condition generally through the country as to the care of the insane; and it laid down at least this, that houses that were to receive the insane must be licensed by law, and that people must not be received except they were received under a medical certificate.

6317. Was that the first inception of medical certification?—Yes, that was so. At that time, of course, there was no judicial order; indeed, as far as private patients were concerned, there was no judicial order at all until the Act of 1890. Prior to that, patients were admitted on an order which was given by a member of the laity—by a relative or friend—supported by two medical certificates.

6318. Without the intervention of a public functionary?—Without any public functionary intervening. Prior to the year 1811 there were, in fact, no certificates required at all in the case of a poor patient—a pauper. These people were received and detained in licensed houses without any formality whatever, and the only protection they got was the fear that they might subsequently take action for illegal detention; they had that power, and of course the Habeas Corpus Act was in existence.

6319. Apparently when one looks at the matter historically the anxiety in the early days was directed much more to the property of persons who were insane than to their person?—Entirely so. That goes back to the reign of Edward I.

6320. But as regards the legal code relating to the care of the person, it is interesting to note that the medical certificate in the case of the private patient who went to a licensed house was introduced in 1774, and in the case of the pauper patient in 1811. Up to that time the patient could be detained without any medical certificate, and was protected only by the common law and the Habeas Corpus Act?—Yes, that is so.

6321. We need not take the later history, which we know, I think; but looking at the particular class of institution with which you are associated, the licensed house, one is struck with this, that both the number of the houses and the number of patients under treatment in licensed houses have been progressively diminishing?—That is so. I think there is a very clear reason for that, as far as the numbers are concerned. The function of the licensed house was very largely that of receiving pauper patients under contract. There was no public asylum before the early part of last century. It is only within comparatively recent years that many of the large boroughs have provided themselves with mental hospitals. Prior to that, it was the case that the various outlying boroughs would enter into contracts with licensed houses for the reception of their patients. At the time when I was first associated with Camberwell House it was in fact a house primarily for the reception of pauper patients. We had at that time some 250 patients from the Borough of Hastings alone; all the patients from Hastings were received there under contract. They were taken in those days at 16s. a week. Then in London there were four other large houses of this character, all of them receiving only, or almost only, pauper patients.

6322. May I just put to you one or two figures I have taken out which show exactly what you have said. In 1847, which was the start of the new régime under the Commissioners appointed in 1845, you will remember, there were 141 licensed houses?—Yes.

6323. And they had 6,629 inhabitants?—Those are not my figures, are they?

6324. No, they are the Lunacy Commissioners' figures for 1847. 6,629 inmates, of whom 3,996 were paupers, while in 1914 there were only 68 licensed houses with 3,493 inmates, of whom only 638 were paupers. So that apparently, historically, the position has been this, that in 1847 there were more pauper than private patients in licensed houses, whereas in 1914 there were far more private than pauper?—Yes. The reason for that, of course, was this, that at that date two, if not three, of the large licensed houses had disappeared, those that took pauper patients; but if you take a date, say 1900, you would find the number of pauper patients was largely in excess of the number mentioned there.

6325. The last figures I have are for January, 1923. and there were 56 licensed houses with 2,606 inmates. Are there any pauper inmates still?—No, none.

6326. So these would all be private patients?—Yes.

6327. I had not understood why it was that the pauper patients had originally been in licensed houses and had now left. Formerly the method adopted was for the local authorities to send their pauper patients to licensed houses before they had provided county and borough asylums of their own?—Yes.

6328. The result is therefore that the licensed houses have been very steadily diminishing in number?—Rapidly; practically at the rate of one a year; but speaking generally those represent very small licensed houses.

6329. I would like to put a question which would probably have been asked by Sir David Drummond, had he been with us to-day, on the subject of the existence of a sufficient number of places to which private patients may be sent in this country. Have you any view on that matter?—Yes; I take the view that there is an unquestionable need to extend accommodation, inasmuch as at the present time there are certain areas of England which have no such accommodation at all. I personally have to admit patients from all parts. Perhaps you have noticed the figures I have given you of my own admissions in my précis. May I read the paragraph which deals with it?

Dr. F. H. EDWARDS.

6330. If you please?—"There undoubtedly exists, in a considerable section of the population, a demand for the treatment of the insane in other than public institutions. As evidence of this, it may be stated, quoting the statistics in the Blue Book recently published by the Board of Control, that, for the year 1923, there were admitted into one of the metropolitan licensed houses 247 private patients, as against 115, the largest number admitted into any registered mental hospital, and 112, the largest number admitted into any county or borough mental hospital. The aggregate admission of private patients for 1923 was licensed houses 1,312, registered hospitals 598, county and borough mental hospitals 1,190, and single care 189."

6331. Now what do you infer from that? Do you infer that there is not sufficient provision made in this country for the private class of patient?—There is grave inconvenience. Of course, there is a section of people who prefer public management; there is a section of people who prefer private management. It is a matter of the mentality of sections of the population. America has its licensed houses under some name or another, and every country in Europe has them; and it is to my mind an exceedingly inconvenient thing that people who live in Wales should have to send their patients to London to have them nursed. That constantly happens; not a month goes by but I have to admit patients from some district in Wales, because they desire to place the patient in some private hospital.

6332. Rather than in what one might call the private department of a public institution?—Rather than in the private department of a public institution. The chairman of the committee of one of the best known of the Welsh mental hospitals, whose name I cannot mention for obvious reasons, applied to me last week to take a near relative of his who had had to be placed in a great hurry in the county mental hospital.

6333. The licensed houses therefore are now the only places in which patients are taken for payment; private patients only are taken, and those are all patients who pay for their maintenance?—Oh, no, Sir; the registered hospitals take private patients.

6334. But all the patients in a hospital do not pay?—Exclusively, do you mean?

6335. Yes. What I want to elicit is the special feature of your institution. First it is private, and secondly every patient is a paying guest?—Yes; and that would apply to the majority of the registered hospitals, too.

6336. There is this distinction, that in the case of the licensed houses the institution is carried on for gain, that is to say, in the sense that it is not merely like a charity that pays its way, but it is a place carried on like a hotel?—It is not a charity.

6337. Whereas the registered hospital, on the other hand, is a charity, and contains both persons who pay and those who cannot pay, and the one to some extent helps the other, with the advantage of the endowment?—Yes.

6338. But yours is a nursing home or a hotel, if one may so put it?—Yes.

6339. And you say that caters for a certain demand that exists in the community?—I think these figures show it.

6340. Yes, it is quite interesting. The number, of course, is diminishing steadily, as you say?—The number of licensed houses is diminishing, for this reason, that primarily a licensed house was started by some medical man who was probably interested in the care and treatment of the insane, and in due course he built up a certain connection; he built up a certain hospital, as we might call it now, and subsequently died; he left the property he had to his children, who very likely had comparatively little interest in the work, and consequently the place, instead of being of any particular value in the treatment of patients, became of little value, and so it tended to disappear; in other words, if a place were not efficiently and well controlled it would tend to disappear. Where smaller licensed houses within recent years have lost the owner by death, they generally have been allowed to die, because they have no monetary value; there is no transferable value in them at all.

6341. And therefore they lapse, do they?—They would lapse.

6342. As regards their distribution throughout the country, it seems to be more or less haphazard—it is accidental?—Yes, and it is, unfortunately, at the present time so restricted by the law dealing with the licences that a house situated in a comparatively small borough, which might once have been a country borough and has now become a sort of town, cannot be moved beyond the confines of that borough because it is going under another licensing authority.

6343. There are metropolitan licensed houses which are licensed directly by the Commissioners of the Board of Control?—Yes.

6344. And there are provincial houses which are licensed by the local justices?—Yes.

6345. The proportions of the two do not seem to maintain any fixed ratio at all; that is to say, at 1st January, 1923, there were 19 metropolitan licensed houses and 37 provincial licensed houses, while in 1914 there were 23 metropolitan and 45 provincial?—Yes.

6346. The numbers apparently vary, but always on the down scale?—Yes.

6347. Now you are aware, are you not, that in 1890, or rather the inquiry which preceded the legislation of 1890, there were two views on the subject of licensed houses. One view was that they were not required, and that they should be abolished?—Yes.

6348. The other view was that they served a useful purpose and should be continued, but should not be increased in number?—Yes.

6349. It is interesting to note that they have diminished in number by a process of time since then. I should gather from your evidence that you think they still play a useful part?—I cannot question it; my own work tells me it.

6350. And useful, perhaps, just because they meet the demand of a particular class of the community?—There always must be a class of the community that neither want to have charitable aid given to them nor do they want to place themselves under the eye of a public authority.

6351. But if there be a substantial demand for this class of institution, can you account for the numbers diminishing so much, apart from the fact that there are no longer pauper patients in them; even since pauper patients have been in them the number has still dwindled? Demand usually creates supply.—It depends entirely. I tried to make it clear just now that in a certain place which is, shall we say, well managed, there would be no question of lack of patients—rather the reverse; there is a difficulty in accommodating the patients. But when a place ceases to have a medical man, perhaps, at its head, he having by death fallen out, or disappeared, and the place is left more or less, as smaller places may be, without even a resident doctor, it becomes known to the general public, to the doctors who send such patients, as a place where it is not very helpful to send a patient from the standpoint of treatment.

6352. I think that possibly the prejudice, if there were a prejudice, on the subject of the licensed houses was due to the fact that it was thought there was more liability to improper detention there than in the more public institutions, and that they were the sort of place in which designing relatives might put away their more or less ailing relations?—Yes.

Dr. F. H. EDWARDS.

6353. Would you tell us what are the precautions which exist for safeguarding against such occurrences in licensed houses? We have heard a good deal of evidence about other places. In licensed houses what is the touch maintained between your patients and the outside world?—They differ in no circumstances or way from the conditions in the registered hospitals—the conditions under which patients are admitted, the right to see judicial authorities, the right to have private interviews with Commissioners, all these things are exactly similar in the case of a licensed house to the conditions one finds in the registered hospital. One does not want to go over ground which you must have dealt with frequently before, but the bogey of illegal detention, of course, quite obviously connotes conspiracy between doctors (for illegal admission), magistrate, superintendent, and visiting Commissioner; and of course in the metropolitan licensed house we stand in a very different position even from the registered hospitals that lie outside the London area, because we are visited eight times a year by the Commissioners: six times to see all patients, and twice to see the new patients particularly. Every patient who is in residence has to be seen; every patient has to have his name ticked off in a book; in other words, the Commissioner has to satisfy himself that each case he sees every six weeks throughout the year is a proper person for detention.

6354. May I suggest this also to you: the licensed houses are all very much smaller than the public institutions, are they not? What is the largest licensed house?—The largest licensed house is licensed for 672 patients.

6355. That is much smaller than the great public asylums; and are many of them much smaller than that?—Much smaller; some of them go down to even four patients.

6356. I was thinking of the efficiency of the visits and the possibility of direct contact between the visiting Commissioner and the patient?—May I describe the visit of the Commissioner, or two Commissioners?

6357. If you please. When they come to your own house, what happens?—It would mean they would come about 10 o'clock in the morning.

6358. Do they tell you before that they are coming?—No; without warning they come; one has no idea when they are coming; they start going round where they will, deciding they will start at this point or that point, even going first of all to the stores or the kitchens. They carry a book with the name of every patient in, and a short note as to the nature of the patient's disease. They spend the whole day, usually till six o'clock, and they come the following day; they finish their inspection probably at six o'clock the following day. That means that to see perhaps 380 patients they spend certainly 12 or 14 hours, and as of course a large number of patients are habitually mentally ill, it follows that the rest have ample opportunity of discussing matters with the Commissioners.

6359. Do they take advantage of it?—A certain number invariably do, but they are nearly always people who are suffering from chronic brain disorder and have fixed ideas, perhaps, of persecution; and although such patients time after time ask for an interview, I have never known a case where the Commissioners have refused to give a private interview, that is to say, not seeing them in the house in which they are, but taking them to my private office and seeing them apart from myself, although such cases are perfectly well known to the Commissioners and although their delusions have existed possibly for years. Patients who are progressing satisfactorily do not ask to see the Commissioners privately. It is a certain small section. It is unquestionably good for them that they should see the Commissioners and realise that they get a hearing.

6360. Are you not also subject to visitation by visitors who are appointed by the local justices?—No; that only applies to the licensed houses in the country, outside the metropolitan area.

6361. Then you are not subject to that. We shall have some evidence by gentlemen who are in charge of provincial houses, later. In your case the visitation is entirely by the Commissioners?—Entirely, excepting, if I may add, at fairly regular intervals the Lord Chancellor's visitors also come, dealing, of course, primarily with the estates of patients, but also satisfying themselves that the patients are comfortable.

6362. Have you some patients who have been so found by inquisition?—A very large number under Section 116, and a very considerable section of those are placed by the Master on the visitors' list. The visitor pays always two statutory visits a year, during which he sees all the patients on his list under Section 116.

6363. Your patients, being all private, would to a large extent be persons of some means?—Yes. Then, as happened yesterday, Lord Sandhurst, one of the visitors, came down in the evening to see a special patient for whom some special form of treatment has been advocated. He paid a special visit, and these special visits are paid very, very frequently by a visitor.

6364. What facilities have you for relatives seeing the patients?—Relatives can, of course, visit at any time. Visiting normally takes place every day between half-past two and half-past four, but of course one cannot make hard and fast rules, because people come from the country, and that sort of thing. They go into every part of the house; there is no part from which the visitors are excluded, even where the acute patients are nursed.

6365. Then you have the same rule in licensed houses, that all letters addressed to certain public officials must be forwarded unopened?—Yes, under the Act of Parliament.

6366. And is that right or privilege made known to your patients in any way?—It is placed on the wall in every house. In every separate division there is a little printed notice in a frame, telling them that they have that right, also explaining certain other rights that they have. That is exposed so that every patient may see it.

6367. Will you allow me to put an entirely supposititious case, Doctor? Suppose that there was a patient in your institution—you will not regard me as offensive if I put it in this way—who was a very good paying patient, and whose relatives were also very anxious to have him kept there. You can figure the case; it is more the case of the novelist, but I put it to you for the purpose of asking you what means such a person would have of obtaining redress, of getting out, in short? What would be his points of contact? You have told us of the visits of the Commissioners. The relatives we must put out of account in this case, because they are in the conspiracy. We must put you out of it, because we have supposed that you are in it?—Yes, I am in it.

6368. What chance does that person have? What are his means of communication? Is he confined to the interview with the visiting Commissioner and to correspondence?—If a position of that sort arose, such a person having the use of his faculties—

6369. We must assume that, because it is ex hypothesi a sane person?—Yes, and consequently a person, who would have the ordinary common-sense the average man in the street is supposed to have, would probably get letters out without knowledge of the superintendent or his staff; that, of course, would be a very easy thing indeed, because it is a thing that even now does happen.

6370. Of course, you are assuming for the moment that your conspiracy went so deep that you intercepted the letters addressed to public officials. I am not assuming you were as wicked as that?—But I am; I am shutting out every means. There is no means at all, except that I should find it exceedingly difficult to keep the wealthy patient out of touch with other patients, or the nursing staff. Sooner or later some member of the nursing staff or one of the patients would go out on parole—10 per cent, do so go out—and that would mean it is quite certain that letters would begin to get posted, which I, with all my ingenuity, had no power to stop. I can quite conceive in that way the person would get into touch with the outside world.

Dr. F. H. EDWARDS.

6371. But the visit of the Commissioner, I should think, was of importance. Does the Commissioner actually see each individual patient?—Each individual patient. The Commissioner has a book with the names of the patients, and as the Commissioner goes round he takes his pencil out and ticks them off. In many cases in the London licensed houses the Commissioners individually know such cases as are chronic; if they see them so many times a year, they must; but in each case they tick off the name of each patient, and subsequently check their book against the names that they have, and then they check them against the numbers which are submitted to them.

6372. A mere arithmetical checking, so to speak, "All present and correct," is not of much use?—Quite.

6373. It is not so much a question of seeing that the people are there as to have them given an opportunity of speaking to the Commissioners?—It is not a question of giving them an opportunity of speaking to them. The Commissioners individually speak to every patient. They do not walk through a ward and say, "I have now given all the people in this ward the opportunity of speaking to me," but they go up to each case; they would not take so many hours inspecting if it were not for that fact.

6374. Let me again put to you a sinister suggestion, if I may. Is it not possible that a patient may be deterred from complaining because of the possible consequences of doing so?—I could imagine that, if a patient were living under some iron régime in which terrorism were the treatment, such a condition might arise. It can only be a conjecture on my part that such a thing might happen.

6375. I am putting these questions to you because one is anxious to allay rather than to arouse suspicion?—I know.

6376. Of course, I have this difficulty, that the assumption in a case of wrongful detention must be that the person is sane?—Yes.

6377. Because if the patient is not sane then he is not being wrongfully detained; but if the patient is sane one would naturally imagine that, being in possession of his wits, he would not be likely to be deterred from making his complaints known, or would not be disabled from making his complaints known outside?—That is so.

6378. Of course, there may be a class of case that is feeble, but not insane?—Yes.

6379. That might be the class of case more exposed to danger?—There is, of course, that class, the class that have virtually no initiative, and who would, perhaps, in any state or walk of life, whether they were in a hospital or whether they were not, take all things without complaint; one knows the type, of course, perfectly. Complaints as to illegal detention are the commonest form of complaint one has to hear.

6380. That has a certain popular vogue, if one may so put it?—Although I am the detaining authority, in a sense—the Act gives me power to detain certain people—nevertheless, the complainant speaks to me, complaining of the detention, which he always applies to some other person; they do not put it upon the doctor. The reasonable person does not complain; the person who is progressing normally and is going to recover does not complain about illegal detention.

6381. Of course, we are dealing with a subject which has not got definite edges—I mean, insanity is not a subject of mathematical ascertainment; it is a matter of opinion?—Purely.

6382. In dealing with such cases it must be inevitable that there are patients who are being detained against their wish and as to whom opinion might differ with regard to whether a case was a proper one for legal detention or not. That must occur?—Unquestionably; but one such case a year, perhaps, comes to my knowledge.

6383. What one is concerned with is to see that that class of case should be well safeguarded. Have you any suggestions to make for our consideration as to whether the existing protections are sufficient, or whether they should be in any way tightened up or added to?—I think, to start with, I would say that that type of case, as a class, as far as I am personally concerned, would not be nursed as certified patients at all; such patients would be nursed as voluntary patients, and a very large number of patients are so nursed.

6384. In your institution how many voluntary patients do you have?—I had under care last year altogether 78 patients voluntarily. My total admissions last year were just over 300. Of those, 78 were voluntary cases. A person suffering from a distinctly mild form of mental disorder would not be treated as a certified case, probably, in any institution if it were possible to treat him as a voluntary patient. It very commonly happens that a patient may be admitted to Camberwell House as a certified patient who in a month has been transferred to the voluntary boarder class.

6385. Is that because they have recovered?—Because their condition is such that they have improved up to a point when it is felt it is better for them themselves that they should be treated as voluntary patients.

6386. Without the sense of restriction?—Yes, exactly. Perhaps I might show you the form which I employ (handing in a form). I hand you that because there is no statutory form.

6387. I see the form says this—the public may be interested in it: "I herewith make application to be received at Camberwell House as a voluntary boarder for treatment, having first read the appended notice." Then the notice is: "Camberwell House is a private hospital for the care and treatment of people suffering from nervous or mental illnesses. Boarders are received on their own application. They are entitled to leave at any time, after giving to the Medical Superintendent twenty-four hours' notice in writing of their intention to do so, but, whilst in the institution, they must undertake to conform to the rules and regulations." Then there is appended a medical certificate by a doctor, saying that the patient is suitable for admission to your house?—Yes.

6388. Earl Russell: That is really your own form?—My own form entirely.

6389. Chairman: And this is what you send in to the Board of Control?—Yes. There is a notice of admission, which goes after the admission of the patient, but that form has to be sent to the Board of Control, and that is a matter which I rather object to, the intolerable delay which is necessary at present under the Act before being able to admit a person who comes to you in great need and in great urgency. You may have to say, "I am sorry, I cannot take you; you will have to wait two days while I get this permission." That is how the Act is at present.

6390. Yes. Now is one of your suggestions that the admission of voluntary patients should not be clogged by such a condition?—I think there should be no objection to any person voluntarily entering themselves as voluntary patients in any hospital for mental disorder. I would not in any way lessen the conditions which apply subsequently, in so far as the notice to the Board of Control, or whichever authority it may be, and the sending of a statement as to the mental state of the patient, is concerned. I think those things should be always on record; but I feel that patients should have the power—in fact I may say I have broken the law in this matter,—I have taken people who have arrived perhaps late at night, in some cases from great distances; people who probably have formerly been under care and who come and apply to be taken in. I say, "Very well, you can come in for to-night or for a couple of days, until I am able to get sanction." It is, of course, unfortunate to do things which are irregular, if one can regularise them.

Dr. F. H. EDWARDS.

6391. You do, however, do you not, recognise the appropriateness of the Board of Control or some responsible authority being notified of the admission of such patients?—Oh, yes.

6392. Otherwise one can see, of course, that there would be no safeguard at all?—Oh, yes.

6393. Would you advocate the extension of the voluntary system to the public asylums also?—Unquestionably, yes.

6394. It might be useful if you were to give us any suggestions you have to make specially applicable to the system of licensing houses which at present obtains. I think you have some views to advocate on that topic, have you not?—The present system of licensing is that in the counties of London and Middlesex and in certain scattered hamlets in Surrey, which seem to have been picked out because they had small licensed houses in them, the Commissioners were given the power to licence. The area is very limited; it is something like seven miles.

6395. Sir Ernest Hiley: Is the licence for the house, or for the proprietor?—The licence is for the house, but certain people are called licensees, one of whom must be a resident.

Chairman: You will find that in Section 211, Sir Ernest.

Witness: If the house is licensed for over 100 patients there must be a resident medical man. If below 100, a medical man must visit as the Board directs. Of course, such a staff would be ridiculous now. At Camberwell House we have six paid medical officers. The work at the present day could not be done in the sort of way it was done a century ago. Licences are granted on the first Wednesday in each February, and certain licensees have to attend; they have to make certain payments, which are fixed by Statute, and the licence is then granted for the succeeding 13 months. Now outside the London area the justices at quarter sessions and at any quarter sessions have the power to grant licences. Consequently, there are numerous licensing authorities. Wherever there happens to be only one licensed house, in that particular area you have to have a special licensing bench, a special licensing meeting for that purpose. I feel very strongly that the question of the supervision and control of the licensed houses all over the country should be in one hand. I mention that the Ministry of Health should be the licensing authority, that branch of the Ministry of Health which is especially concerned with the treatment of mental disorder, that is, the Board of Control, or whatever name they may be called by, and that these licences should be issued from the one central authority after the Board of Control are satisfied as to the propriety of the methods of treatment which can be applied in that particular place.

6396. Would you continue the visitation of the licensed houses by the magistrates?—That, at present, throws an intolerable strain upon the Commissioners. One feels that the Commissioners are very numerically weak at the present time, and so much so that even the London licensed houses, which were formerly visited four times a year by two Commissioners, are invariably visited by only one Commissioner now. The legal and the medical Commissioners came together, and although naturally the majority of the patients liked to see the medical Commissioner, there are sections who regard their case merely from the legal standpoint; therefore the legal Commissioner was of more comfort to them. So that I think, at present, until the Board is strengthened, or some other form of medical visitor is appointed, the magistrates would have to carry out the visitation. Of course, after all, for the provincial visiting the magistrates are accompanied by a medical visitor; that medical visitor becomes in time a man expert in the knowledge of mental disorders, and capable, perhaps not to the same extent as a member of the Board of Control would be, but to a large extent, of forming an independent and proper opinion of the condition of a mental patient.

6397. Earl Russell: Have not the Commissioners some power in the country of appointing Deputy Commissioners?—Yes, they have the power of appointing what are known as visitors—inspectors.

6398. Chairman: They have only two, I think?—Only two inspectors, and they, of course, are properly employed under the Mental Deficiency Act. It was to relieve the Commissioners largely of the extra duties placed upon them by the Mental Deficiency Act, but the strength of the Commissioners at present is, of course, totally inadequate, when one realises what the strength of the Commission was in 1845, with something less than 20,000 patients to care for, and now over 130,000, and the mentally deficient as well.

6399. I gather that you do attach importance to a supervising central authority?—I think it is essential. I think that wherever detention is carried out, whether it is in a private house or in an institution, one must have compulsory inspection. I speak advisedly, because I have on many occasions acted for the Lord Chancellor in examining houses where patients were supposed to be detained as lunatics, and one has realised that out of ignorance or from other causes patients have not received, in certain cases, the form of treatment which should have been applied. They were detained without formality, without legality, and one realised therefore how necessary inspection is in all forms of mental disorder where detention is involved.

6400. Then you have some view as to the transference of licences; you think that that should be facilitated?—The position is that there are certain licensed houses situated at the present time within the area of the licensing authority that might serve a very much better purpose if they were moved to more congenial surroundings, more particularly the small licences, licences for a small number of patients, which could serve a very useful purpose if the patients could go down to seaside places or into the country, and there is a very obvious and real necessity for it. At the present time I get applications from all kinds of sources, from medical men and others, "Can you recommend a mental hospital at the seaside?" Well, I know of only three at the present time, a convalescent home which is attached to Camberwell House, a convalescent home which is attached to Holloway Sanatorium, and a convalescent home attached to St. Andrew's Hospital, Northampton. I know of no other. It has always seemed to me that both for the county mental hospital and also any other form of mental hospital there should be an opportunity of sending patients when they reach a certain stage of convalescence to seaside homes.

6401. A seaside home or a convalescent home treated as part of your licensed premises?—It is not recognised by law, but it is nevertheless visited twice a year by a member of the Board of Control. That is outside his statutory duty, but he does it.

6402. Now all the patients who are at the seaside and convalescent, let us say, are still certified patients, I take it?—Either certified or voluntary boarders.

6403. But let us take a certified case as being a case under the arm of the law for the moment. Do you send them down to this seaside place?—I send them down, but in order to send them down I have to apply to the Board of Control for what is known as leave of absence.

6404. Earl Russell: Theoretically they are not in your licensed house?—They are not in the licensed house; they are out on leave. But what does very often happen is that frequently there is an urgent case in Brighton itself, for instance. They say, "Here, you have a mental hospital in the borough," and you say, "We cannot send a patient into it." It seems very ridiculous, and I think the Board of Control themselves have taken that view, because they submitted in their 66th Report the question to Counsel, and the Law Officers of the Crown decided that it was not legal to permit the entry of either certified patients or voluntary patients into convalescent homes.

Dr. F. H. EDWARDS.

6405. Chairman: It was not a licensed house, it was not a registered hospital, and therefore it was none of the known places of detention?—That is so.

6406. You think that really covers all the special matters relating to your type of house, do you?—If I might take paragraph 5, Sir?

6407. If you please?—Paragraph 5 I feel very strongly on, because one does realise the present extremely unfortunate position that medical men are placed in who desire to take and treat patients in their own care. There are many such, and there are many such men who are recognised by us as being skilled and specially trained and adapted for the treatment of patients of the private class, specially in private care; and yet what so frequently happens is that the patient is sent to such a doctor who may have a half-a-dozen patients in his house, and in the process of recovery the patient gets a little worse; he may just pass over that border line; then that terrible Section 315 looms over the doctor, and he has to send his patient away into some mental hospital and he cannot continue the treatment of the patient.

6408. That is because he would be held to be detaining for gain an insane person?—As he would be, but that is why to my mind there should be a possibility of extending the power to take patients who are of unsound mind into the houses of people who may be specially approved, and into houses specially approved for the purpose, without necessarily founding a large number of private asylums about the country. But I am sure that for the public weal, for the public benefit, it would be an advantage to many men who are now treating such patients in fear and trembling because they know how near they sail to the law. I have had to visit such, and I know the conditions of anxiety they are under if patients show symptoms which may be construed even into being symptoms of unsoundness of mind, and I know the fear of subsequent visitation and prosecution or of a tragedy happening, a suicide or something of the sort happening. There are many such houses within my knowledge that I know are admirably conducted and where patients are receiving individual skill and care from men who are really experts in their subject.

6409. Of course, it might find a place in any scheme which contemplated the treatment of patients, particularly of incipient cases, without certification and under some provisional method of detention?—The Mental Treatment Bill, as it was presented originally, made no provision for the care of such patients in medical men's houses.

6410. No, it did not. One has also knowledge of course that in the case of nursing homes, places to which people resort sometimes when they have a breakdown, the same problem must arise there. Apart from the cases where a doctor will take in one or two patients, the doctor who is running, as many doctors do, a nursing home, must have the same embarrassment you speak of?—I would not exclude the nursing home so long as the qualifications of the person keeping the home were satisfactory and sufficient.

6411. One's real anxiety is to give the best chance to the patient, consistently with the due preservation of his legal status?—Yes, so long as inspection follows the power of detention, it seems to me to be the only thing.

6412. Then you rely, do you, on inspection as a safeguard?—The greatest safeguard. Of course people so often (I am speaking now rather of the nursing home) will apply methods of treatment in ignorance which might be prevented where there were skilled inspection and skilled advice available.

6413. Then the system of inspection in your view is not only valuable as securing what you may call the legal rights of patients against unlawful detention, but also as securing for them the advantage of greater experience in the treatment of the cases?—I am sure of that, or we should not have the Medical Commissioners you see.

6414. Tell me this; in your own institution of course you will have both male and female nurses, will you not?—We nurse the entire place with female nurses, men and women patients. I have certain orderlies who assist in the matter of bathing in the case of certain patients, for 20 years I have done so; I lay no claim for inventing the system; I borrowed it from Scotland. I saw it in Scotland and I brought it down. Of course it was an enormous help during the war; when every man had to go, I had no difficulties. When superintendents up and down the country used to come and say, "How did you manage?" I said, "Turn out your male staff and put in your female staff." Of course it is an extreme error to think that male patients who have got mental disorder are not amenable to the care of women nurses. A man who is sick understands a woman who is a nurse. Apart from that the woman has the instinct of nursing. Some few men have, but very few. Also there is the distinct sense of resentment that so many male patients have at any form of coercion that might have to be applied to them being applied by a man, whereas they can understand the female nurse and her uniform as a person who must be obeyed. I personally have had no trouble after 22 years of specially nursing insane men with female nurses. Even in the war when the very worst cases were nursed—and of course I had a great many acute and difficult cases—even then I had a charge sister with two female nurses working under her. Our male assistants were entirely subordinate to the female staff. In the other four divisions there is no man ever admitted into a ward except for such purposes as shaving and bathing patients.

6415. And you find the psychological influence of that excellent?—Excellent.

6416. Without beating about the bush, are there not a good many cases of mental derangement which are associated with exceedingly unpleasant sexual symptoms, and so on?—I have talked to women engaged in general nursing and also engaged in general hospitals. I have spoken to women who were thrown during a great part of the war into contact with many types of patients, and they said they had had less in the nature of insult and unpleasantness or vicious suggestion from the insane than they had had from the sane. I do not think that, speaking generally, one finds, except in a very small percentage of one's male patients, obvious vicious habits.

6417. Take another class of case, take the acute case. Have you not a number of cases of patients to deal with, whose restraint requires really a very strong man to carry it out?—It might be that the male assistant would have to be called in, but whatever was done to that patient would be done under the supervision of the sister of the ward or her deputy. The great thing is to have a woman, a female nurse, in charge, but as I say, I have five divisions altogether where male patients are nursed, and in only one of those is there any regular permanent service given by a male orderly. In the other four divisions they may visit for the purpose of bathing and shaving, but they have no power of interference; there is no call to them to interfere in any way with the patients.

6418. Do you think it due to the particular character of your institution and the type of patient you have there that it has been so successful?—I think perhaps the social class of the patients may have some bearing upon it. It may be, but I should not like to say. After all, the experiment had to be carried out very largely during the war in the county hospitals. I visited the hospital of one of the witnesses whom you have had before you, Dr. Wolseley Lewis, last year, and I was very much struck to see how many really difficult turbulent cases were being controlled there by female nurses. The fact is that those who have tried it never go back, unless they have to go back for reasons such as are stated there.

6419. Of course one can understand the moral value of the woman's influence and that a man might perhaps try to behave better because it was a woman?—Unquestionably that is so.

16 December, 1924.]

Dr. F. H. EDWARDS.

6420. And you have taken advantage of that natural instinct between the sexes?—Entirely, and it is a very true and very real thing.

6421. Mr. Micklem: Dr. Edwards, I understand you to suggest that in the case of these licensed houses there is no saleable value attached to the house?—I should imagine not. I have heard of one or two where the owner died, and they have simply shut up and gone.

6422. But I suppose there is a certain goodwill, if the licence runs with the premises, which would attach to the licence and which could be handed on?—Yes. I never heard of one being sold, however.

6423. But some of the licensed houses have run for many years?—Yes, I know the case of one. A medical man came to me recently; he said he thought that his health was not very good, and that the quieter life of a mental hospital would suit him. He told me that he had been offered a very beautiful house with very nice gardens, the house was furnished, on the condition that he paid £600 a year. If there were no licence attached at all I should imagine a furnished house of that size would be £600 a year.

6424. But I suppose one house would be convenient as a nursing home or as an asylum, and at the same value convenient as a dwelling-house?—The Commissioners have always very strongly deprecated any financial association between the licence which they grant, and which can be withdrawn each year, and the sale of such premises. I cannot say that such things have not been done, but they are not within my knowledge.

6425. But how generally does a licensed house pass from the possession of one person to another?—It passes from father to son. There is one in the County of Kent, I think, of which the fifth or sixth generation is now in charge.

6426. How does the licence run? Does it run to allow the patients to be either certificated patients or voluntary patients?—Yes.

6427. In the case of voluntary patients do the rules of visitation and notice to the Commissioners, and so on, apply?—Yes, exactly in the same way. Every voluntary boarder has to be produced if he is on the premises to be seen by the visiting Commissioner, who has to satisfy himself about him. The detention of a person who is a voluntary boarder and who is also of unsound mind, if the law were strictly interpreted, would render the licensee subject to prosecution under Section 315.

6428. The section is a little bit ambiguous, is it not?—Yes, but strictly you are detaining a person who is of unsound mind not within the provisions of the Act.

6429. It says, "Takes charge of, receives to board or lodge in an unlicensed house"?—Yes, but would you continue the section?

6430. The whole thing seems to be summed up in "in an unlicensed house." "Every person who, except under the provisions of this Act, receives or detains a lunatic, or alleged lunatic, in an institution for lunatics, or for payment takes charge of receives to board or lodge, or detains a lunatic or alleged lunatic in an unlicensed house."—Yes, but the first part that you read was as to detaining a lunatic or alleged lunatic in an institution for lunatics.

6431. It is ambiguous?—It is stated in Archbold's Lunacy that if a voluntary boarder becomes insane and is detained, the proprietor is liable to penalties. I have only to say I have treated patients as voluntary boarders; I have fed them artificially; I have done all such things that one might do to a certified patient, but I am sure I have broken Section 315 over and over again.

6432. But are many of these persons who are in your home uncertificated at all events persons of unsound mind?—A certain number of them are.

6433. May I take it that the majority of them are?—No, more than 50 per cent. are people in whom, I think, no medical man could detect any indications of insanity.

6434. A considerable proportion of them are?—Yes.

6435. Do you say that in the case of all those people you are breaking the law every day?—No. It is only in the case of a small section who definitely become insane, where I recognise their insanity, although it may be acute, is going to be transitory.

6436. I do not feel myself that in those cases you are doing anything that is illegal, because you have your licence, and under your licence you are allowed to take those who are certificated and those who are uncertificated.—I think the first part makes it clear. Archbold in his references to it specifically mentions the admission of a boarder who is insane.

6437. Earl Russell: Of course you keep on using the word "detention," but theoretically you do not detain a man?—Oh, yes, you detain a boarder. When you take a boarder, it is clearly understood that that boarder places himself in your care absolutely, and you have power of detention subject to the patient having the power of giving you 24 hours' notice. They are detained for 24 hours.

6438. In the same way as when a boy is at school he must keep the hours?—Yes, exactly.

6439. Mr. Micklem: Your view is that Section 315 ought to be amended, even in the case of homes like your own?—Yes, I do think so.

6440. Miss Madeleine Symons: Could you tell us, Dr. Edwards, have you had any cases who, when they came to you and you had them under observation, you felt ought not be kept and were not certifiable—I do not mean people who have recovered?—I have never actually admitted a patient that I have had to discharge, a patient who was not insane on admission. I have frequently had to discharge a patient in seven days, cases of puerperal insanity occasionally, people who get well in seven days and have to be discharged within that period. I should feel very loth to discharge a patient who was properly committed under two medical certificates and a magistrate's order on my own opinion until I had detained them for certainly seven days; it would be setting up my opinion against two other medical men and the justice, and, of course, the petitioner. But in 30 years' experience I have had 8,000 cases, and I never remember a case which I felt actually on admission was not insane.

6441. Could you tell us about the nurses; do they all have some general hospital training as well as mental training?—I think there is no greater mistake than to send a woman to train first of all in a general hospital and then to have her come to a mental hospital. I cannot say why it is, but the two attitudes of mind of the woman who is prepared to nurse the insane and the woman who desires to nurse the sick are quite different; they are different types of women. I am speaking, of course, very generally, and there are brilliant exceptions, but the hospital nurse rarely makes a good mental nurse. Whether the mental nurse makes a good hospital nurse, subsequently, I do not know, but the experiment of trying to train the hospital nurse as a mental nurse is not, as a rule, in my opinion, a successful experiment. I do not think, either, that it is necessary, because, after all, our probationers come at the age of 21, or any age over 21. They come and they train for three years; they pass the preliminary examination at the end of the year, and at the end of three years they pass the final examination and have sufficient instruction in general nursing. Take a hospital like Camberwell House; there is scarcely a week when there is not some major operation performed. Each nurse in her turn passes through the more purely hospital division. The handbook—the nurses have to study is composed of one-third of ordinary physical training. The first thing a nurse has to learn when she joins the staff is physiology, elementary anatomy, and of course ordinary first-aid, the way to take a temperature, and that sort of thing. It is unnecessary to have a highly technical education in general nursing and general surgery in order to become a good mental nurse. In some ways they are a different type of woman who take it up. The trouble I am afraid of is that, if there is to be any attempt to introduce general nurses into mental hospitals, I doubt much whether the nurses will like the rule that they have all got to become members of a trade union. At present the hospitals have managed to avoid that, but I gather that in the greater part of the country the mental nurses have to become trade unionists. It never seems to fit in very well with nursing, but I suppose I am getting old.

6442. Chairman: Do you think it is desirable that mental nurses who have started as probationers in institutions for mental illness should have a post-graduate stage, as we call it, in a general hospital?—I do not think it is essential in any way. I think it is an advantage, of course, for any nurse to have a general knowledge of all things.

6443. We are told that general hospitals have interposed great difficulties in the way of mental nurses who desired to have a year or two's experience with them?—Yes, I know.

6444. Is that the case?—At my old hospital, Guy's, there was a half-hearted attempt to change over the nurses for short periods with Bethlem Hospital 30 years ago. I do not think it was ever a success.

6445. Why not—do you know?—I think for the reason I give, that if a woman is interested in general nursing she probably hates the worry and anxiety of mental nursing.

6446. Earl Russell: You have got 380 patients altogether, did you say, Dr. Edwards?—Yes, rather more.

6447. About what number of those are certainly irrecquerable—chronic?—Not a large proportion—under 100.

6448. As to those, of course they really want no treatment except keeping them well physically, feeding them properly and making them as happy as you can?—That is so.

6449. That leaves you freer to devote yourself to the more hopeful cases?—Yes.

6450. And those, I suppose, are a remnant of admissions over many years?—That is so, yes. Taking the direct admissions last year, there were 210 certified patients who were admitted directly to Camberwell House, and of those 108 were discharged either on recovery or relieved within 12 months. That is rather more than half, you see.

6451. Mr. Snell: Dr. Edwards, I think you said that you had six regular paid resident doctors?—I said four are resident and two are visiting. One is a pathologist. There is no point in having a resident pathologist. The other one is the medical officer who looks after the patients in the convalescent house. I exclude, of course, the surgeon who visits each week.

6452. You have four resident doctors?—Yes, four.

6453. I was not quite clear when you mentioned that you had 380 patients whether those were all who passed through in a year or were always resident?—Always resident. I suppose about 600 or 700 pass through in a year.

6454. Is it your opinion that four doctors can do all that is necessary for 380 patients?—Yes, because if you take 100 off 380 you come down to 280. The amount of actual definite treatment from day to day is not very great. Drug treatment in many cases is unnecessary. Take the ordinary routine; a patient is admitted in the ordinary way, put to bed and examined by a doctor. Then within two or three days, if it seems desirable, blood is taken and we get the pathological report; the dentist visits and examines the teeth. It is just the routine of a general hospital in every way, and a certain percentage of such patients are very much better with no drugs at all.

6455. That is to say, your doctors are more or less there to give attention to the variations rather than to the ordinary treatment?—Actually a general line of treatment is laid down on consultation in every acute case.

6456. What is the proportion of nurses that you need for that number of patients?—There are 85 nurses on the staff to-day. Of course at one time the nurses in mental hospitals were called upon to do all sorts of work; I think they cleaned the floors when I knew it first. All the actual domestic work now, of course, is taken off them, because we have a staff of ward maids who do the actual physical work, so that such nurses as there are on the staff are entirely for the care of the patients.

6457. I should like to pursue the point you made about female nurses just one step further. What about the cases that are really violent cases?—The comparative number of patients who are really violent I should say—and I am, of course, rather giving guess-work figures now—is perhaps 3 per cent.

6458. You find that a woman's influence is more composing than a man's strength, is that it?—When I first received an appointment in a mental hospital, from time to time there were regrettable incidents; there were such things as fractured ribs that were unaccounted for; generally the patient had slipped and fallen on the side of the bath. I can say that no such regrettable incident or accident has occurred since female nurses have had charge of male patients.

6459. They do not slip on the bath?—No.

6460. Chairman: But you have just told us that the bath is in charge of the male attendants?—The really infirm male patients have everything done for them by nurses, as they would have in a hospital.

6461. The bath that is given in bed to a patient is given by a nurse to a male patient just the same as to a female patient?—Yes, exactly as in a hospital.

6462. Sir Humphry Rolleston: Does a fracture of a rib necessarily show that any violence has taken place?—No. I have taken in my hand the bone of a patient with general paralysis and it has broken.

6463. Mr. Snell: I find it difficult to put this question, but I am sure you will not misunderstand what I mean. There is a feeling in the mind of the public that in private hospitals, which are not run primarily for public service but as proprietary institutions, there comes a point where the medical proprietor's interest in his establishment may conflict with his duty to his patients. How is that provided against?—*I am fortunately not a medical proprietor. I fancy that one has to look at this rather from a peculiar standpoint. You have got a small number of hospitals, such as Camberwell House and Peckham House, which are really big places run on hospital lines in which the entire medical management is vested entirely in the hands of doctors who are not proprietors in any sense but who are paid officials; they have no more financial interest than the superintendent of a county or borough mental hospital. You have those on the one hand and that type of place is carrying out the functions of any other hospital. The ultimate destination of any surplus profit is a matter in some cases for a financial board or such proprietary interests which may lie behind, but there could be no interference by such a body as long as the present Board of Control exists. There is an understanding which I have always found between the Board of Control and the superintendents, such as myself. If there is anything I wanted or anything I thought wanted altering, it would be done. If I could not get it done it would be done by pressure put on the financial body by the Board of Control. But the other places are in a different category. They are small homes; they provide comfortable places where people can live; they are suitable particularly for chronic forms of mental disorder. They are not, excepting in the rarest cases, at all suitable for the reception of patients who are acutely mentally ill; in fact, many such smaller homes would refuse to take a patient who was acutely insane.

6464. I do not know that I have quite got the point that I wanted. The Chairman and other members of the Commission will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe it is a legal maxim that where a man's duty and his interest conflict he is in a very difficult position. I feel that there possibly might be such occasions in regard to private hospitals, and I am trying to find out how in such cases, if they exist, the patients and the public can be protected?—That is the detention of a sane person?

6465. Yes, where a person has been ill, perhaps certified, and then is restored to health?—I think perhaps my reply shows that it would hardly affect me in my particular work—but you are presuming you have got a small mental hospital in which you have a medical proprietor whose financial interest might tend to clash with his duty to his patients. You are bound in this world to trust certain people to do their duty. We might, of course, quite as well say that an ordinary doctor who treats us when we are ill is purposely keeping us ill in order to run up a bill against us when we are well.

Chairman: It has even been said about lawyers that they foment litigation.

6466. Mr. Snell: There is only one other question I would like to put to you, and it is in regard to the dietary and amenities of these private hospitals. One public complaint against them is that though patients pay on a scale which should ensure a good dietary, the proprietors of establishments tend more and more to pare down the comfort until it becomes almost below the standard of living?—Of course, if that happened, I can quite understand that the place would not last very long, because the patients would complain and their relatives would move them somewhere else where they were better fed.

6467. Are the places available so numerous that there is any very great choice in the matter?—Yes. Speaking rather generally, the large licensed houses receive patients at rates which are lower in the ordinary way than even the registered hospitals charge; but they charge at rates which are nevertheless higher than the county mental hospitals charge generally. There is no secret about the charges that are made at Camberwell House; they are printed in bold type for all who want to know. The ordinary charge for ordinary patients is 3½ guineas a week. In the case of people acutely mentally ill, and during such time as they are acutely ill, they pay five guineas a week.
